

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

VOL. CCXXIII. [THIRD SERIES.]

THE MARRIAGE LAWS.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

LORD CHELMSFORD, who had given Notice to call attention to the Report of the Royal Commission on the Laws of Marriage, presented to the House in the year 1868, said, he rose for the purpose of bringing under the notice of their Lordships a subject of the greatest possible importance, and of deep interest to all classes of the community. It was now more than 10 years since public attention was called to the difficulties and perplexities arising from the circumstance that the laws relating to marriage differed in the three parts of the United Kingdom. The operation of these laws was at that time illustrated by a remarkable case which was tried in the Courts of Ireland and Scotland, and which ultimately came for final decision in their Lordships' House. This case involved two questions—one arising from the peculiarities of the Scotch Marriage Law, and the other from the law relating to mixed marriages in Ireland. There was a difference of opinion among the Judges in the various tribunals before which the case was tried, and a strong controversy arose out-of-doors with regard to the case. After considerable discussion on various ways, a very general desire was expressed that an endeavour should be made to bring, if possible, the Marriage Laws into uniformity throughout the United Kingdom. The Government of the day yielded to the desire, and issued a Royal Commission in the year 1865 to inquire into the whole subject. He (Lord Chelmsford) was Chairman of the Commission, the other Members being all of them eminently qualified to investigate the subject, and to form an enlightened judgment as to what alterations of the law were desirable. They were very properly selected from the several parts of the United Kingdom. For England there were, besides himself, his noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack (Lord Cairns), his noble and learned Friend opposite (Lord Selborne), Lord Hatherley, Lord Penzance, Lord Lyveden, Mr. Spencer Walpole, and the Queen's Advocate. For Scotland there were the Lord Justice General, the Lord Advocate of Scotland, and Mr. Dunlop; for Ireland, his lamented Friend Lord Mayo, the late Lord Chancellor of Ireland, and Mr. Monsell. The Commission began their labours by requiring to be furnished with summaries of the Marriage Laws in the different parts of the United Kingdom. These were prepared by competent persons, and he could not help regretting that they were not published among the Appendices to the Report. By desire of the Commission, he (Lord Chelmsford) sent out a circular asking for information and observations upon the whole subject; and adding—

“But although the Commissioners would desire to have the advantage of your judgment upon the constitution of the marriage contract, (religious and secular), its proofs, its registration, and the preservation of the evidence respecting it, they are more particularly anxious to receive information as to the practical operation of the present law in those places with which you are best acquainted.”

That circular was addressed to all the Archbishops and Bishops in England,

Lord Chelmsford

Scotland, and Ireland, Protestant and Roman Catholic; to the Moderator of the Established Church of Scotland, to the Moderators of the Free Church and of the United Presbyterian Church of Scotland, to Roman Catholic clergy, and to several persons connected with the Presbyterian Church in Ireland; to clergymen of the Established Church in England, to the President and Vice President of the Wesleyan Conference in England, to various persons, members of the Dissenting bodies in England; to the Chief Rabbi, to the Registrar General, and to many of the Registrars throughout the country. That circular elicited a vast amount of very useful information. The Commission then proceeded to examine witnesses, and about 100 persons either answered the circular or were examined on a case before the Commission. The inquiry extended over a period of three years, not owing to any want of diligence on the part of the members, but to the fact that several of them had judicial and other duties to perform in various parts of the country; and it was therefore difficult to appoint meetings to suit the convenience of the different Members. After a very full consideration of the whole subject, the Report was prepared, and when he stated that the Commission was indebted for it to his noble and learned Friend opposite (Lord Selborne), he need not add that it was a most able and valuable document. It was signed, as to its general principles, by every member of the Commission except the late Lord Mayo, who, as his official position as Chief Secretary for Ireland prevented his attending the latter sittings of the Commission, thought it would not be right of him to sign it. He would shortly state to their Lordships some of the matters with which the Report dealt. It began by laying down the principles of a sound Marriage Law. It contained recommendations as to the capacity of persons to contract marriage, and as to the solemnities that should be required. It recommended the abolition of canonical hours; the solemnization of marriage in the presence of witnesses; and it contained numerous and important recommendations relative to the requirements preliminary to marriage:—such as notice and residence; they recommended that the publication of banns, though not interfered with in the Established Churches, should not be required by law as a condition of the lawfulness of any marriage; as to the consent of parents and guardians; as to notices, they recommended that the certificate of compliance with the prescribed regulations of the proper officers should be sufficient, and that licences should be thereby superseded; as to the registration of marriages; and as to evidence and penalties. The Commissioners conclude—

“Should our recommendations in their general substance, become law, the great object of uniformity will have been accomplished; the law will be simplified and consolidated; the highest practicable security for the facility, certainty, and safety of marriage will have been attained without any infringement of religious liberty, or antagonism between the authority of the State and the influence of religion: and at the same time there will be no sensible interference with the previously accustomed course of regular marriage, as hitherto solemnized, in England, in Scotland, or in Ireland.”

It was right he should state that the Lord Chancellor of Ireland and Mr. Monsell dissented from the recommendations as to Divorce, believing that the marriage tie was indissoluble, and that divorce a vinculo was contrary to the law of God. The Lord Justice General signed, but, with excusable partiality, stated that, entertaining a settled conviction founded on experience and a patient study of the subject, that the Marriage Law of Scotland was preferable in theory and principle to the Marriage Law of England, and that it had in practice been highly beneficial in its influence on the social condition and morality of the people, he could not assent to a proposal to alter that law in any particular affecting its essential principle. The Report was presented in 1868—nearly seven years ago—and it was matter of great regret, and perhaps of reproach, that nothing had since been done to carry out the recommendations of the Committee. Of course, the introduction of a measure to alter the Marriage Laws could be undertaken only by a Government. He must relieve himself from any responsibility on the subject, by stating that he ceased to be Lord Chancellor in February, 1868, and the Report of the Commission was not presented to the House till July of that year. He was succeeded by his noble and learned Friend who now again occupied the Woolsack.

It could hardly have been expected that his noble and learned Friend would be able to do anything with so large and important a subject as the Marriage Laws during the short time in which he then held office. In the next Session he was succeeded by Lord Hatherley. He (Lord Chelmsford) tried to ascertain what were the intentions of his noble and learned Friend (Lord Hatherley) on the subject now before their Lordships, and in reply Lord Hatherley said—

In 1872, he (Lord Chelmsford) again tried to urge the matter on the attention of his noble and learned Friend, when he was told that there were so many pressing measures on the hands of the Government that he could not then undertake legislation on so important a subject. Thus remitted to the future, when he pressed the subject on the attention of the Government, he began to despair, when his hopes were revived by the succession of his noble and learned Friend opposite to the Chancellorship. Feeling secure of his anxious desire that the recommendations of a Commission to which he had done such valuable service should be carried out, he took an early opportunity of appealing to him; and in reply his noble and learned Friend said—

“He trusted the proposals would one day be embodied in a law without pledging the Government in any way. If it should be his good fortune at some future time to be instrumental in submitting such a law to the House, it would not be one of the least of the services which he desired to be able to render to the country.”

He felt under some embarrassment in expressing his regret that the Great Seal should have passed from the hands of his noble and learned Friend; but must qualify the expression by confining it in relation to this subject, and by adding his satisfaction that he has been succeeded by his noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack. In making his appeal to him, his noble and learned Friend could not excuse himself from engaging with the subject of the Report decision in their Lordships' House. This case involved two questions—one arising from the peculiarities of the Scotch Marriage Law, and the other from the law relating to mixed marriages in Ireland. There was a difference of opinion among the Judges in the various tribunals before which the case was tried, and a strong controversy arose out-of-doors with regard to the case. The inquiry extended over a period of three years, not owing to any want of diligence on the part of the members, but to the fact that several of them had judicial and other duties to perform in various parts of the country; and it was therefore difficult to appoint meetings to suit the convenience of the different Members. After a very full consideration of the whole subject, the Report was prepared, and when he stated that the Commission was indebted for it to his noble and learned Friend opposite (Lord Selborne), he need not add that it was a most able and valuable document. It was signed, as to its general principles, by every member of the Commission except the late Lord Mayo, who, as his official position as Chief Secretary for Ireland prevented his attending the latter sittings of the Commission, thought it would not be right of him to sign it. He would shortly state to their Lordships some of the matters with which the Report dealt. It began by laying down the principles of a sound Marriage Law. It contained recommendations as to the capacity of persons to contract marriage, and as to the solemnities that should be required. It recommended the abolition of canonical hours; the solemnization of marriage in the presence of witnesses; and it contained numerous and important recommendations relative to the requirements preliminary to marriage:—such as notice and residence; they recommended that the publication of banns, though not interfered with in the Established Churches, should not be required by law as a condition of the lawfulness of any marriage; as to the consent of parents and guardians; as to notices, they recommended that the certificate of compliance with the prescribed regulations of the proper officers should be sufficient, and that licences should be thereby superseded; as to the registration of marriages; and as to evidence and penalties. The Commissioners conclude—

“Should our recommendations in their general substance, become law, the great object of uniformity will have been accomplished; the law will be simplified and consolidated; the highest practicable security for the facility, certainty, and safety of marriage will have been attained without any infringement of religious liberty, or antagonism between the authority of the State and the influence of religion: and at the same time there will be no sensible interference with the previously accustomed course of regular marriage, as hitherto solemnized, in England, in Scotland, or in Ireland.”

It was right he should state that the Lord Chancellor of Ireland and Mr. Monsell dissented from the recommendations as to Divorce, believing that the marriage tie was indissoluble, and that divorce a vinculo was contrary to the law of God. The Lord Justice General signed, but, with excusable partiality, stated that, entertaining a settled conviction founded on experience and a patient study of the subject, that the Marriage Law of Scotland was preferable in theory and principle to the Marriage Law of England, and that it had in practice been highly beneficial in its influence on the social condition and morality of the people, he could not assent to a proposal to alter that law in any particular affecting its essential principle. The Report was presented in 1868—nearly seven years ago—and it was matter of great regret, and perhaps of reproach, that nothing had since been done to carry out the recommendations of the Committee. Of course, the introduction of a measure to alter the Marriage Laws could be undertaken only by a Government. He must relieve himself from any responsibility on the subject, by stating that he ceased to be Lord Chancellor in February, 1868, and the Report of the Commission was not presented to the House till July of that year. He was succeeded by his noble and learned Friend who now again occupied the Woolsack.

It could hardly have been expected that his noble and learned Friend would be able to do anything with so large and important a subject as the Marriage Laws during the short time in which he then held office. In the next Session he was succeeded by Lord Hatherley. He (Lord Chelmsford) tried to ascertain what were the intentions of his noble and learned Friend (Lord Hatherley) on the subject now before their Lordships, and in reply Lord Hatherley said—

In 1872, he (Lord Chelmsford) again tried to urge the matter on the attention of his noble and learned Friend, when he was told that there were so many pressing measures on the hands of the Government that he could not then undertake legislation on so important a subject. Thus remitted to the future, when he pressed the subject on the attention of the Government, he began to despair, when his hopes were revived by the succession of his noble and learned Friend opposite to the Chancellorship. Feeling secure of his anxious desire that the recommendations of a Commission to which he had done such valuable service should be carried out, he took an early opportunity of appealing to him; and in reply his noble and learned Friend said—

He felt under some embarrassment in expressing his regret that the Great Seal should have passed from the hands of his noble and learned Friend; but must qualify the expression by confining it in relation to this subject, and by adding his satisfaction that he has been succeeded by his noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack. In making his appeal to him, his noble and learned Friend could not excuse himself from engaging with the subject of the Report on the ground that he might be charged with hastiness and inconsideration, nor did he (Lord Chelmsford) suppose that his noble Friend would plead the numerous important subjects demanding his attention. Indeed, they were led to expect that under a rest-and-be-thankful Administration, the field of legislation would lie fallow for the present Session. He hoped that his noble and learned Friend would not allow this subject to remain much longer neglected. He was anxious that the labours of the Commission should bear fruit, and that this question should not be sent to the limbo of abortive works. For this reason he wished to ask his noble and learned Friend the Lord Chancellor, Whether he can hold out any hope that steps will be taken by the present Government to carry out the recommendation of the Commissioners for the amendment of the Marriage Laws?

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, that the subject to which his noble and learned Friend had referred was another of the many proofs that in this country most multifarious and onerous duties might be assigned to a Royal Commission, that those duties might be discharged with great zeal and ability, that a mass of valuable information might be collected and very excellent recommendations made, and yet years elapse before any particular fruit was borne as the result of those labours. He agreed with all that had been said by his noble and learned Friend about the Commission on the Marriage Laws. The subject was certainly a very wide and important one, and the pains taken by the Commission presided over by his noble and learned Friend could not be described in too strong terms. He further agreed with what his noble and learned Friend had said as to the Report. It was a document of great weight and great ability, in the preparation of which his noble and learned Friend the late Lord Chancellor (Lord Selborne) took the greatest trouble, and for which—if he might be allowed to say so—he deserved the greatest praise. But there were other circumstances which must be borne in mind when this subject was being considered. The great object of the Royal Commission was not so much to make a change in the Marriage Laws as to produce an assimilation of the Marriage Laws in the Three Kingdoms. The Commissioners reported on a means to that end, and if that end was to be accomplished those means were perhaps those that alone could be adopted for the purpose. But in considering the feasibility of any proposed legislation on such a subject, we must see how far the recommendations of the Report would commend themselves throughout the United Kingdom. He believed the recommendations would affect the Marriage Laws of England so very little that they would not provoke much opposition in this country; but when they found a distinguished Scotch lawyer speaking as the Lord Justice General did—and not speaking for himself alone—it was to be apprehended that in Scotland the proposals of the Commissioners would have to encounter disfavour and discontent. Then their Lordships knew that the noble and learned Lord and the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Monsell) who represented Ireland on the Commission dissented, not from the Report as a whole, but in respect of certain subjects which in a general measure would be found very embarrassing subjects to deal with. Therefore, he feared that when such a measure came to be discussed it would be received with anything but unanimity or concurrence on the part of the representatives of the sister countries, who were most likely to be affected by it. In saying that he did not mean to say that those difficulties were a reason why legislation should not be attempted; but, at the same time, he thought they were not to be overlooked when the Government were asked to consider the probability of passing a measure of the kind. He agreed with his noble and learned Friend that if such a measure was to be brought forward it must be by the Government of the day; but the Government had to ask themselves what was the proper time to bring it forward with a fair prospect of passing it. What probability there was of its being sufficiently discussed and considered during any particular Session; and what were the probabilities out-of-doors of any desire for a measure such as they might think it right to introduce if they proposed legislation in the matter at all. He could only say, speaking as to the present Session, that, looking at the measures already brought forward, he did not think there was the slightest prospect of a Bill on this subject being introduced; and as to next Session, he thought it would be extremely wrong, without knowing on what subjects legislation might be taken in that Session, to give any pledge as to legislation on the Marriage Laws. His noble and learned Friend asked him whether he could "hold out any hope" that steps would be taken by the Government in that direction? Well, that was a somewhat figurative way of putting it. They all lived in hope, and he was quite ready to join with his noble and learned Friend in any amount of hope on this or any other subject; but if his noble and learned Friend asked him to give any engagement on the part of the Government, that was what he was afraid he must decline to do.

LORD SELBORNE said, that perhaps his noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack could not have given any other reply than that which he had just made to his noble and learned Friend opposite, so far as declining to enter into any engagement; but he must say that his noble and learned Friend's answer left on his mind the impression that government in this country—he did not mean by the present, more than by any other Administration—had of late lapsed into a deplorable state of weakness and indecision with regard to the largest social subjects and to those affecting the most general interests of the community. The real truth, as he understood his noble and learned Friend, was this:—his noble and learned Friend was aware that the subject on which the Commission had been engaged was one of great public importance; that the actual state of the Marriage Laws in portions of the United Kingdom was such as it ought not to be; that useful materials had been collected for the improvement of those laws; and that—whether the recommendations of the Commission were, or were not, in all their details, exactly such as he would adopt—a proper mode of dealing with the subject had, upon the whole, been suggested. What, then, were the reasons why nothing could be done? Was it that this was a speculative matter? Were there no real practical evils arising from this state of the law? Though the cases which resulted in actual litigation might not be very numerous, every year cases did come from Scotland, furnishing fresh and fresh illustrations of the effect of the present law as to irregular marriages in that country, in creating uncertainty as to the existence of the marriage tie and as to the legitimacy and the expectations of children. So strange was the law in Scotland that it was no exaggeration to say, that no man who had in youth led an irregular life in that country could be sure, when he married, that the legitimacy and succession of his children might not some day be called in question. What was the cause of the difficulty in dealing with this question? Not that the habits of the people of Scotland had been so formed on this vicious system that you would be uprooting and overturning them by improving the law; because, though those marriages were numerous enough to be a great evil, still, as compared with the total number of marriages in Scotland, they were insignificant. The law which produced the evil was not that of regular marriages, but that of irregular marriages, such as were disapproved and discouraged by every religious body in Scotland, opposed to the general sentiment and practice of the Scottish people, and even treated as the proper subject of penalties by the old statute law of that part of the Realm. It did seem not a little surprising that prejudice should have such power as to prevent the Legislature from dealing with such an evil after a reasonable mode of correcting it had been ascertained. The Commission recommended considerable changes in the Marriage Laws of England, Scotland, and Ireland; but those changes would have effected no disturbance of the religious sentiment or of the general habits of the people in any part of the United Kingdom; they would have given no advantage to any one Church or religious body over another; they would not have divorced marriage from religion: but they would have established uniformity and security for the Marriage Law in England, Scotland, and Ireland. If he were in the position of his noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack, he might, no doubt, also feel the difficulty of obtaining popular support for a measure to give effect to the recommendations of the Commission, sufficient to overcome any serious differences of opinion which might manifest themselves in the Legislature. There were difficulties in this case, as in every case in which reforms were to be accomplished and prejudices overcome; but, if he had continued to occupy the position now more worthily filled by his noble and learned Friend, he should not have willingly given up the hope of being able to overcome them: and he still entertained the hope, notwithstanding what they had heard to-night, that if his noble and learned Friend should for some time longer enjoy an undisturbed occupation of office he would endeavour to achieve that important object.

LORD DENMAN regretted that the Summary spoken of by the noble and learned Lord (Lord Chelmsford) had not been published in the Appendices of the Report. He hoped that the Government would have it published so that full information might be given with a view to legislation next Session.

TURKEY AND EASTERN EUROPEAN POWERS.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

LORD CAMPBELL*: My Lords, I am glad to find that, in putting the Question of which I have given Notice, I do not stand between the House and any further business, although I shall depart but little from the reserve which I have hitherto maintained upon the topic. If I depart from it at all, it is because we are on the verge of an adjournment for Easter, while something might be done during that period beyond the power of revoking. The two inquiries I have to make, like those which came from me before, and like that which came from my noble Friend, the former President of the Board of Trade, imply no censure of the Government, and involve it in no difficulty. They are, whether the Correspondence of Austria, the German Empire, and Russia, with the Porte, which has appeared, I believe, in many journals, and, certainly, in The Observer of March 7th, is authentic in its substance; and, if so, whether the Ottoman despatch has yet received an answer? Material and relevant as these questions evidently are, at the same time the Government are not positively bound to give them a reply. They are at liberty to state, that the three Powers did not transmit to them the identic Note which has led to so much movement in the capitals of Europe, and, therefore, that they cannot speak upon the point of authenticity. They are at liberty to state that they are also uninformed, whether or not, the Ottoman despatch has met with a rejoinder. It certainly was not the business of the Government to answer a paper so thoroughly in accordance with British views and objects, that they might rather have inspired it. But if the Government adopt this language, the world at large must draw, I think, two inferences. They must infer that the three Powers have united as to Eastern policy without admitting to their confidence the other signatories of 1856; that they have put an arbitrary, one cannot term it a disinterested, interpretation on the Treaty without any reference to France, to Italy, or to Great Britain. They must infer, also, that their answer to the Ottoman despatch, if it exists, was far from a conclusive one, because had it been conclusive, it would hardly be suppressed. Exaggerated modesty has never been a quality to which the three Powers have aspired, although since 1815 their union has had a moral as well as a political complexion. Let me not be thought, however, should the Ottoman despatch be still unanswered, to reflect a moment on their silence. An identic answer, to be concerted in three capitals, might well require a longer period than that which has elapsed; and their silence, if it still remains, is the best and most hopeful incident of the transaction. It is the single point on which one might be willing to extol them. I should now sit down were I not anxious to put an end to an impression that the few steps which I have taken on the subject have been conceived in a mode or spirit hostile to the Foreign Office. The impression is not likely to exist in this House, or beyond rather distant quarters, in which it is supposed, that all Governments are harassed, more or less, by all interrogations. My Lords, according to the view which I have formed on this occurrence, the Government, by no fault of their own, almost unaided, almost single-handed, are engaged in a struggle with the very elements which taxed the lofty mind of Mr. Canning from 1822 to 1827, and, at a rather later period, exercised the courage and acumen for which Lord Palmerston was so well known amongst us. In that struggle it seems to me they cannot do without the distinct and concentrated sympathy of Parliament and of the country. Questions of this kind, although they may not be sufficient—and they are not—have, at least, a tendency to draw that sympathy towards them. I am so convinced, by many previous circumstances, that the noble Earl the Secretary of State has fundamentally the same ideas and objects as myself on Eastern policy, that I would give any proof of friendly disposition to the Foreign Office, except that of pointing to a specific course by which the difficulty, they acknowledge, would be remedied. To point to a specific course I know would be beyond the scope of any one, unless he were surrounded by every diplomatist who can contribute to unravel, and acquainted with every despatch which throws a light upon the subject. But although I would not presume to indicate a course to be pursued, it is a different thing to touch a moment on a course which ought to be avoided, while at the same time there may be some temptation to fall into it. My Lords, I venture to engage the Government to avoid what I regret to term the bad example of 1870, of which the details and the stages are well known to them. I venture to engage them, should some new blow impend upon the Treaty of 1856, not to smooth the way for it, not to throw a veil of decency around it, not to extricate from difficulty those who have prepared it, not to be the instruments and seconders of a triumph they may be unable to avert, not to protest first, in order, to be accessories later. The suggestion which I make is not indeed a brilliant, but entirely a negative one. I ask the Government to keep their dignity unsullied; and, should an European loss be unavoidable, to leave its whole accountability, its whole embarrassment, its whole reproach, to those who have created it.

THE EARL OF DERBY: I certainly never for a moment thought that my noble Friend asked his Question in any unfriendly spirit. I think he had a right to put the Question, and I am quite ready to answer it. Now, as to the first part of it, I have to reply that the Correspondence to which my noble Friend refers is authentic—I mean substantially authentic—because there are one or two inaccuracies, apparently of translation. But these are not important, and do not in any way affect the general authenticity of the Correspondence. As to the second part of the Question, I have to say that I am not aware that any answer has been given to the despatch referred to, either by the three Powers collectively or by any one of them singly. If any answer had been given in an official form, I have very little doubt that I should have been made aware of it. I do not think it would be convenient that I should go into an explanatory statement of the position in which we stand. A few weeks ago, in answer to my noble Friend, I stated what were the material facts of the case as they stood at that moment, and nothing has occurred to alter the circumstances since that time. My noble Friend need not be afraid that we shall depart from the construction we have put on our Treaty engagements. Our view on that point was deliberately adopted by us, and we have no intention to abandon it. At the same time, I must point out that where the interpretation of Treaties is in question, we cannot enforce our views on other Powers. We can only adhere to them ourselves. I shall be able to produce the Papers within the next few weeks, and if the noble Lord wishes a discussion on the subject, it will be perhaps more convenient for him to raise it when he has all the materials before him.

CRIMINAL LAW—LAW OF EVIDENCE —THE SHORNCLIFFE MURDER.

QUESTIONS.

SIR CHARLES RUSSELL asked Mr. Attorney General, Whether his attention has been called to the case of a soldier whose throat was so severely cut as to prevent his utterance, and who therefore wrote "Morgan done this," at the same time indicating Morgan; and, if so, whether his attention has been further called to the withdrawal of such writing by the counsel for the prosecution in consequence of a doubt expressed by the presiding judge, and endorsed by the Lord Chief Justice, as to its admissibility in evidence; and, whether, with a view to prevent the possible failure of justice, he will make provision by legal enactment to remove any doubt which may exist as to the admissibility of such evidence?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL: Sir, in answer to the first Question of my hon. and gallant Friend, I have to state that my attention has been directed to the report in The Times of Friday last of the trial and conviction, on the previous day, at Maidstone, of John Morgan, for the murder of his comrade, a soldier named Joseph Foulkstone. It appears from that report, that, immediately after he had been wounded, Foulkstone rushed from the place where he had been attacked into an adjoining hut, and there, being unable, by reason of the wound in his throat, to speak, wrote certain words upon a piece of paper. It does not appear, from the report to which I have referred, what were the words which were so written, though they were probably to the effect stated in the Question. I should add that Morgan was not present when they were written, and that the action of Foulkstone, which my hon. and gallant Friend refers to as "indicating Morgan," occurred, not at the same time, but at a somewhat later period. In answer to the second Question, I have to state that the counsel for the prosecution, having at one period of the trial tendered the writing in evidence, appears to have subsequently abstained from putting it in, in consequence of an intimation by the presiding Judge, after consultation with the Lord Chief Justice, that, in the event of his admitting it, he should consider it his duty to reserve the question of its admissibility for the Court for Crown Cases Reserved; and in my humble opinion the counsel for the prosecution exercised a wise discretion in withdrawing the document, for, had the evidence been admitted and the admission been subsequently held erroneous, the conviction would have been set aside, however cogent the other evidence might have been. To the third Question of my hon. and gallant Friend, whether, with a view to prevent the possible failure of justice, I will make provision by legislative enactment to remove any doubt which may exist as to the admissibility of such evidence, I can only reply in the negative. As the House is aware, the law recognizes the admissibility in evidence, in certain cases, of the declarations, whether verbal or in writing, of a dying man; but it is essential that the person making the declaration should at the time of making it be under the firm conviction that he is dying; and any hope of recovery, however slight, would render the evidence inadmissible; the principle upon which evidence of this kind is admitted being that a person who believes himself to be at the point of death has imposed upon him an obligation to speak the truth equal to that which is created by an oath administered in Court. In Morgan's case, so far as I can judge, the doubt, such as it was, which existed as to the admissibility of the writing, arose from the absence of any direct evidence, though the surrounding circumstances pointed in that direction, that Foulkstone believed himself to be dying, it being clear, as well from experience as from the authority of decided cases, that such belief cannot be inferred from the mere fact that the dying man had received a wound of a nature to render death inevitable, or that his death occurred very shortly after the making of his declaration. I think, Sir, under the circumstances, that any alteration of the law in the direction suggested by my hon. and gallant Friend would have the effect of causing, rather than preventing, a possible failure of justice.

MASTER AND SERVANT ACT—CASE OF JOHN CORRY.—QUESTION.

MR. P. A. TAYLOR asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether he will give the benefit of the unanimous recommendation of the Royal Commission on the Master and Servant Act (to the effect that a simple breach of contract should not be criminally punished) to all persons now under punishment for that offence; and, in such case, whether he will order the immediate release of John Corry, a farm servant, lately sentenced to be imprisoned for two months in Carlisle Gaol for a breach of contract in 1873?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: Sir, I am always ready to inquire into any case that is brought before me where a prisoner has been convicted, and believes he has some reason why he should be pardoned. In every particular case a very careful examination is made; and I am perfectly willing to take the step of giving advice to Her Majesty, where I feel that I ought to do so; but I must entirely decline, with the permission of the House, to answer any such general inquiry as the hon. Gentleman has placed on the Paper to-night. With regard to the prisoner John Corry, all I have to say is, that no application whatever has been made to the Home Office in his favour.

CRIMINAL LAW—UNCONVICTED PRISONERS—PRISON REGULATIONS.
QUESTION.

SIR WILLIAM FRASER asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether it is the case that persons remanded by a magistrate, unconvicted of any offence, can be compelled to scrub the floor of their cells, while there are many prisoners and other persons willing to do this work for a small remuneration?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: I really think, Sir, I ought not to be called upon to answer Questions of this kind. But as to this Question, I must refer my hon. Friend to the Prison Rules, which are made by the Court of Quarter Sessions, and are approved by the Secretary of State. By those rules every prisoner is bound to keep his cell and the articles therein clean and in order, and beyond that I have nothing to say. ["Hear!"]

THE ORANGE FREE STATE REPUBLIC.
QUESTION.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether Her Majesty's Government have any objection to print and lay before Parliament, Copy of the following Correspondence—namely, that which has taken place, 1st, between Her Majesty's High Commissioner in South Africa and the President of the Orange Free State Republic; 2nd, between the said President and Her Majesty's Secretary of State for the Colonies; and 3rd, between Her Majesty's said Secretary of State and the said High Commissioner, the whole of said Correspondence dating from and having reference to the occasion of Her Majesty's High Commissioner taking possession of certain territory which (including the diamond fields) was then and is still claimed to be the territory of the aforesaid Republic, and which is alleged to have been surrendered only under protest and to superior force?

MR. J. LOWTHER, in reply, said, that those Papers relating to affairs in South Africa were in course of preparation. They contained Correspondence relative to the hon. Gentleman's Question, and he hoped they would be presented to Parliament shortly.

INDIA—CASE OF CAPTAIN J. B.
CHATTERTON.—QUESTION.

SIR THOMAS CHAMBERS asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether his attention has been called to the case of Captain J. B. Chatterton, late of the Bengal Staff Corps; and, whether it is true that that officer, while a patient in the hospital at Calcutta in 1869, suffering from contraction of the left leg, certified by seven medical officers, was turned out of the hospital, and thus left without the means of defraying his passage to England or of obtaining further medical assistance; further, if it true that he was at the same time placed upon half-pay, which half-pay he was then informed was not payable to him in India, and that, in consequence of this treatment, this officer, as he alleges, was left without the means of defraying his passage to England (contrary to the covenant existing between the late East India Company and their officers) or of obtaining medical assistance; and, further, is it true, as this officer alleges, that he has thus been made a cripple for life, that he has ever since been under medical treatment, and has undergone several surgical operations?

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: Sir, my attention has been directed to the case of Captain Chatterton, though I have no information as to the circumstances under which he left the hospital at Calcutta in April, 1869. The Government of India, in 1869, reported that Captain Chatterton persisted in representing himself as unfit for duty from illness, although medical opinion was against him. They suggested that his representation should be adopted, and that, being unfit for effective service, he should be placed upon the retired list. The Secretary of State concurred in this recommendation, and Captain Chatterton was placed upon half-pay on the 13th of April, 1869, and he quitted India in July following. Captain Chatterton is mistaken in supposing that any covenant existed between him and the East India Company, by which the Indian Government were bound to pay his passage home. A passage was obtained for him by the Government of Madras, the cost of which has been deducted in small instalments from his half-pay. I can give no information in reply to the last Question, except that letters have been written by Captain Chatterton to the Secretary of State, stating that he is a cripple and has undergone surgical operations.

SCOTLAND—THE ORDNANCE SURVEY. QUESTION.

MR. RAMSAY asked the First Commissioner of Works, Whether the Ordnance Survey of the Mainland of Argyllshire and of the Islands which form part of that county (which was commenced upwards of forty years since) is ever to be completed; and, if so, when maps of the same may be expected to be published?

LORD HENRY LENNOX: Sir, the survey of the mainland of Argyllshire was commenced, not 20 years ago, but in 1859, and it is finished. The plans on 25-inch scale of the cultivated districts have been published, and also those on the 6-inch scale for the greater part of the county. With regard to the Isles, the survey of them all has been completed, except Islay and Jura, and these will be proceeded with early in the summer. I may mention that, in consequence of the deputation which waited on me last year, including the hon. Member, and my noble Friend the Member for Argyllshire (the Marquess of Lorne), the surveyors were at work through the winter, but, owing to the excessive rains, they have not made the progress I hoped for; but no pains will be spared to push on the survey as rapidly as possible.

NAVY—NAVIGATING OFFICERS.

QUESTION.

MR. HANBURY TRACY asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, If he will state how many qualified Lieutenants and Sub-Lieutenants are now employed in navigating duties, and how many are now qualifying under Admiralty Circulars of 1873 and 1874; whether he proposes to take any further steps for enlarging the scope of those proposals; and, whether he has now arrived at any determination in reference to offering a scheme of retirement or amalgamation to the navigating Lieutenants and Staff Commanders, with the view of the gradual abolition of a separate grade of officers for navigating duties?

MR. HUNT: Sir, two lieutenants and 13 sub-lieutenants have qualified for navigating and pilotage duties under the Circulars of 1873 and 1874; four lieutenants and 11 sub-lieutenants are qualifying. More volunteers have been called for to undertake those duties, and it is proposed to select 30 to qualify themselves during the year. With regard to the last Question, I am not prepared to announce any determination at present, as I consider this subject, and that of the executive officers of the Navy must be dealt with as a whole.

ARMY—KNIGHTSBRIDGE BARRACKS.

QUESTION.

MR. FORSYTH asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether it is the fact that the Knightsbridge Barracks are about to undergo a process of reconstruction; and, whether it is the intention of the Government to keep up those barracks as a permanent building, or to remove them; and, if so, when?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY, in reply, said, he was not aware that any such project as the reconstruction of the Knightsbridge Barracks was contemplated.

THE JUDICATURE ACT.—QUESTION.

SIR EARDLEY WILMOT asked the First Lord of the Treasury, What are the intentions of Her Majesty's Government with reference to the Judicature Act of 1873?

MR. DISRAELI: I might, Sir, take a Parliamentary objection, I think, to the Question of the hon. Baronet. It is not, generally speaking, conducive to the convenience of the House that the policy of the Government should be made known to the Houses of Parliament by means of a forced Answer to an abrupt leading Question put by a private Member. If the Question is treated with reserve, it leads naturally to misconception; and if, on the contrary, it is treated with that frankness, which I, for one, wish always to extend to the House, the Minister is placed in a false position by apparently according to an individual, of his own motion, that which he would prefer, as a matter of courtesy, to communicate to the House in a formal and more convenient manner. But after these remarks—which I think I am justified in making in the present instance—and looking to the Question of the hon. Baronet, I will inform the House that after the holidays the Lord Chancellor, in the House of Lords, will state the course which Her Majesty's Government intend to take with regard to the Judicature Act of 1873.

CRIMINAL LAW—THE CONVICT PRISON AT GIBRALTAR. QUESTION.

MR. LOWE asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether there is now in the convict prisons of England room for the penal servitude convicts confined in the prison at Gibraltar; whether Her Majesty's Government proposes to abide by the decision arrived at by the late Government to abolish this prison as soon as sufficient accommodation could be provided in the English prisons; and, whether if this decision be set aside, the change is due to more favourable reports of the condition and discipline of the prisons at Gibraltar?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, there was now room enough in the public prison to accommodate the convicts at Gibraltar. No convicts had been sent from England to Gibraltar since the winter of 1871; the prisoners at present confined there would as soon as convenient be brought home, and the prison at Gibraltar would be closed. Should it be found absolutely necessary to employ convict labour at Gibraltar, wholly new arrangements would have to be made; but no step would be taken in that direction until after full inquiry into the whole subject.

NAVY—IRONCLAD SHIPS.—QUESTION.

SIR JOHN HAY asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, If he proposes to remove the names of the ironclad ships which he has stated to be unfit for sea service and not worth repair from the list of the steamships and vessels of the Royal Navy in the Navy List, &c. to a list of vessels for Harbour Service; and, if he will state to the House the names of the ships in question?

MR. HUNT, in reply, said, that there would shortly be a new classification of the Navy List, and the iron-clad vessels which would be placed on the list for harbour service would be the Lord Clyde, the Royal Oak, the Prince Consort, the Caledonia, the Zealous, the Ocean, and the Enterprise.

ARMY—DISTINGUISHED SERVICE MAJORS.—QUESTION.

SIR CHARLES RUSSELL asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether he has been able to consider the claims advanced by the Distinguished Service Majors; and, if so, whether he is in a position to state how he proposes to deal with them?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY, in reply, said, that their case would be referred to the Promotion and Retirement Commission.

THE REVISED STATUTES.—QUESTION.

MR. ARTHUR MILLS asked the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether there will be any objection to authorise the supply of copies of the Revised Statutes, published by the Statute Law

Committee, to Members who may apply for them, in the same manner as the Journals of the House are now supplied?

MR. W. H. SMITH, in reply, said, that, as the Revised Statutes were printed by Messrs. Eyre and Spottiswoode, at their own expense and risk, he was not prepared to authorize the supply of copies to Members who might apply for them.

THE INDIAN MUSEUM, SOUTH KENSINGTON.—QUESTION.

MR. FAWCETT asked the Under Secretary of State for India, What steps have been taken to establish an Indian Museum in London; whether the arrangements which have been adopted, or are contemplated, will throw any charge on the revenues of India; and, whether, if there have been any Minutes on the subject by Members of the Council of the Secretary of State, he has any objection to lay these Minutes on the Table of the House?

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: Sir, an Indian Museum has existed in London for 75 years, having been established by the East India Company in 1800. It has been enriched by the collections of many Orientalists, and was removed from the East India House to Fife House, and thence to an upper floor of the India Office. The space there allotted to it was, however, insufficient to display the articles, and, the room being urgently required for other purposes, it was in 1874 determined to remove the Museum for three years to South Kensington, rather than incur the expense of erecting a new building. The Department of the Reporter on Indian Products, who is also Director of the Museum, having also been found quite inadequate to meet the constant demands for information made by the Government of India, it was determined at the same time to increase the strength of the establishment under him. This, however, is only a temporary arrangement for three years. The expenditure thus incurred will throw an additional charge upon the revenues of India; but the cessation of annual exhibitions, in which India has borne a part, affords a saving more than equivalent. The present arrangement is temporary. As soon as any permanent decision is arrived at, I shall be very glad to give my hon. Friend any Papers or Minutes written by Members of Council; but I do not think at present it would be advisable, pending such decision, to lay Papers upon the Table of the House necessarily inadequate and incomplete.

NAVY—H.M.S. "DEVASTATION."

QUESTION.

MR. BENTINCK asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether there is any truth in a report that Her Majesty's ship "Devastation" is about to be sent to the Mediterranean?

MR. HUNT, in reply, said, it was intended to send the Devastation to Malta next month attended by the Hercules.

ARMY—MILITIA ADJUTANTS.

QUESTION.

MR. W. PRICE asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether militia adjutants who signify their acceptance of the proposed retiring pension scheme before the 1st of July next, will be compulsorily retired on and from that date, or whether their services will be required for any further period; in the latter case, whether such service will count towards pension?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY, in reply, said, the proposal at present was that those Militia adjutants who agreed to accept the retiring pension scheme on the 1st of July next would not be compulsorily retired, but would be allowed to complete this year's training of the regiment, nor would they be compulsorily retired afterwards as long as their services were required. Such prolonged time would count towards their pensions. He thought, however, the best plan would be to extend the time from the 1st of July to the 1st of October, which would cover the time of training. Some Militia adjutants, he was informed, thought some slur was cast upon them by the proposal for their retirement; but this idea was quite a mistaken one.

ROUMANIA—THE OUTRAGE ON MR. AND MRS. DODSHAM.—QUESTION.

MR. PEASE asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether the attention of Her Majesty's Government has been called to the case of Mr.

and Mrs. Dodsham, who were attacked by a gang of brigands near Galatz on Sunday the 7th February; and, what steps Her Majesty's Government have taken in reference to this outrage? He might say that he had lately obtained information which had satisfied him that the accounts in the newspapers were not exaggerated.

MR. BOURKE, in reply, said, that he was not surprised at the Question, for it was impossible to describe in too strong terms the barbarity and gross cruelty of the outrage. As soon as information respecting the outrage reached the Foreign Office instructions were sent to the British Consul in Roumania to urge the Government to bring the perpetrators of the outrage to justice as soon as possible.

CRIMINAL LAW—EXPENSES OF CRIMINAL PROSECUTIONS. QUESTION.

MR. PAGET asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether Her Majesty's Government are prepared to take any steps to obviate the inconveniences connected with the present system of disallowances of expenses of criminal prosecutions?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, this matter had been under the consideration of the late and of the present Government for some time, and his hon. Friend the Secretary of the Treasury would in the course of a few days lay upon the Table a Treasury Minute that would dispose of the subject in a manner satisfactory to the country. The evils now complained of were very serious. With regard to prosecutions at sessions, the expenses, after being taxed by the local officer, were taxed again in London, so that it was not in the power of the local authority to recoup itself for any money which might have been wrongly paid. To remedy this state of things it would be proposed that a sum should be paid on the average of sessional prosecutions. With regard to cases tried at the Assizes, the grievance was still greater, for there was no county officer to tax the costs which were retaxed afterwards in London. Thus though the county had no control in the matter, it had to pay anything which might have been wrongly allowed. It was intended to remove this injustice to local jurisdictions.

PALACE OF WESTMINSTER—THE FRESCOES.—QUESTION.

MR. ERRINGTON asked the First Commissioner of Works, Whether, considering how successful the treatment of Mr. Richmond, R.A., has been in preserving the frescoes by Maclise in the Royal Gallery from the destruction which threatened them, he will avail himself of the advice and services of the same distinguished artist and of his colleagues on the late Committee of Inquiry, to arrest the decay of such of the other frescoes as are not already too far gone?

LORD HENRY LENNOX: Sir, the only frescoes that require examination or show decay are those in the upper waiting hall, and also the four that are in the House of Lords. Since last Session, and on the representation of the hon. Member for Peterborough (Mr. Hankey), I arranged that Mr. Cope should restore his frescoes in the Lords' Gallery, and they have since been glazed. It is my intention to consult with my noble Friend (Lord Hardinge) and the Members of that distinguished Assembly as to what steps should be taken next, and I hope to state the result after Easter, when the Estimates of my Department are before the House.

MERCHANT SHIPPING ACTS—UNSEA- WORTHY SHIPS.—QUESTIONS.

MR. PLIMSOLL asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether his attention has been called to the fact that the "Marquis of Lorne" sailed from Glasgow recently so loaded that she had only 2 feet 2½ inches of side (her depth of hold being 17 feet 2-tenths), although she had the dangers of the Bay of Biscay to encounter; to the case of the "Arthur," also from Glasgow, having a depth of hold of 17 feet 3 inches with a freeboard of only 2 feet 6 inches on the port side, and 2 feet 1 inch on the starboard, she also having to cross the Bay of Biscay; and to the case of the "Dania," which sailed from Shields for Malta with a depth of hold of 16 feet 3 inches, and a clear side of 14 inches only on the port side, and of 3 feet 1 inch on the starboard; and, whether any steps were taken by the Board of Trade to prevent the sailing of these ships in this condition?

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY: Sir, the freeboard of the Marquis of Lorne was as stated in the Question; but the length of the poop and forecastle added so materially to the buoyancy of the ship that it was not considered right to stop her. The draught of water as shown by these Returns, which are communicated to the hon. Member, taken alone, is a very imperfect and misleading test of seaworthy loading. To stop a ship on that test alone would be unjust, mischievous, and leading to costly reversal. The principal surveyors of the Board of Trade are at this moment on a circuit with a view of establishing a practice on which the Board of Trade may satisfactorily act in this difficult question of overloading. In the case of the Arthur the ship was stopped by the Board of Trade and lightened of 130 tons of cargo. In the case of the Dania the information arrived by telegram on a Saturday night, and was received too late to be acted upon, even if desirable. The question is one of list; the mean of the two freeboards would be sufficient, if after starting the ship was trimmed.

MR. PLIMSOLL asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether a case has recently come to his knowledge in which a shipowner discharged a captain of a ship for refusing to take her to sea without some means were adopted to prevent her cargo from shifting, on the ground that she would inevitably founder if he did, she being loaded in bulk with Indian corn; whether the owner did not thereupon engage another captain, and insist upon sending the ship to sea, which subsequently foundered with all hands; and, whether he will order a prosecution of the shipowner under section 11 of the Merchant Shipping Act of 1873?

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY: Sir, I gather from the Question that I know the case referred to, though it is not named; and, if I am right, the case has been under investigation at Greenwich, and the result is to disprove the rumour as stated in the Question. The ship capsized, as is known from the captain and other survivors, and the Report of the inquiry will be published shortly.

Mr. Plimsoll

MILITARY KNIGHTS OF WINDSOR.

QUESTION.

COLONEL NORTH asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If he will take into his consideration the possibility of reducing the heavy fees now paid by the Military Knights of Windsor upon their appointment, and a similar fee upon their removal from the Lower Foundation to the Royal Foundation?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: It is true, Sir, that the fees have hitherto been very excessive. A great number of forms and ceremonies have been gone through; and the fees payable by these poor persons have been £4 7s. 6d. on their original appointment, and £4 7s. 6d. on their promotion to the Upper Foundation. This subject has been under the consideration of the Government for some time, and I am happy to state that an arrangement has now been come to by which the mode of appointment has been much simplified, and the fees will not amount to more than 30s. on the original appointment, and 30s. on promotion. Through the kindness of the present Chancellor of the Order and his Secretary they make no objection to this arrangement coming into force at once, during the lifetime of the persons entitled to these fees.

EDUCATION DEPARTMENT (ENGLAND)—THE REVISED CODE, 1875.

QUESTION.

MR. SALT asked the Vice President of the Council, Whether he will reconsider the terms of Clause 115 in the New Code, so as to secure that scholars shall pass in the three subjects in the standard prescribed under the various Acts for regulating the education of children employed in labour; and, whether he will more clearly define the words "prescribed by the Act," so as to include all regulations, whether Parliamentary or Departmental, relating thereto?

VISCOUNT SANDON: Sir, in answer to the Question of my hon. Friend, I beg to say that the provision of the New Code, by which certificates under the various Acts for regulating the education of children employed in labour would be granted to children who passed in two out of the three subject, of the standard prescribed by or under those Acts, was inserted solely for administrative reasons connected with the examination of these scholars. As the House is aware, if a child fails to pass in only one of the three subjects he will have to be presented next time in a higher standard, and hence considerable difficulty arose as to meeting the case of children who failed to pass in one of the subjects in the Standard, on the passing which they could no longer by law be kept in school, and who still, on being re-examined, would have to be presented under a higher Standard than the various Acts prescribed. I have never, however, been satisfied with our solution of the difficulty in this year's Code, as I think it was the intention of Parliament that when a child was compelled by law to pass a certain Standard he should have acquired that knowledge of all the three subjects—reading, writing, and arithmetic—which the standard prescribed, whether 3rd, 4th, 5th, or 6th, implies. We have again given the subject careful consideration, and I am happy to say that we see our way to getting over the difficulty by means of the various arrangements for examination which we have made in the New Code to meet the requirements of the Labour Acts. We shall, therefore, alter the wording of Clause 115, so as to secure that children must pass in the three subjects of the prescribed Standards before receiving a certificate under these Acts. I may mention, however, that we had a precedent for our former arrangement in the provisions of the Scotch Education Act of 1872, passed by the late Government, and which I suppose would be considered by them as the crowning work of the most advanced educationists, whereby a child is only required to read and write to enable him to claim exemption from compulsory attendance at school upon going to work. As to my hon. Friend's second Question, I will take care that such verbal amendment is introduced as to make it quite clear that the Standards alluded to are all those in any way prescribed under the various Acts; and I hope shortly to lay upon the Table these alterations of the Code, together with a few others which will be chiefly based on the valuable suggestions thrown out in the debate upon the Code by Gentlemen of knowledge in these matters on both sides of the House, and which, I have reason to believe, will be generally acceptable to the country.

REGIMENTAL EXCHANGES BILL.

QUESTION.

MR. CHILDERS: I wish, Sir, to ask the Secretary of State for War a Question, of which I have given him private Notice, Whether it is intended, under the Regimental Exchanges Bill, that a field officer permitted to exchange should serve for the remainder of his original term of five years, or for the remainder of the term of the officer with whom he exchanges?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: Sir, under the existing system of exchange precisely the same question would arise as under the Regimental Exchanges Bill, should it become law. No alteration whatever is made by the Bill in respect to it; and under the present Royal Warrant and Regulations there is no prohibition on the exchange of field officers. Exchanges in such cases, if sanctioned, would in no way interfere with the original position of either officer as regards the tenure of his appointment as field officer. Each would carry his own liabilities.

THE NEW FOREST SHAKERS—CASE OF MISS WOOD.—QUESTION.

MR. DILLWYN asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether the attention of the Government has been called to the re-arrest of Miss Wood, a member of the Shaker community, and whether they considered that the fact that she was arrested, set at liberty, and re-arrested within a few hours, was in accordance with the law?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: Sir, I am glad to have the opportunity of making some explanation as to the re-arrest of Miss Wood, because out-of-doors the case seems to have been misapprehended. There has been no interference on the part of any one in order to secure her release. Miss Wood was put into confinement on the report of certain medical persons. When the medical certificate was examined in the first instance it was found defective. It was therefore sent back with the request that it might be amended in accordance with the statute, and in the course of time an amended certificate came. That amended certificate was also found defective, and thereupon Miss Wood was discharged. Afterwards certain other medical men examined Miss Wood and signed a strong certificate as to her insanity, and under that certificate, as to the validity of which there is no dispute, she is still confined. But the attention of the Commissioners in Lunacy has been specially called to her case, and I am promised that a report respecting it will be made in a few days. As to the question whether I considered the law which authorized her re-arrest satisfactory, I should like to reserve my opinion.

(Mr. Ascheton Cross, Mr. Selater-Booth, Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson.)

COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."—(Mr. Ascheton Cross.)

MR. MUNTZ, who had the following Notice of Motion on the Paper :—

"That it is expedient to make such provisions in the Bill as would allow purchasers or lessees of areas referred to in Clauses 5 and 7 to provide accommodation for persons of the working classes to be displaced in such areas, in such places other than the areas as might after due investigation be sanctioned by the local authorities," said, that he would not proceed with the Resolution, as the subject might be better discussed in Committee.

MR. CAWLEY moved, as an Amendment, that the Bill be referred to a Select Committee. He said, when the Bill was read a second time, a very short time had elapsed since the Bill was introduced, and many Members had not had an opportunity of examining its provisions. It was a measure free from all Party considerations, but was one of great importance, inasmuch as it deeply affected not only those specially mentioned in it, but, he might say, all classes of the community. It involved the health of all large towns, and indirectly the moral condition of the lower portion of the population. He proposed the Amendment from a conviction that it would be impossible to bring the Bill into a workable shape, and make it harmonize with the existing law, unless it was submitted to a Select Committee. The Bill, according to the Preamble, sought to do two things—first, it provided for the removal of dwellings which had been proved to be injurious to health; and, secondly, it declared it to be expedient that provision should be made for erecting suitable dwellings for the working classes thus displaced. Whether such a course as the latter was expedient could not be fully discussed in this House; and, in his opinion, the Bill, as it was drawn, failed to carry out what it recited in the Preamble to be expedient. Before passing on to what the Bill could accomplish, it was highly desirable to bear in mind what could be done under the existing law, for nothing could create greater confusion than the re-enacting of laws to do that which there was power to do already. As far as related to the removal of unhealthy dwellings and their improvement, ample powers were given by the Act of 1868—Torrens's Act—and he could not see the utility of ignoring that Act in the framing of this Bill. It was quite true the Act of 1868 contained no powers for the erection by the local authorities of dwellings in the room of those that were pulled down; but whether that should be done was a point which must be thoroughly discussed at some period or other. While the Preamble recited that it was expedient to erect dwellings for the artizan class in the place of those that might be removed, the only provision in the Bill on that subject was of a negative character—namely, that the local authorities should not themselves do so without the consent of the Local Government Board. But nothing could be more unfortunate and mischievous than to permit local authorities to become proprietors of dwellings for the working classes in competition with private owners. Either there would be just complaints from private owners that the local authorities were letting dwellings built out of the rates at rents unfairly low, or artizans would raise an outcry that the local authorities were not doing that which the Legislature intended they should do. Now, he held that Parliament should not assist the artizan class out of the rates unless it was dealing with them as paupers. He asked the House whether the provisions in this Bill as to these restrictions being simply subject to the approval of a Government Department would be efficient and satisfactory in their working. If such restrictions were to be adopted they should be laid down by Parliament itself. That was one reason why he thought the Bill should go to a Select Committee. Besides this, the House was aware that in 1872 an Act was passed, called the Public Health Act, combining all the Acts applicable to sanitary purposes under one title. Although the Artizans Dwellings Act, 1868, was one of the Sanitary Acts, it was not one of those included in the Consolidation Bill which had been laid on the Table. It would, therefore, remain in force, along with that which they were now discussing, in all towns and boroughs with more than 25,000 inhabitants. He could not think that a good specimen of consolidation. With the single exception of the special power of expending public money in the erection of these dwellings, he did not see anything in this Bill which could not properly be incorporated by small amendments on the other Sanitary Acts, without encumbering the Statute Book. He could not enter into a discussion of the probable effects of the Bill without remembering one or two painful circumstances. Much had been said about the benefits accruing from the removal of blocks of wretched property in the metropolis and the substitution of those valuable institutions—dwellings for the working classes. He rejoiced that such buildings had been erected; but let them not delude themselves by supposing that these superior buildings were occupied by the same class as those who inhabited the destroyed property. The reports of those new dwellings, satisfactory as they were, showed that they were occupied by a more respectable, industrious working population. Therefore, as regarded the displaced class—the most wretched, degraded, and unfortunate part of the population—these buildings left the sanitary question untouched. He did not expect this Bill would deal with that class. Either from dissolute habits or otherwise, they were unable to pay the rents charged for the new dwellings, and they were obliged to seek their residence elsewhere, as best they could. Indeed, they were little more than half paupers, and would have to be dealt with as such. What such a measure as the present should do was to give the local authorities full power to lay down restrictions for securing open streets, properly constructed houses, and sufficient ventilation; and also to remove structures which were injurious to health. The evils now existing might be traced in a large number of instances to a simple cause—to the individual owner of property dealing with it as he pleased, regardless of the consequences to his neighbours. The borough he had the honour to represent (Salford) had statutory powers with reference to the arrangement of dwellings and for securing free ventilation superior to almost any other in the Kingdom. If these powers were possessed and carried into effect in all towns, very beneficial results would arise in the future. He attached great importance to their having decisive evidence as to unhealthy districts, without being left to mere opinion on the report of a medical officer. This could be accomplished, as it had been in Salford, by ceasing to rely exclusively on the average death rates for a whole community furnished by the Registrar General and obtaining the death rates for small local areas. In this way it was shown in Salford that, while the average was 26 or 28 per 1,000, there were small areas in which it was 50, 60, or 70, while there were suburban areas in which it was 17 or 18. He was anxious to see some provision made whereby it should be compulsory on the local authorities to have the death rate in the different localities published regularly, believing, as he did, that if it were once made clear to the public that such deadly places existed at their doors, means would speedily be taken to cure the evil. In that way more good would be done probably than could be effected by the provisions of this Bill. With respect to the medical officers, he did not like the way in which the Bill was drawn, because it imposed on them certain duties which already obviously belonged to them, and in that respect would rather afford them an excuse for neglecting their duties in other cases to which their attention was not directed. As to how far this Bill was likely to have practical effect, it was, in the first place, dependent on the action of the local authorities who were so fenced around that they would be able readily to find abundant excuses for not incurring the necessary expenditure. There were under this Bill various conditions precedent, which, in the majority of cases, would furnish the local authorities with excuses for doing nothing at all. Then, it was not a mere question of increased death rate that was to be the ground for action on the part of the medical officers, but the prevalence of certain diseases, indicating a low condition of public health; but at present we tolerated an extent of disease which would alarm us if it were epidemic instead of being constant. Further, after the medical officer had made his report, there were again certain conditions precedent to action on the part of the local authorities, who, among other things, must be satisfied of the advantage that would accrue to the district from the application of the remedy. With regard to the improvement scheme which the local authority was to provide, he was at a loss to know exactly what was included in that scheme. As it stood in the Bill, it would be almost if not quite impracticable in the great majority of cases. The question of providing for persons displaced by the pulling down of houses suitable dwellings within a given area or district involved serious difficulties, which were only partially met by the way in which it was proposed to amend that part of the Bill. The hon. Member was proceeding to comment minutely on the clauses of the Bill, when—

Mr. SPEAKER said, that the hon. Member was going through the Bill clause by clause, as well as various Amendments to those clauses which were upon the Paper, and which would at the proper time come under consideration in Committee. The hon. Member was quite at liberty to discuss the main provisions of the Bill, but not to proceed in detail through the clauses.

Mr. CAWLEY begged pardon for being out of Order. He was sorry to be guilty of transgressing the Rules of the House; his object was not to discuss the Bill clause by clause, but to show that, according to its general principles, it was impossible to carry out its main provisions, and should therefore be referred for consideration to a Select Committee. In discussing the principle of the measure he wished to refer only to clauses involving that principle. When the clauses were taken together, the effect of the Bill was to seek to stereotype for ever the class of buildings which were to be built upon the land acquired for the purposes of the Act.

Mr. Cawley

When the clauses were read in connection with the Schedule the Bill went further, and not only sought to stereotype the use of the land for all time to come, but sought to do that in such a way as to deprive the owner of the property which existed now of the value that property might have, irrespective of the buildings that were upon them. Dealing with this as a general question, he ventured to suggest that nothing could be more unfortunate or mischievous than to attempt to stereotype a class of property in any particular part of our large towns. The owners, as the Bill now stood, were to be paid for the land according to the value of the property that was found upon it, regardless of the value of the ground as a site. If property of this kind was to be dealt with, it must be left subject to the operation of the laws of supply and demand hereafter. The Bill as it stood, and even as it was proposed to be amended, would prevent the owners of property in many cases from realizing the full value of their property, and prevent the development of commercial enterprise within important localities in the heart of our large towns. That part of the measure, therefore, ought not, he thought, to be allowed to pass. With reference to the Schedule, it was an amendment of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act. It was, in fact, another Bill, containing as it did 33 clauses, while the Bill itself contained only 22. It was wrong in principle, in making that amendment applicable only to property taken from a particular class; and, apart from that, he maintained that whatever amendments might be required in the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act ought to be made not in this way but in a separate amending Bill, applicable to all cases where land was taken compulsorily. The method adopted in this Bill would be mischievous and unsatisfactory, and make the cost of acquiring property more expensive than at present. For these reasons, he would move that the Bill be committed to a Select Committee.

SIR THOMAS BAZLEY said, he had great pleasure in seconding the Motion of his hon. Friend the Member for Salford. He believed the tendency of the Bill was to give greater compensation to the owners of household property than they now received, and to raise the rents on the occupants of their houses. Some change, no doubt, was required to be made; but he submitted that it ought to be at the expense of the owners of property, and not on the local authorities of a neighbourhood where it came into operation. He also believed that provision ought to be made for the conveyance of land at a more reasonable cost to purchasers, and without those heavy bills of costs to which they were now subject. For these and other reasons he thought it was desirable that it should be referred to the consideration of a Select Committee. For his own part he believed, however, that the working classes had among themselves better means and greater facilities for carrying out the system than the means proposed by this Bill. Some 10 years ago a building and investment club was formed in Manchester called "The Queen's Society," and as he became an honorary member, and subsequently President, he wrote to the secretary a few days since to give him some information of what had been done. Well, the answer he received was this. The deposits of the club in bank amounted, in round numbers, to £4,000,000 sterling, and 5,000 dwelling-houses were erected capable of accommodating 30,000 people. If such valuable results could be obtained by workmen themselves, what, he asked, was the use of such a Bill as the present? He could only say to the working classes of other parts of the country, "Go thou and do likewise." As the present Bill stood, he submitted that it ought to be referred to a Select Committee.

Amendment proposed, to leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "the Bill be committed to a Select Committee," — (Mr. Cawley,) — instead thereof.

MR. GOLDNEY said, that with reference to the last observation of the hon. Member for Manchester, the object of this Bill was to enable him to say to parties who were desirous of building houses, "Go and do likewise." The difficulty was that courts and streets prejudicial to health belonged to owners who would not allow them to be removed; and the present Bill was introduced with the object of overcoming that difficulty. He hoped the House would not approve the Motion, for if ever he had read a Bill simple in its character and well drawn, and proper for the House to deal with in Committee of the Whole House, it was the Bill now under consideration. Its principles and objects were contained in eight short clauses, three of which were explanatory; while the larger portion of the Bill dealt only with the machinery of arbitration. The hon. Member for Salford (Mr. Cawley) objected as to the ground on which public bodies should act, and did not seem to think that sickness and disease were the necessary ingredients to set a public body in motion. The object was to meet a general complaint which existed throughout the whole country, that unless some further provision was given to the local authorities for the purpose of removing buildings unfit for human habitation we should never get rid of the existing evil. Everything was provided for securing to the owners of property the fair marketable value of the land; and whether they were to build the cottages on precisely the same areas or not was a matter of simple detail. What the Bill provided was that where there were several owners, such as a freeholder, a lessee, and a sub-lessee, the local authorities should have the power of putting their finger upon a fever spot when it had been found so by the medical officer, with the object of getting rid of it. He trusted the House would see the necessity of dealing with a measure of this sort in the ordinary course.

MR. FAWCETT, in venturing to point out some of the shortcomings of this Bill, trusted the House would do him the justice to suppose that he was no less anxious than any one else that all should be done which could be done to improve the dwellings of the people of this country. What he particularly alleged against this Bill was that its operation would be so cumbrous, costly, and complicated that it would prove inoperative. It might be said that if the Bill should prove inoperative no harm would be done; but he entered an emphatic protest against the policy of passing inoperative Acts of Parliament. If a strong Government, supported by a large majority, should pass a law which did nothing towards improving the dwellings of the people, the inevitable effect would be to cause heavy discouragement to all future efforts and to give an impression that the question was beyond Parliamentary control. But he took a strong preliminary objection to the scope of the Bill. It was entitled the Artizans Dwellings Bill, and he called that class legislation. Why should the artizans of this country, more than any other section of the community, require Parliamentary protection? Artizans were independent, and could take care of themselves just as well as any other class. But the fact was that the title was vicious and misleading, because the artizans with whom it was proposed to deal were not those who dwelt in the metropolis or in any of our large towns; and it was to be regretted that throughout the Bill the words "working classes" were forever cropping up. They occurred even in the Preamble, and, in his opinion, most wrongly; for, was it not just as much a duty to provide a dwelling for a poor clerk or for the widow of a small tradesman as for a member of the working class? Why should that special favour be shown to the working class? He thought that differentiating of a class and singling it out for special favour was a course that was fraught with the utmost peril, as it would encourage among persons of that class the idea that their interests were more worthy of the attention of Parliament than were the concerns and welfare of any other section of the community. Two exceptions contained in the Bill, he might add, appeared to him to be absolutely indefensible. How was the City of London excluded? It was very ingeniously brought into the first clause, but farther on it was provided that the expense of carrying out the Bill should be borne by the Metropolitan Board of Works, which should levy a general rate for the purpose, but that to that rate the City of London should not contribute. They knew, therefore, that the scheme would not be carried out in the City, and therefore the City would not contribute towards the expenses; but could it be said that the persons who lived by the thousand industries carried on in the City, and who were displaced by occasional clearances and improvements, were not just as well entitled to consideration as others who lived in different parts of the metropolis? And again, he was at a loss to know why the Bill stopped short at a population of 25,000. An Act of a similar kind was passed in 1868, which went as low as a population of 10,000. Let them see what would happen under the Bill as it stood. Suppose a town with a population of 30,000, so as to come under the Bill, and contiguous to it another town with a population of 10,000, or village, as it would be termed in the north. Portions of the larger town being pulled down, the persons dislodged would be driven into the small contiguous town or village, and however 'unsatisfactory its condition might be, it would then be made ten times worse, and there was no legislation under the Bill to get over the difficulty. Besides, there would be the extraordinary anomaly that if the provisions of the Bill were carried out in the case of a town of 30,000 inhabitants, and if the Artizans Act of 1868 were put into operation in a neighbouring town with 15,000 inhabitants, the property dealt with in the two places would be removed under two entirely different principles of compensation, thus giving rise to all kinds of confusion, jealousies, and disputes. Now, there was, he contended, no justification for such exclusion as that to which he was referring. The heart-rending descriptions which had been given by the Secretary of State for the Home Department of the state of some of the courts and alleys in our large towns could be paralleled by those in the case of small towns and villages, especially under the operation of the Bill. Did not the right hon. Gentleman recollect how the public had been startled by the accounts which appeared in The Times last autumn as to the dreadful condition of Wiveliscombe? It was curious how anxious Gentlemen opposite seemed to be to remedy the evils in large towns, and how disinclined to do anything for those country districts which one would suppose were their special favourites. The sanitary state of many villages had been described by competent authority as "discreditable, disgraceful, horrible, and unworthy of a civilized and Christian country," while the hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire (Mr. E. Stanhope), now a trusted Member of the Conservative Party, had spoken of the sanitary condition of the villages in Shropshire as simply "infamous." The Bill, he would further observe, might be divided into two portions, to be carried out on two principles which were confused, costly, and complicated. The first portion referred to the clearing of unhealthy areas; the second to the appropriation of those areas when cleared. The former would, in his opinion, lead to such enormous expense that it would prevent the Bill from being carried into effect. When an area was condemned, and the houses were to be cleared, the owners of the property would have to be compensated, and what was the principle of compensation adopted? Under the Act of 1868, which was now in force, if a house was condemned as being unfit for human habitation, the owner was punished by receiving for it the minimum rate of compensation; but under this Bill, when a house was condemned, the owner was to be compensated on a principle which would give him the very amount that he could realize. The Bill said that the owner of a house must be compensated at the market price of his property, and he was informed by competent authorities that in calculating the market price, an element which they would have to take into consideration would be the income which the house was yielding at the present time. Now, it was perfectly notorious that the more disgraceful, the more overcrowded, and the more deficient was the state of many of these houses, the larger was the income they yielded; and the ratepayers would therefore see their money lavishly paid to owners who had allowed their property to fall into such a condition that it had to be condemned as unfit for human habitation. He was told that ominous rumours were spreading of the purchase of this class of property by house speculators in the expectation of getting large compensation under this Bill. Fifteen ratepayers, and therefore 15 owners of these tumble-down habitations could set in operation this Act, under which their property would be bought at the full market price by the local authorities. He believed that if the right hon. Gentleman would consult the local authorities, he would receive from them but one opinion—that the principle of compensation adopted in the Bill involved so much cost as to make it highly probable that it would produce but little beneficial effect. When hon. Gentlemen opposite sat on his side of the House, they said again and again that they stood firm to the principle that no new charge whatever should be thrown on the rates until the incidence of local taxation was revised, and the system of local government was improved. He was afraid it would be found that strong declarations of the Party opposite, now that they were in power, would become as evanescent as the snow flakes that fell in a river. He wished the House to consider what would be the nature of the charge made on the ratepayers. The ground-rents of the new buildings would be equal to those of the old buildings, plus their annual value, plus the charge of bringing them into use, and plus the cost of arbitration, if the prices offered should be unsatisfactory. But, after all, the new buildings or the new sites might not be taken, and then the whole scheme would be inoperative. The money required was to be raised by loans, repayable, both principal and interest, in a fixed period of years. Supposing, therefore, the period was 21 years, the entire charge would fall on the leaseholder, while the owner, who had not contributed a penny, would reap the benefit by the improvement of the locality. Surely that would be a great injustice? All experience showed that if they cleared, for example, the courts and alleys of Drury Lane, and erected workmen's houses there, the new buildings would be tenanted by altogether a different class from those who had been displaced. He wished, further, to notice an extraordinary hiatus in the Bill. Clause 7 said the local authorities might sell or lease the land when cleared for the carrying out of the scheme of private individuals, or they might sell or lease it for the same purpose to a body of trustees; or, thirdly, they might, with the consent of the Government, carry out the scheme themselves. But supposing it cost £100,000 an acre to obtain and clear the land, and nobody was prepared to offer more than £10,000 an acre for it shackled by the proposed conditions as to rebuilding, and supposing the local authorities did not feel justified in accepting the £10,000, what then became of the scheme, and who was to carry it out? As the Bill stood, there was no security that the land, when cleared, would not lie perfectly idle, and nothing more be done. The Amendment to be proposed by the hon. Member for Maidstone (Sir Sydney Waterlow) confirmed that view; because its effect was, that if at the end of three years the scheme had not been carried out, then the land should be sold in the open market, without any condition at all as to the scheme. There were three courses, any one of which might be adopted by the Home Secretary. If the local authority was not prepared to carry out a scheme of improvement, the land might be sold to a private individual on the condition that the scheme should be carried out; secondly, that when the ground was cleared, they should sell it for any purpose which would procure the highest price, so long as that purpose was not opposed to the health of the community, and provide in some other locality residences equal to the number of those who had been displaced; and, thirdly, the land which was cleared, might be sold for whatever purpose the circumstances of the neighbourhood rendered it most suitable, and the erection of new houses might be left to be decided by the ordinary considerations of supply and demand. He hoped that before going into Committee the Home Secretary would state distinctly which of these courses he proposed to adopt. If the hon. Member for Salford (Mr. Cawley) pressed his Motion to a division, he (Mr. Fawcett) would vote with him, although he did not know where they would find five Members to sit upon it, the House having apparently gone "Select Committee mad," and every Member seeming to be engaged on one or more Select Committees. It was obvious that very little progress would be made with this Bill before Easter. The Notice Paper was crowded with Amendments, some of them to be proposed by the Home Secretary himself, and he (Mr. Fawcett) believed that it would greatly facilitate the progress of the Bill if the right hon. Gentleman committed it to-night pro forma, and reprinted it with the Amendments which he proposed to make.

SIR SYDNEY WATERLOW observed, with regard to the hon. Gentleman's (Mr. Fawcett's) objection to the Bill, on the ground of the enormous expense to the ratepayers which it would entail, that the Company with which he (Sir Sydney Waterlow) was connected had carried out six or seven schemes which would prove that what at first appeared to be a great loss to the ratepayers would by the time the Bill came into operation become a large gain to them. The first scheme to which he would refer was one of two in the large parish of St. Pancras. It provided 104 new dwellings. The old assessment was £125; the assessment on the new buildings was £950, and the net annual increase to the rates, and therefore to the pockets of the ratepayers, was £205, whilst the ground rent of the property was only £60. Again, 140 new tenements had been erected close to King's Cross (Metropolitan) Station. The assessment of the old dwellings was £340, producing a rate of £85 per year; the new assessment was £1,141, producing a rate of £360 a-year, being an annual increase of £275. The ground rent was £135 a-year. In Westminster 135 dwellings had been erected, and the annual increase to the rates was £226, the ground rent being only £120. In the parish of St. Matthew's, Bethnal Green, 112 tenements were erected, and the annual increase of the rates was £182, the ground rent being only £50. It thus appeared that the local authorities would get, in the shape of new rates, a sum which would more than cover the interest which they would have to pay on the money they borrowed. The hon. Member for Brighton complained that the Bill did not apply to villages and small towns. He agreed with all that the hon. Member had said as to the state of cottages in villages and small towns, and he hoped that, if this Bill were passed, the Government would bring in a Bill next year dealing with the evil of overcrowding in small towns and agricultural districts. He hoped that hon. Gentlemen on both sides of the House would feel that they ought to go into Committee on this Bill. The evils which called for remedy were disgraceful to the nation and to Parliament, who had a general charge of the nation's affairs.

MR. GREGORY said, that the main object of the Bill was the abatement of the fever-haunted dwellings which were unfit for human habitation in the metropolis and in other large towns, and to provide for the erection of other more suitable houses in their stead. Considering the encumbered position in which property of this miserable description usually was, it would be impossible to carry out the objects he had indicated without some such measure as this, which he believed would be effectual for the purpose in view. The Artizans Dwellings Act of 1868, although good as far as it went, was too limited in its operation to be effective, and did not afford the facilities which were required for dealing with the interests outstanding between the reversioner and the original lesser of properties, which were to be taken for the purposes contemplated. The hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett), in calculating the market value of the property to be taken, had assumed that that value would be based on the amount of the annual income of the property; but there was a fallacy in that assumption, inasmuch as the market value of property of this description depended rather upon the security of the income and upon the trouble, risk, and expense of collecting it than upon the mere gross produce of the House. A good, well-established property in the City of London might be worth 25 to 30 years' purchase; but property of the wretched description that would be taken under this Bill might not be worth more than five or six years' purchase. In his opinion, the Bill afforded ample security for the improvement scheme being carried out, in the case of any property being acquired under its provisions. He trusted that it would not be referred to a Select Committee, but that the House would at once proceed to consider it in Committee.

Mr. GIBSON looked upon the measure as most admirable, and as being calculated to deal in a practical manner with a very extensive evil. He had submitted the Bill to the Dublin Sanitary Association, and to the King and Queen's Society of Physicians in Dublin, with the result that both those bodies had sent to him for presentation to that House Petitions in favour of the provisions of the measure being extended to Ireland. The hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett) had committed an extraordinary mistake in saying that the City of London was excluded from the operation of the Bill. The fact was that in the City the jurisdiction under the measure would be given to the Commissioners of Sewers, while in the rest of the metropolis, exclusive of the City, it would be given to the Metropolitan Board of Works. The argument of the hon. Member for Hackney, as to the result of the limit of population, would apply equally to towns of 5,000 as to towns of 25,000 inhabitants, for if people left the latter and went to smaller towns, because of the application of the Act, surely they might be expected to leave the former and proceed to country villages? For his part, he regarded the scope of the Bill as being more wide and beneficent than that of the Act of 1868. He was glad that the Government had a code furnished by the Irish Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, of the operation of which he had had much experience, and he did not doubt that the Bill would work well and give general satisfaction. He hoped the House would at once go into Committee on it.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE observed, that if the hon. and learned Member for Dublin University (Mr. Gibson) were acquainted with metropolitan government, he would agree with his hon. Friend the Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett) that the City was virtually excluded from the Bill. If the Bill passed it would not, in his opinion, be put into operation in the City, although it was urgently needed there. His own constituents would be called upon to contribute large sums under the measure for the improvement of Drury Lane, for instance, and would have cause to protest strongly against the City being exempted from bearing its share of the expenditure.

Mr. ASSHETON CROSS said, he hoped that the Bill would now be allowed to go into Committee. He would not adopt the course so generously suggested by his hon. Friend the Member for Salford (Mr. Cawley), because he was determined, so far as he was concerned, that the rookeries referred to should be abolished. If they were to send the Bill to a Select Committee in order that the Amendments of his hon. and learned Friend might be considered, it would be better for them at once to proceed to some practical piece of legislation. With respect to the Schedule, it was nothing more nor less than an incorporation with the Bill of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act. That Act had been in operation in Ireland for a very long time, and, as his hon. and learned Friend the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Gibson) had said, worked very effectually. It was also the fact that it worked cheaply and conveniently. The hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett) desired, with all due professions of favour, to strangle the Bill in another way. He suggested that the Amendments should be inserted in Committee pro formâ and the Bill withdrawn till after Easter. He must respectfully decline to adopt that course also, as they were determined that the rookeries should no longer be allowed to exist, that the health of the people should be cared for, and that what they considered the most inexpensive and effectual means of securing those objects should be provided. The hon. Member for Hackney was of opinion that the City of London would be excluded from the operation of the Bill; but he could assure the hon. Member that, as there were places in the City that must be dealt with, so the City would have to spend the funds necessary to deal with them. Then, again, the hon. Member asked why, if the government extended the Act to places of 25,000 inhabitants, they did not make it applicable to country districts in many of which evils existed as great as in the towns. The reason was that Her Majesty's Government were of opinion that a different remedy would be required in those cases, and they were prepared in due time to apply the remedy which was in their minds. On the part of the Government he declined to apply this remedy, which he believed would work great good in large towns, to small villages, to which it would not be applicable. He believed that if they went into Committee they would be able to make the Bill a really workable measure which would do a great deal of good not only in the metropolis but in the country generally.

MR. CAWLEY said, he would withdraw his Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Main Question, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," put, and agreed to.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

MR. FAWCETT asked whether the hon. Member for Maidstone's Amendments had been placed on the Paper with the consent of the Home Secretary?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, he would discuss the question when they came to it. He had merely suggested to the hon. Member for Maidstone the form in which his Amendments would be fit for discussion.

Clause 1 (Short title of Act).

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, he thought that calling the Bill "The Artizans Dwellings Bill, 1875," would give rise to some misconception. Artizans were a superior class of working people, earning from 30s. to 50s. a week, who were not likely to want these dwellings. The Home Secretary said that the primary object of the Bill was the extirpation of rookeries; and, if so, "The Towns Improvement Bill, 1875," would be a better title. He moved an Amendment, given Notice of by the hon. Member for Hastings (Mr. Kay-Shuttleworth), in page 1, line 28, to leave out "artizans," and insert "workpeople's."

MR. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH considered the title of the Bill rather misleading, and that it ought to be altered. Artizans were, generally, pretty well able to take care of themselves.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS declined to accept the Amendment or the subsequent proposition of the hon. Baronet, on the ground that the Bill was never intended to be a Towns Improvement Bill. Its sole object was to provide better dwellings for a larger class of persons who were now compelled to crowd together in the wretched tenements too commonly found in large towns. He contended that he, as the author of the Bill, had a right to choose what title he pleased for it. He believed that he had selected the proper one.

MR. STANSFELD suggested that the Amendment would make the Bill more consistent.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU observed, that it was entitled a Bill for "facilitating the Improvement of the Dwellings of the Working Classes in Large Towns." If it was intended to build dwellings for the working classes, the name of the Bill ought to be changed, and the words "working classes" ought to be substituted for the word "artizans."

MR. MUNDELLA contended that the artizans, skilled labourers, receiving good wages, were, as a rule, able to take care of themselves. The Bill applied to a poorer and more helpless class, and a more general title would better describe its nature and scope. The right hon. Gentleman said that, as the author of the Bill, he had a right to choose his own title. That might be—although he had always considered that the credit of this measure was due to his hon. Friend the Member for Hastings (Mr. Kay-Shuttleworth)—but he had no right, in his opinion, to choose a misleading one.

MR. GOURLEY supported the Amendment.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, the word “labourers” was used in conjunction with the word “artizans” in an Act passed a few years ago, and he had no objection to amend the clause by inserting the words “and labourers” after “artizans.”

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

PART I.

UNHEALTHY AREAS.

1. Scheme by Local Authority.

Clause 2 (Application of Act to certain districts and description of local authority).

MR. J. COWEN objected that the clause omitted from the operation of the Bill towns which contained less than 25,000 inhabitants, and he moved an Amendment for the purpose of extending the operation of the clause to all urban sanitary districts as defined in the Sanitary Act of 1872.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 7, to leave out from the word “England,” to the words “and the local authority shall be as follows.”—(Mr. Joseph Cowen.)

MR. ASSHETON CROSS admitted that there were houses in towns with a population of 10,000 in quite as bad a condition as those in larger towns; but to such places the same remedies as those proposed in the Bill for large towns were not applicable. For instance, in small towns the land outside was easier to get than in large towns, and if any place wanted to improve, the best plan was to buy the ground and build the houses; but in this Bill they were taking very strong powers—calling on the ratepayers to pull down houses and see that proper dwellings were provided. That was a very costly process at the outset, though it would pay in the long run; but in small towns he thought that by a little extension of the Act of 1868 the same results might be effected.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU, who had an Amendment to the same effect as that of the hon. Member (Mr. Cowen), said, it was not always easy to get land outside a small town for building. For instance, in the case of Folkestone, where he lived, and which might be matched with any town in England for abominable and pestilential holes from which scarlatina and fever were never absent, no land could be obtained. The whole land outside the town belonged to Lord Radnor, and he either could not or would not sell an inch of ground, and would only grant leases for a very short period. Only noble mansions, which were almost palaces, were allowed to be built, and for these a high ground-rent was charged. It was not likely he would give his consent to the building on that land of cottages for the humble working classes. He wished to follow the lines of the Public Health Act of 1872, and give the proposed powers to the authorities in the urban sanitary districts.

MR. SHAW - LEFEVRE said, he thought the Home Secretary meant to meet the case of rural districts to which Torrens's Act did not apply, and this being so, he was inclined to support his proposal to confine the operation of this clause to large towns.

MR. MUNDELLA said, he should be glad if the Home Secretary would extend the operation of the Bill to towns of 10,000 inhabitants. There was something like public spirit in the large towns, and a sense of decency and self-respect which made them take action in the matter; but in the small towns the conditions were altogether different. There was a want of public spirit in them, and the ratepayers were opposed to everything like expenditure. He knew small towns in the Midland Counties, and in Lancashire, which were in a most disgraceful state, and in towns like Over Darwen, the people were dying almost like rotten sheep from the condition in which they lived. He should feel grateful if the Home Secretary could see his way to extending the provisions of the Bill, so as to embrace those smaller towns, and at the same time find some means of making the adoption of the measure compulsory in those districts.

Mr. WHITWELL said, he did not think that the present Bill was applicable to the smaller towns; but he was glad to hear the Home Secretary say that he intended to deal separately with small towns according to their respective merits. With power to take land by compulsion, the case of these smaller towns would be better met in a separate Bill.

COLONEL BERESFORD referred to the unsanitary condition of some portions of Southwark, and thought, from the way in which he had spoken, that the hon. Member for Sheffield (Mr. Mundella) must be profoundly ignorant of London.

SIR ANDREW LUSK said, he thought the people in small towns were not so badly off for air and comfort as the inhabitants of large towns. We ought to begin with the latter, and not put too much pressure at the first upon the public.

Mr. GOURLEY expressed a hope that the hon. Member for Newcastle (Mr. Cowen) would take the sense of the Committee on his Amendment. There was quite as much necessity for the improvement of the dwellings of the working classes in the rural districts as in our large towns.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU observed, with reference to the remarks of the hon. and gallant Member for Southwark (Colonel Beresford), that the question was not whether worse dens of filth were to be found in London or in other large towns than existed in the smaller towns; all that the supporters of the Amendment asserted was that in those smaller towns unhealthy rookeries did exist, and that they ought to be removed.

Mr. STANSFELD pointed out that urban sanitary districts in this country often contained a very limited population—as low sometimes as 300 or 400 persons. He was not in favour of granting exceptional powers to such very small constituencies, and therefore he should vote against the Amendment.

Mr. FAWCETT said, he thought an urban district under the Act of 1872 must be “a populous place,” but even if his right hon. Friend the Member for Halifax (Mr. Stansfeld) were right, that was no reason why this provision should not be extended. The Committee had been told not to be too hard upon the ratepayers in small towns—as though it was proposed to bring them under some penal statutes; and the right hon. Gentleman seemed to suggest the local authorities in small towns might fall into the temptation of putting the Act in force. Suppose they did, and pulled down a house which was reported by medical authority as a cause of disease—such a proceeding would be a public benefit, not a public injury. The Home Secretary rested his opposition to the extension of the Bill on the assertion that in towns of 10,000 inhabitants and under, one could always in the immediate neighbourhood get land for the building of houses for the working classes; but the fact was exactly the contrary. In many small towns one could not get land for love or money, because it was possessed by one, two, or three great proprietors, and the most stringent regulations were made in the leases that only houses of a particular character could be built—houses of a character which it was impossible for working men to live in. It was not consistent with the dignity of the House to legislate in this piecemeal fashion, having a small Bill now, an amending Bill next year, and so on. If the Home Secretary was determined to get rid of these unhealthy places in towns of 25,000 inhabitants, one was at a loss to see why, in the name of common sense, he should not deal in the same way with towns of 15,000 inhabitants.

Mr. JAMES said, he thought that if any legislation was attempted it should be as complete as possible, and was inclined to think the Bill should apply not only to urban, but to rural sanitary districts. Knowing well the neighbourhood of Folkestone, he could say that the condition of the rural poor between that town and Dover was infamous and disgraceful.

Mr. EARP urged the hon. Member to press his proposal to a division, for there could be no doubt that many small towns were in a fearful plight. The town he represented (Newark) would be glad to possess the powers which this Bill might give them. With a population of 14,000, it was expanding on every side, yet there was only one owner in the neighbourhood who was willing to let his land on building leases. Fever of a virulent kind had lately broken out there. He would give other towns than those of 25,000 inhabitants, where a suitable authority existed, the power to apply the provisions of this Bill if they thought fit to do so.

MR. STANSFELD entirely admitted that there were reasons for extending this Bill to towns below the proposed limit; but, on the other hand, he saw serious objections to giving such powers, though only permissive, to the smallest urban sanitary authorities.

Question put, "That the word 'containing' stand part of the Clause."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 99; Noes 36: Majority 63.

MR. MUNTZ moved an Amendment, in page 2, line 9, to leave out "25,000," and insert "10,000," as he wished to apply the provisions of the Bill to a larger number of towns. It was invidious to mention the names of places; but he believed it would be found that towns with a population of 10,000 had houses as remarkable for dirt and infamy as those with a population of 25,000.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 9, to leave out "25,000," and insert "10,000."—(Mr. Muntz.)

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, he was afraid that he could not adopt this Amendment. His original intention had been to confine the operation of the Bill to towns of 50,000, but he was induced to extend it to populations of 25,000, which would really let in a considerable number of large towns. He wanted to give the Bill a fair start as far as the large towns were concerned, and there would in that case be less difficulty in extending its operations. Were they to make it at the outset applicable to towns of 10,000, the local authorities would not work it as it ought to be worked, the opposition of the ratepayers would be aroused, and the measure might become unpopular. At the same time, it was the intention of the Government to apply a different remedy to towns with a population of 10,000, which he hoped would have considerable effect in reducing the evils which he quite admitted existed in such places. There was the less necessity for doing what was asked by the hon. Member for Birmingham, as he would, when the convenient opportunity arrived, bring in a separate and a more suitable Bill to deal with the small towns.

MR. WHITWELL, admitting the difference between large towns and small ones, advised the acceptance of the Home Secretary's assurance and the withdrawal of the Amendment.

MR. STANSFELD pointed out that this was a permissive Bill, and therefore he did not understand the reasoning of the Home Secretary when he said he was afraid that the Bill would become unpopular if it were applied to towns of less than 25,000 population, because of the pressure on the rates. It was impossible to rely, where the population was small, upon the sanitary authority as a fairly representative body likely to act in the public interest. He had a shrewd suspicion that in such districts the boards consisted of surveyors, builders, and local solicitors, who attended more to their own than the public interest. As the Home Secretary had foreshadowed another Bill for small populations, of which the Committee knew nothing, and as no definite reason had been given for stopping at 25,000, he should support the Amendment.

MR. CAWLEY said, he had not heard a reason for stopping at 25,000, except the insufficient one that they might frighten the ratepayers, and he preferred to adopt 10,000, both because they had already done so in Torrens' Act, and because there were towns of 10,000 which greatly needed some such Bill.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU said, he would remind the Committee that under the Municipal Corporations Act of 1834, towns of less population than 10,000 were entrusted with quite as great powers as were to be vested in towns of 25,000. The Home Secretary said he feared that to adopt the Amendment would be to make the Act costly and frighten the ratepayers. Now, as the Bill was permissive, his own fear, on the contrary, was that the Act would not be put into operation. The people who were frightened were not the ratepayers, but the right hon. Gentlemen on the Treasury Bench, who had evaded their promises last Session by alleging that they had not had time to settle the question of Local Taxation, and who in the present Session had forgotten all about it.

THE CHAIRMAN reminded the noble Lord that the Question before the Committee was whether the numbers should be "25,000" or "10,000."

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU said, he would submit himself to the Chair; but he thought that the Home Secretary had treated the House rather unfairly when he said that he had got a plan in petto for dealing with the smaller towns. It was not fair, however, to ask the Committee to legislate in the dark, and they ought to know what the right hon. Gentleman proposed to do.

MR. GOLDNEY said, that there already existed an Act, passed in 1868, which authorized the local authorities of towns of 5,000 inhabitants to remove and order to be pulled down houses that were unfit for human habitations, although it did not give them the power of building them up again. The present scheme was not only for pulling down, but for re-building.

MR. DODSON said, the question before the Committee was the Amendment of the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Muntz)—namely, that the Bill, in its operation, should not be confined to towns having a population of 25,000, but that it should apply to towns with populations of 10,000 and upwards. The assumption of the duty by the local authorities was entirely optional. They were told that the Bill was a permissive and simple Bill; but it was a Bill containing 22 clauses, and comprising 22 pages, and he would say that there never was a measure introduced with so much pretension which reduced itself to so small a point. The only difference was that towns might obtain a Provisional Order under this Bill, instead of applying for a Private Bill.

MR. GOLDNEY said, that under the Bill, when the urban sanitary authorities had passed a scheme, it would be the duty of the local authorities to purchase land and carry out the scheme. That was not to be called a Permissive Bill.

SIR ANDREW LUSK said, his constituents did not consider the Bill as merely permissive; on the contrary, they thought it a most compulsory measure. For instance, the confirming authority could come and say—"Those houses must come down." Now, that was a great power. If 20 persons were to get up a requisition to the authorities in matters comprised in the measure, the local authorities must act. He did not think they should press the Bill too strongly. As far as his own constituency (Finsbury) was concerned, he felt that it would be very hard to work it.

MR. FAWCETT said, they now had only got through about half of Clause 2, and that being so, what could they know about Clause 7, which was said to be permissive? With respect to the Amendment of the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Muntz), proposing that the Bill be made to apply to small places containing populations of 10,000 and upwards, as well as to large towns with populations of 25,000 and upwards, the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary admitted that there were places in small towns requiring similar legislation; but in small towns the Bill was not obligatory in reference to building. The right hon. Gentleman said it would become the duty of the local authorities to carry out the scheme. Now, the clause did not say that the local authorities "shall" carry out the scheme, but that they "may" carry it out. It was contended that the Bill was purely permissive; but if the clause was correct, he contended that the argument of the right hon. Gentleman was correct—there was no obligatory power to compel the local authorities to carry out the scheme.

MR. CAWLEY said, hon. Members seemed to be confounding the terms "permissive" and "obligatory."

MR. MUNTZ said, the hon. Member for Finsbury (Sir Andrew Lusk) need not be uneasy on the question of his Amendment, for it referred to populations under 25,000, and the population of Finsbury was above that. The difficulty in the case of large towns was, that in them land was sold at enormous prices.

MR. ALDERMAN COTTON said, the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary said he would bring in a Bill to deal with the small towns, and, in his opinion, it would be wise not to postpone the present measure, on the principle that "a bird in the hand is better than two in the bush," and that there was a great difference between a population of 2,000 or 3,000, and one of 10,000 to 25,000—a population of 25,000 occupying a very large area; while the minimum of 25,000 would shut out some very important towns, even one of 24,999.

MR. RITCHIE approved of the suggestion of the hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of London (Mr. Alderman Cotton), and thought that if the taxpayers were to be relieved in some places, it would be well if they were also considered in small places.

MR. E. STANHOPE said, the main reason for not applying these regulations to the smaller towns was that the small sanitary authorities would not, from well-known causes, carry them out. He agreed in the opinion that the same rule should be applied alike to small towns and country districts; but held that they required a totally different machinery from that to be applied to large towns.

MR. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH said, the Amendment of the hon. Member for Birmingham was to extend the Bill to places with a population of between 10,000 and 25,000. The Home Secretary said he had another Bill which he meant to introduce to deal with the country and the small towns; but he (Mr. Kay-Shuttleworth) submitted that the food which was good for populations of 25,000 would be more suitable for small towns having populations of 10,000 and upwards than that which would be applicable to agricultural districts. He quite agreed in the remark of the hon. Member for London (Mr. Alderman Cotton) that it was better to have "one bird in hand than two in the bush." With regard to the Act of the hon. Member for Finsbury (Mr. Torrens), it gave much more stringent powers to local authorities than those of the present Bill; and that Act applied to all towns of not less than 10,000 inhabitants.

MR. SAMUDA said, he should support the Amendment of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham. He thought the Bill should be so framed as to range with the Act of 1868, for nothing could be more inconvenient than to have one mode of assessment for populations of 25,000, and another for populations of 10,000. He thought, therefore, that the Committee could not do better than to let the Amendment of the hon. Member for Birmingham take effect.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, it was an inconvenience which could not perhaps be helped, that hon. Members who had come in after the earlier discussion on the clause should speak, although the result was that they urged arguments which had been answered over and over again. The right hon. Member for Chester (Mr. Dodson) was an instance. He could never have done what the House had done, read the Bill a second time; and he must be utterly ignorant of the real character of the Bill and the clauses it contained, or he would never have made the statement he did, that after great professions it turned out to be nothing at all. Having said that, too, he was yet most anxious that the Bill should be extended to towns of 10,000 inhabitants. He hoped before the House again got into Committee his right hon. Friend would read the Bill a second time, and then he would be better able to explain its provisions. He (Mr. Cross) admitted that, as a rule, towns with 10,000 inhabitants would be just as well able to administer the Bill as towns with 25,000 inhabitants. His anxiety, however, was that the Bill should work. It would be applied tentatively to large towns. As regarded smaller places, there would be a great outcry among country ratepayers, who did not see the prospective good of the Bill if it were applied to them. Not one instance had been cited to show that local authorities in the small towns had availed themselves of the provisions of Torrens' Act. When they came to the Government and said they had exhausted all the powers they already possessed, the Government would be quite willing to increase their powers.

SIR EARDLEY WILMOT regretted that his right hon. Friend the Home Secretary had not acceded to the earnest request made on both sides of the House to apply the Act to smaller towns. In the case of a town like Leamington, with 22,000 inhabitants, heartily approving the Bill, it was a pity that the local authorities would be unable to put it into force.

MR. DODSON repeated that this Bill was a permissive one, because the local authorities were only to apply for a Provisional Order upon their being satisfied with the representations made to them. It would be, therefore, optional on their part to apply the Bill.

Question put, "That '25,000' stand part of the Clause."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 124; Noes 102: Majority 22.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, the hon. and learned Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Gibson) had given Notice of an Amendment to insert after the word "upwards" in Clause 2, page 2, line 9, the words "(4.) Urban sanitary districts in Ireland, containing, according to the last published Census, a population of 10,000 and upwards." In the absence of the hon. and learned Gentleman, he would move now his Amendment, substituting, however, the limit of 25,000 for 10,000.

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, line 9, after the word "upwards," to insert the words "Urban sanitary districts in Ireland containing, according to the last published census, a population of 25,000 and upwards."—(Mr. Assheton Cross.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

THE O'CONOR DON said, that as there was scarcely any town in Ireland with a population of 25,000, the Bill if extended to that country, with that limit, would practically be inoperative.

MR. RONAYNE said, to raise the number to 25,000 was perfectly absurd. It would only, in that case, apply to five towns in Ireland, while the rest of the country would be entirely neglected. Even, at present, they had great difficulty in raising money for sanitary purposes. In the City of Cork the authorities applied to the Board of Works for a loan; but were told they could only advance half of what was asked, and they were prevented by law from raising the remainder. It was absurd to make the number 25,000, and he should move, therefore, that the number be 10,000.

Amendment proposed to the said proposed Amendment, to leave out "25,000," and insert "10,000."—(Mr. Ronayne.)

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, it was proposed originally that if a Bill of that kind was wanted for Ireland, the case of that country should be dealt with in a separate measure, because the circumstances of the two countries might, perhaps, be different. But he thought the Irish Members wished England and Ireland to be treated alike, and it was only on the understanding that the provision should be the same for both countries that he had consented to move the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for the University of Dublin.

If, however, it was likely they were to have a lengthened discussion on the Irish question, he would rather withdraw the Amendment.

THE CHAIRMAN reminded the right hon. Gentleman that that Amendment could not be withdrawn, unless the Amendment of the hon. Member for Cork were withdrawn first.

MR. MUNDELLA said, he thought, if there was reason for extending the operation of the Bill to town populations of 10,000, there was much more reason for that course with regard to Ireland. If the figure was to be kept at 25,000, there were only five towns in Ireland to which the Bill would apply; and was the Government going to talk about improving the dwellings of the working classes, and apply the Bill as regarded Ireland to those five towns only? He trusted that the hon. Member for Cork would press his Amendment to a division.

MR. HEYGATE said, he thought it would be better that the original Amendment should be withdrawn, than that a different number should be fixed for Ireland from that which had been fixed for England.

CAPTAIN NOLAN supported the Amendment of the hon. Member for Cork, and suggested with reference to the remarks of the Home Secretary, whether Ireland would be likely to occupy the time of the House less if they were to have a separate Bill.

MR. EARP remarked that the Home Secretary spoke on this subject now rather as if it were a matter of population than a matter of fever. The spirit in which Members were now met by the Home Secretary was not in accordance with that in which the right hon. Gentleman introduced the Bill, when he described the existing fever haunts and spoke of dwellings where the very walls and floors were saturated with fever. It was not consistent with the spirit in which the right hon. Gentleman made those remarks when introducing the Bill, that he should now say that the Bill was not to be applied to towns of small population. He trusted that the hon. Member for Cork would divide the Committee, and that if justice was not to be done to England in this matter we, should at all events have justice done to Ireland.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU observed, that if the question was complicated by its application to Ireland, it was the Home Secretary himself who introduced that complication. The right hon. Gentleman challenged the opinion of Irish Members upon it. He had been told that if the line were drawn at 25,000 there were only five towns in Ireland to which the Bill would apply; and was it worthy of a great Government to propose a measure for Ireland which would apply only to five towns? He would recommend the Home Secretary to agree to the number being fixed at 10,000.

Mr. MACGREGOR said, that last Session during the discussion on the Licensing Bill, it was decided that the power of saying what was a populous place should rest with the magistrates. Now, he thought what they did then might furnish them with a means of settling the present difficulty. The local magistrates would know whether their own towns were in such a state as to require the application of the provisions of the Bill, and it might therefore be left to them to declare whether the town was such a populous place that the Bill ought to be applied to it or not.

Mr. J. S. HARDY was surprised to hear the Irish Members who were advocates of economy make such a proposition as that, as it would lead to the demolition of all the existing residences of the working classes and the erection of new ones at the cost of the ratepayers.

Mr. RONAYNE reminded the hon. Gentleman that the suggestion in question had come from a Scotch and not from an Irish Member. He himself should certainly be unwilling that the magistrates, who were the representatives of the landed proprietors, should have anything to do with it.

MAJOR O'GORMAN said, he was at a loss to know why the Home Secretary, when so charitable to 25,000 persons, should not be equally charitable to 10,000. There were only four towns in Ireland with populations above 25,000 each; but while Ireland could parade only these four towns with populations of that extent, she could parade others with populations of as much as 10,000, and by adding these together it would be easy to multiply the populations of 25,000.

Question put, "That '25,000' stand part of the said proposed Amendment."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 138; Noes 117: Majority 21.

THE O'CONOR DON said, that, after the decision that had been come to, it was perfectly useless to extend the operation of the Bill to Ireland, and they had better at once accept the proposal of the Home Secretary to exclude that country from its operation.

Mr. P. J. SMYTH begged to move that the number be 12,000.

THE CHAIRMAN decided that the Motion was informal, as the Committee had already decided that the words "25,000" should stand part of the proposed Amendment.

Original Amendment agreed to.

Mr. FAWCETT proposed an Amendment, to the effect that the City of London should not be considered a district in itself, but should, for the purposes of this measure, merge into the metropolis at large. The City was represented at the Metropolitan Board of Works, and would, were the City to be constituted a distinct district, be voting away the money of the ratepayers of the other parts of the metropolis. There was no reason why the City should not contribute its fair quota, to the cost of clearing out the rookeries which it had itself created by the Holborn and other improvements, in carrying out which they had destroyed a large number of dwellings.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 11, to leave out the words "as respects the City of London, the Commissioners of Sewers, and," — (Mr. Fawcett.)

Mr. ALDERMAN COTTON reminded the Committee that the City of London had expended large sums on their bridges, which were open to the entire metropolitan population, and they had spent £2,500,000 on the Holborn Viaduct, which was an advantage to the entire of London. They had many "rookeries" in the City which they would remove, if the Bill passed—in Houndsditch, Whitecross Street, Cripplegate, and the neighbourhood of Fetter Lane, and many other districts, and that work they would willingly undertake and carry out. They were desirous of providing suitable dwellings for their own poor, and of keeping them in the neighbourhoods in which they were employed. The total amount paid to them by the Metropolitan Board of Works between 1858 and 1875 was £197,127, whilst the City had contributed to the Metropolitan Board no less a sum than £580,584. He thought the Metropolitan Board and the City authorities ought each to be left to the management of their respective districts.

Mr. SAMUDA said, he did not agree with the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett), and he was of opinion that the City authorities ought not to have the control of matters in their own district taken out of their hands. A large number of "rookeries" within the City of London required to be removed and replaced, and that duty ought to be left in the hands of the City authorities. It was quite another matter when the time came to consider how to replace these rookeries with buildings such as the Bill contemplated; and it appeared to him that there was some force in the proposal of his hon. Colleague's (Mr. Ritchie's) Amendment to the 15th clause, which he should support when it was reached.

SIR JAMES HOGG said, that the Amendment had taken him by surprise, for he had not heard of it till he came to the House that evening. He could only say that the Metropolitan Board were content to carry out their portion of the work, and to leave to the City the work which they would find to do under the Bill.

Mr. RITCHIE regarded the proposal to divide the metropolis into two parts as a step in the wrong direction. The tendency of late years had been to equalize rates, and in all matters connected with sanitary improvement London should be treated as a whole. Considering that the City would benefit by the general improvement of the metropolis, he argued that it would be unfair to exempt it from contributing anything to the cost of carrying out the Act. If the hon. Member for Hackney pressed his Amendment to a division he should go into the Lobby with him.

SIR SYDNEY WATERLOW said, he hoped the Committee would not go to a division. The hon. Member for Hackney had said that, the Bill being a permissive one, the City would not put it in operation, and he said, by way of evidence, that the corporation in making the Holborn Viaduct swept away great numbers of workmen's dwellings, and did not replace them. The fact was that within two minutes' walk of the Holborn Viaduct they had erected 168 dwellings, occupied by 800 persons, and within a stone's throw they were erecting another similar block, at a cost of £24,000 or £25,000, which would be completed in the approaching summer. The Corporation had set an example worthy to be followed by all other corporations in this respect. He trusted that the Bill would remain as it had been introduced by the Government, and that they might be left to do their own work with their own money, and that the Board of Works might also do its work with its money.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE supported the Amendment of the hon. Member for Hackney, and stated that the Bill would not apply to any portion of the borough which he represented (Chelsea); but the inhabitants would have to contribute equally with the other districts of the metropolis. It was important that there should not be any pretext for supposing that an injustice was done to any district; and therefore the City ought not to be exempted from contributing in like manner to the other metropolitan districts for the benefit of the whole metropolis.

Mr. ASSHETON CROSS said, he could not accept the Amendment. He believed there were a great number of places in the City which must come under the operation of the Bill, and he also believed that the City would set an example to other towns and cities in England, and show how the Bill could be worked. It would be rather a strong thing for the House to say the ancient and powerful Corporation of London should not be entrusted with the reform of their own courts and alleys. That would be an insult to the City of London, which he did not think the House would offer. If the City Corporation could not be trusted, what other corporate body could they trust?

Mr. LOCKE confessed to having no great love for the City of London, which had always taken very great care of itself. No one could get an entrance into the dwellings referred to by the hon. Member (Sir Sydney Waterlow) without paying a rent of 5s. 6d. a-week, and that was too expensive for a working man. It would not be right that the richest section of the metropolis should stand aloof from the poorer sections, in a reform by which all would be equally benefited. The City of London had swept away an immense number of houses of the worst description, and were they to boast of their liberality in spending £24,000—an enormous sum to come out of the pockets of the City of London—in replacing those dwellings?

SIR FREDERICK PERKINS, as an advocate for equalization of rates, thought that the City of London ought not to be exempted in the present instance from contributing its fair quota of taxation for carrying out the provisions of this useful measure.

MR. W. GORDON contended that there was no necessity for including the City in this clause, because the Corporation had always been anxious to promote the well-being of the poor. With regard to Chelsea, as a Representative of that borough, he approved of the Bill, because it would sweep away those rookeries, especially in the northern part of the borough, which were a scandal to a civilized community, and in their place give comfortable dwellings for those who needed them most.

MR. MUNDELLA admitted that the City deserved great credit for the vast improvements they had made; but, at the same time, no one could shut his eyes to the fact that the persons employed in the great factories and warehouses lived outside the City, and that by this Bill they were, in fact, exempting the wealthiest portion of the metropolis from its fair share of the expense of properly housing the working classes.

MR. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH said, the Amendment would deprive the Corporation of the power of effecting improvements within its district. He was not inclined to go so far as that. He would support the Amendment of the hon. Member opposite (Mr. Ritchie), which would raise this question properly under the 15th clause; because, considering the rateable value of the City of London, its share of the cost of the improvements contemplated by the Bill would be comparatively small.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

VOL. CCXXIII. [THIRD SERIES.]

REGIMENTAL EXCHANGES BILL.

(Mr. Secretary Hardy, Mr. Stanley.)

[BILL 3.] THIRD READING.

Order for Third Reading read.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY, in moving that the Bill be now read a third time, thanked hon. Members opposite for their courtesy in allowing it to pass this stage without placing Amendments on the Paper.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a third time."—(Mr. Gathorne Hardy.)

MR. DILLWYN said, he had given Notice of no Amendment, not from any liking for the Bill, but because he believed there was no use in doing so. He had seen throughout the debates that arguments were of no avail whatever. Every argument in Committee, he thought, had been made in favour of the opponents of the Bill; but still they were determined to pass it. He regretted that it should pass, because he believed it would re-establish a system of purchase of which they had got rid at such an enormous expense to the country. [Mr. GATHORNE HARDY: No! no!] The right hon. Gentleman says "No"; but he (Mr. Dillwyn), while he gave the right hon. Gentleman credit for believing the measure would not lead to a return to the system of Purchase, could not but express his apprehension that it was the thin end of the wedge, and that it would result in a return to that system. During the many years he had been in the House he had never seen, as regarded an important public measure, such an evident determination not to assent to any Amendment as had been shown by the promoters of this measure.

MR. CHILDERS wished to say a few words as to the effect which he believed this Bill would have when passed. He considered it inconsistent with all recent legislation, mischievous as a precedent, and most inopportune. It was inconsistent with all our former legislation, because the position would be this, that while we should have two Acts—one passed in the reign of Edward VI. and the other in the reign of George III.—under which trafficking in offices had been declared disgraceful, and those taking any part in such transactions were held guilty of a misdemeanour and liable to lose those offices; for all that, the present Bill proposed that one particular transaction—a payment for Army exchange—should escape the penalties of the Act, provided it were concealed from the military authorities. There was no instance of any such statute with regard to any other branch of the public service. Then the Bill was mischievous as a precedent, for if it passed, although the right hon. Gentleman opposite had not the least intention of re-introducing the system of Purchase, the re-introduction of that system was almost inevitable. Out of the five branches of which purchase consisted, three, at least, would be restored—exchange under this Bill, exchange to and from half-pay, and payment to induce an officer to retire. The passing of such a Bill was inopportune, because we should be asked next year to improve the pay and retirement of officers; and what would be the answer? The answer would at once be—"In 1875 you passed a measure the avowed object of which was to make up for the inadequate pay of the officer indirectly, and how can you now come and ask us to pass a law to add to his pay in a direct shape?" He would not offer any further opposition to the Bill; but for these three reasons he regretted that such a measure should be passed, and he believed that two or three years hence no one would regret its passing more than those for whose benefit it was said to have been brought forward.

Mr. WHALLEY said, he had heard no arguments during the debates which had altered his opinion that a more injudicious policy than the abolition of purchase was never adopted. The purchase system, in so far as it introduced the volunteer element into our standing Army, prevented it from becoming a mercenary Army, and kept it a constitutional force. He would therefore readily forget the sacrifice of the £7,000,000. which it cost to abolish Purchase if by any effort the system could be restored. When he sat on the other side of the House he voted for the retention of the system of Purchase, and protested against the unconstitutional and violent means by which it was abolished. He thanked the Secretary of State for War for the manner in which he had introduced and defended his measure, which he accepted as a judicious step towards the restoration of the system of Purchase.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read the third time, and passed.

MUTINY BILL.—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."—(Mr. Gathorne Hardy.)

Mr. P. A. TAYLOR moved that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Bill that day month. He appealed to the Government not to go on with the Bill at that late hour, as there was a strong feeling in the House and the country unfavourable to the mode in which the Mutiny Bill was generally shuffled through the House, and especially because he had been promised more time for the consideration of its provisions.

Amendment proposed, to leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "this House will, upon this day six months, resolve itself into the said Committee,"—(Mr. P. A. Taylor,)—instead thereof.

Mr. STEPHEN CAVE said, there was no reason for asking for the postponement of the Committee. He would not think of stealing a march upon the House in regard to the Bill, and in this instance he had followed the usual course. So far as he could ascertain it had never been the custom to print this Bill before the second reading. This year it was read a second time on the 10th of March and was in the Bill Office on the 15th. On the 16th the Government Amendments were placed on the Paper, so that hon. Gentleman had the last two days to propose any Amendment they thought desirable. The Government Amendments this year were purely of a formal character, and the old Act which had been an entire year in their hands, was the matter which they really intended to discuss. The usual time between the second reading and the Committee had not for years with one exception exceeded two days, and had often been much less, whereas he had given eight. It was his duty to take every opportunity of making progress with the Bill.

CAPTAIN NOLAN objected to their discussing at that late hour the details of a measure which affected the non-commissioned officers and privates as much as the Bill they had just passed affected the commissioned officers.

MR. W. E. FORSTER understood the Judge Advocate had promised the hon. Member for Leicester a fair time for the discussion of his objections, which could not take place at that late hour.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY explained that with the exception of one clause this Bill usually passed without comment; but if any point was raised in Committee it would not be carried further at present.

MR. STANSFELD said, there was a growing disposition to scrutinize the clauses of this Bill, and although there might be little change in it, it was usual for Members to wait until a Bill was printed before examining it.

MR. DISRAELI said, they could go into Committee, and when they arrived at any point that provoked serious discussion they could report Progress. The Mutiny Act was never changed; everybody was familiar with it; and the objections of the hon. Member for Leicester and of all other Members would be fully met by proceeding until they arrived at a debatable point, and then reporting Progress.

Question, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question," put, and agreed to.

Main Question, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," put, and agreed to.

Bill considered in Committee.

Clause 1.

MR. MONK moved that the Chairman report Progress.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT supported the Motion, on the ground that Amendments and alterations had been made in the Bill, which could not be distinguished in the text.

MR. STEPHEN CAVE said, that the alterations touched no question of principle. They were merely matters of convenience, and most of them were merely formal. He had followed in every respect the precedent of the previous Government.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 2 to 25, inclusive, agreed to.

House resumed.

Committee report Progress; to sit again To-morrow.

EAST INDIA HOME GOVERNMENT PENSIONS BILL.—[BILL 74.]

(Lord George Hamilton, Mr. William Henry Smith.)

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [15th March], "That the Bill be now read the third time."

Question again proposed.

Debate resumed.

Main Question, by leave, withdrawn.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON moved that the Bill be re-committed, for the purpose of reconsidering the first Clause, with a view to inserting an Amendment to the effect that no Member of the Indian Council could receive a pension under the Bill, if he were in receipt of or otherwise entitled to a pension or superannuation allowance.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be re-committed, in respect of Clause 1."—(Lord George Hamilton.)

MR. SHAW-LEFEVRE and MR. CHILDERS recommended that the Bill should be withdrawn and reconstructed, as they considered that, in its present form, it left matters in an uncertain state.

Debate adjourned till Monday next.

MEDICAL ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

On Motion of Sir JOHN LUBBOCK, Bill to amend the Medical Act, ordered to be brought in by Sir JOHN LUBBOCK and Dr. LUSH.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 100.]

POLICE SUPERANNUATION FUNDS.

Select Committee appointed, "to inquire into the Police Superannuation Funds in the counties and boroughs of England and Wales and the Acts creating and regulating the same, and to report to the House whether any, and, if any, what alterations or amendments in the Law are required."—(Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson.)

And, on March 23, Committee nominated as follows:—MR. BIDDULPH, MR. COTER, MR. COWPER, MR. GOURLEY, MR. LEEMAN, MR. GRANTHAM, MR. TORR, MR. SCOURFIELD, MR. FAIRFAX CARTWRIGHT, Colonel DYOTT, and Sir HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON:—Power to send for persons, papers, and records; Five to be the quorum.

AGRICULTURAL CHILDREN ACT, 1873.

OBSERVATIONS.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY rose to call attention to the inconvenience caused by the Agricultural Children Act, 1873, not applying to children above the age of twelve years, whilst the Elementary Education Act, 1873, applies to children up to the age of thirteen years; and to ask the Lord President of the Council, whether he proposes to take any step to amend the law on this subject? He did not intend to enter into a general discussion of the Agricultural Children Act of 1873, which had been debated very fully not long ago in "another place"—his desire was to call attention to one point in that Act which involved a great anomaly and considerable harshness. Their Lordships would remember that the main object of the Act to which he was referring was to prevent the employment of children under a certain age at agricultural work, and to provide for their receiving a certain amount of education; and this provision applied to all children who were not over 12 years of age. He would state to their Lordships how the Act practically worked. It was necessary under it, in order that a child should be qualified for employment, that he should have a certificate of a certain number of school attendances during the 12 months immediately preceding the time of his employment, and a maximum number of attendances, varying with age, was prescribed by the Act. For children between the ages of 8 and 10 the number was 250; for children between 10 and 12 it was 150. He would take an extreme case, but one which would show exactly the operation of the Act. Suppose a child of the age of 10 went to school, by attending regularly morning and evening he might make up the 150 attendances within three months. At the age of 11, he might go to work and remain at work up to the age of 12 on the certificate of those 150 attendances, without going to school again. But what occurred if at the age of 12 his parents were obliged to apply for out-door relief? The child would then come within the provision of the Elementary Education Act of 1873, under which the children of persons receiving out-door relief must attend school up to the age of 13; and in this case attendance meant throughout the day, and not merely in the morning or in the evening. What he wished to point out to their Lordships was the conflict between the Agricultural Children Act, and the one passed in same Session, which compelled all children whose parents were receiving out-door relief to attend school every day, both morning and evening. The latter Act applied to all children up to the age of 13—the former only up to the age of 12. So that when a child attained 12 years and three months it passed out of the scope of the former Act, but remained under the operation of the Elementary Education Act until it was 13 years of age. The result was the gross absurdity that a child was perfectly free to work from 11 to 12 years of age, at a time when he had better be at school; and then if his parents happened to require relief, probably after he had forgotten all he had learned, he was taken from his labour, with which he was becoming acquainted, and compelled to attend school. That was not only a disadvantage to the child, but also a hardship to his parent; because, on the former being sent from work to school, the latter, just when he was in distress, was suddenly deprived of the support of the child's earnings. He was referring to an infirm man in the receipt of out-door relief—how could the operation of the Act be explained to the satisfaction of such a man? Acting as Chairman of a Board of Guardians in his own district, he had endeavoured to explain the Act to a labourer, but in vain. The labourer failed to understand its operation, and in the result he (the Earl of Kimberley) was obliged to take refuge in saying to the poor fellow—"Well, you must obey the law." Such an anomalous state of the law must tend to bring the law itself into contempt. Their Lordships' House was especially responsible for what had occurred, because when the Agricultural Children Act came from the House of Commons it did extend to children up to the age of 13; but the noble Lord who sat on the other side and who had charge of the measure (Lord Henniker), proposed that the limit should be reduced to 12. The noble Marquess (the Marquess of Ripon), at that time President of the Council, objected to the change. However, their Lordships thought fit to make the alteration, and the result was the anomaly and hardship of which he now complained. Therefore, he could not help hoping that the noble Duke would see his way, at all events, to amend the Agricultural Children Act by making the limit 13, so that it might no longer interfere with the general operation of the Elementary Education Act, but that both Acts might work together. He would ask his noble Friend whether he proposed to take any steps to amend the law on the subject?

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND said, he was afraid his noble Friend would not think his answer satisfactory, because he was obliged to say that he was not prepared, on the part of the Government, to propose any amendment in the Agricultural Children Act of 1873. The anomalies in the enactments of the two statutes undoubtedly did exist, and had been stated very fairly and accurately by his noble Friend. Undoubtedly, while that Act limited the age to 12 years, the Elementary Education Act extended it to 13 years. But his noble Friend had taken an extreme case. The Act did not apply to the whole country—the Denison clause applied only to children whose parents were in the receipt of outdoor relief, and as persons who received such relief must be over 60 years of age, or be permanently disabled, the clause would not in practice apply to anything like the bulk of the whole of children employed in labour. He did not think the cases referred to by his noble Friend to be so numerous as to cause inconvenience; but, at the same time, he quite admitted that the provisions of the two statutes were conflicting in the respect pointed out, and therefore might give rise to the anomaly suggested by his noble Friend. But as to the amount of inconvenience that had actually occurred, he might remind his noble Friend that the Agricultural Children Act only came into operation in January of the present year, and some further test ought to be given to its working before an amendment in its provisions was proposed in Parliament. He said so much in justification of his declining to give the promise asked for by his noble Friend. The noble Earl had described the Act as an absurd law.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, that what he stated was that the contradiction between the two statutes was absurd.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND: The noble Earl said he had said to the poor labourer who came to him for advice that the law was absurd, but that he must obey it. Moreover, he ventured to suggest that his noble Friend the late President of the Council (the Marquess of Ripon) was in some measure responsible for the conflict between the two statutes. The noble Marquess certainly did object to the alteration from 13 to 12 in the Agricultural Children Act when it was proposed by his noble Friend who had charge of the Bill; but the two Bills were passed in the same Session, and received the Royal Assent on the same day; and, with the knowledge that the change had been made in the Agricultural Children Act, the noble Marquess, as President of the Council at the time, ought to have seen that steps were taken to make that Act and the Elementary Education Act harmonize in respect of the limits of age. He would carefully watch the operation of the Act, and, if required, amend it: but in dealing with so large a question as Education, one must be careful how they interfered with an Act which had come into operation so recently as the Agricultural Children Act. His fear was that in endeavouring to remedy one defect they might open the door to demands to further and more extensive changes. He rather shrank from interfering with a measure which had been so short a time in operation on a representation as to an inconvenience which could not have been very much felt.

THE MARQUESS OF RIPON said, he did not wonder at the indisposition shown by his noble Friend to open the Education question. He knew how natural it was for any one in office to shrink from opening even a small point in a large subject, lest it might spread to a wider one. At the same time, he was glad to observe that at the close of his observations the noble Duke did not speak quite so positively as he had at the commencement of his determination not to deal with the anomaly during the present Session. He would ask his noble Friend to give the matter some further consideration. As both his noble Friends had stated, he did object to the change from 13 to 12 when it was proposed in the Agricultural Children Bill; that change created the difficulty; but no doubt there was an oversight in allowing the anomaly between two Bills which were passing through Parliament at the same time to remain uncorrected. The cases were not very numerous in which the conflict pointed out by his noble Friend (the Earl of Kimberley) would practically arise; but there were cases in which it might arise and entail great hardships upon poor persons—the cases of persons permanently disabled and receiving out-door relief on that account, and who had children employed under the circumstances referred to by his noble Friend. The noble Duke did not deny the anomaly; and he thought he would find a disposition on both sides of the House to cure that anomaly without opening the door for any further changes than would be necessary to effect that object. He therefore entertained the hope that his noble Friend would yet see his way to dealing with that single point.

METROPOLIS GAS COMPANIES BILL. QUESTION.

COLONEL MAKINS asked the honourable Member for Truro, If he will state to the House why, as there are seventeen Companies supplying Gas within the area under the Metropolitan Board, the legislation proposed by the “Metropolis Gas Companies” Bill is limited to only nine Companies, whilst the Parliamentary notices for the Bill included all Companies supplying the district under the Metropolitan Board of Works?

SIR JAMES HOGG: Sir, in answer to the hon. Member, I beg to state that although there are 17 companies supplying gas within the Metropolitan area, eight of them supply outlying districts, and are not subject to the provisions of the Metropolis Gas Acts, 1860. The Metropolis Gas Bill is an amendment and partial repeal of the Act of 1860, which expressly excludes from its provisions the eight companies alluded to by the hon. Member. I cannot enter more fully into the question at present; but I would remark that the company in which the hon. Member is interested objected before the Examiner on the ground that the Standing Orders had not been complied with upon the point referred to in the Question, but the objection was disallowed.

MERCHANT SHIPPING ACTS—THE “MARIE” STEAMSHIP.—QUESTION.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether his attention has been directed to the case of the “Marie” steamship which left Southampton for the West Coast of Africa in the month of November last, but ultimately arrived in a sinking state at Santander, where she now is; and, whether, he will consent to place upon the Table all Correspondence which the Board of Trade has received on the subject?

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY: Sir, the Marie was a new ship, measured for tonnage only, at her starting from Southampton, by the officer of the Board of Trade employed for that purpose. No case arose for a Government survey, the Marie not being a passenger ship, and no question of her unseaworthiness having come to the notice of the Board of Trade. In connection with the subject, however, a question has arisen as to allowing any ships of this class, built for river or coast navigation abroad, to proceed to sea in the winter months. The Correspondence relating to the Marie may be moved for, together with Correspondence relating to the Mary and Chusan, of the same class.

POST OFFICE—REVENUE RETURNS.
QUESTION.

MR. J. HOLMS asked the Postmaster General, If he is aware that the Returns issued at the instance of the Revenue authorities, and for assessment purposes, are not allowed to pass for a halfpenny stamp, but are charged letter postage; and, if so, will he give instructions to discontinue it?

LORD JOHN MANNERS, in reply, said, one or two instances of the kind referred to by the hon. Member had had been brought to his notice, in which the Assessment Returns were improperly charged with letter postage. He had no doubt they were entitled to pass for a halfpenny postage. He would take care, now that he had received information from the hon. Member, that instructions should be given to prevent a recurrence of the inconvenience.

CRIMINAL LAW — COMMITTAL FOR CONTEMPT — CASE OF WILLIAM CRADDOCK.—QUESTION.

MR. CHARLES LEWIS asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether, having regard to the heavy sentence passed on William Craddock for contempt of court, he will institute an inquiry into the facts in order to ascertain whether it is a fit case for the exercise of clemency on the part of Her Majesty; and, whether he has any objection to lay upon the Table of the House a Copy of the Letter from Mr. Justice Denman from which he gave quotations on the 16th instant?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: Sir, I have not had occasion to make further inquiries into the facts of this case, because I have this morning received a second letter from Mr. Justice Denman, in which his Lordship states that he regretted to say that his recollection was at fault in one important respect, and that the conversation supposed to have taken place between the prisoners was not at the time the jury were being sworn, but after the acquittal of Craddock, and while the jury were deliberating, and therefore the contempt of Court was not such as he thought it was. I believe this is a case for the clemency of Her Majesty, and I have advised Her Majesty accordingly.

POOR LAW TAXATION (IRELAND).
QUESTION.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether, having regard to his promise of legislation on the subject of the area of Poor Law Taxation in Ireland, and the admitted necessity for such legislation, he will introduce his intended Bill on that subject on an early day?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH, in reply, said, there were other important subjects relating to Ireland to which it would perhaps be his duty to call the attention of the House before he approached the subject alluded to in the hon. Member's Question; but he must say, looking at the state of Public Business, he did not think it desirable to introduce a Bill on the subject before he could see a reasonable prospect of passing it.

FOREIGN MONASTIC AND CONVENTUAL INSTITUTIONS — LAWS OF FOREIGN STATES—THE RETURNS.
QUESTIONS.

MR. NEWDEGATE asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether the Government intend to complete the Return, presented on the 4th of this month, in answer to the Address of 27th of July 1874, with respect to the Laws of Foreign States relating to Monastic and Conventual Institutions, by adopting the suggestions made by Herr von Bülow, the Minister for Foreign Affairs of the German Empire, in his letter to Mr. Adams, dated June 11th, 1874, and given on page 12 of the Return, by applying for the required information to the proper officers of the Prussian Government, and to those of the Governments of the other German States, or by otherwise procuring copies of the Laws of the above States which have been published and relate to the subject-matter of the Address; whether the Government will procure and furnish the extract from "the work of Rönne (Das Staatesrecht der Preussischen Monarchie)," especially mentioned by Herr von Bülow as containing valuable information; whether any communication has been made to the representative of Her Majesty's Government in Brazil, urging him to obtain published copies of the Laws in that Empire relating to the subject-matter of the Address, should the Brazilian Government further delay furnishing such information; and, when any further Papers in completion of those presented on the 4th of this month are likely to be furnished to Members of this House?

MR. BOURKE: Sir, in accordance with the Order of the House, we applied to the German Government for all the laws, ordinances, and precepts affecting the Convents and Monastic Institutions at present in force in the German Empire. We received the letter upon the subject from Herr von Bülow which is mentioned in the Question; but I do not gather from that letter that there is any suggestion of the nature alluded to by my hon. Friend. That letter points out, among other things, that Church affairs do not fall within the competence of the Imperial authority, and that no Imperial law has been issued on the subject; but that the laws of the several Federal States affecting the Roman Catholic Convents are very various, and that many disputes have arisen as to their effect upon Convents recently established; and Herr von Bülow mentions a work by a gentleman of the name of Rönne, in which a detailed examination of those laws is set forth. That work is said to be a very learned one, and I would recommend my hon. Friend the Member for North Warwickshire, if he wishes for further information, to procure a copy of the work for himself. That is the state of the case. Under those circumstances, I am afraid Her Majesty's Government cannot undertake the task proposed to them by my hon. Friend—by applying to the officers of the various German States for copies of the laws in question. And with regard to the excellent work of Herr Rönne, Her Majesty's Government do not think that the House would expect them to place it on the Table in the form of a Parliamentary Paper. With regard to Brazil, Her Majesty's Chargé d'Affaires at Rio has stated that he had been promised copies of all the laws and ordinances relating to these Institutions, and he hoped to be able to send them by the mail of the 24th of January. In a further despatch, Mr. Drummond reported that he had not up to that time succeeded in obtaining those documents, but he hoped to do so in a few days. I am not prepared to lay on the Table any other Papers upon this subject.

MR. NEWDEGATE asked, whether Her Majesty's Government objected to apply to the Governments of Prussia, Bavaria, Saxony, and other German States for information on the subject-matter of the Address voted last July?

MR. BOURKE: I think I can best answer my hon. Friend's Question, by reading an extract from Herr Von Bülow's letter—

"A most lengthy correspondence would be necessary to obtain the required materials from all the Prussian Provinces and from the 24 other Federal States, which materials would have to be submitted to a scientific elucidation and criticism before they would be serviceable to the British Government—a task which the Foreign Office, with the most earnest wish to make these explanations clear and useful, scarcely feels itself capable of undertaking."

MR. NEWDEGATE said, the hon. Gentleman had not answered the Question. What he had asked was, whether Her Majesty's Government objected to apply to the Government of Prussia, to the Government of Bavaria, to the Government of Saxony, and to the other German States, for the information required by this House under the Return ordered on the 27th July, 1874?

MR. BOURKE: I have, Sir, already informed my hon. Friend that we have done our best to get the information from the Imperial Government of Germany, the proper authority to apply to both as to Prussia and Saxony.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, the Government of this Country had been informed—"Question!"

MR. SPEAKER pointed out that the hon. Member was not at liberty to raise a debate on the question.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he would repeat his Question on Tuesday next.

NAVY—TRAINING SHIPS—

H. M. S. "BOSCAWEN."—QUESTIONS.

SIR FREDERICK PERKINS asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether he would consider the advisability, in the interests of the naval service, of placing a ship for the training of boys for the Royal Navy in the Southampton Water, where, notwithstanding the eligibility of the station, there has been no training vessel since the removal of Her Majesty's ship "Boscawen" several years ago.

MR. HUNT, in reply, said, the Boscawen had been removed from Southampton to Portland as being a more suitable place for the training of boys. There was no present intention of placing a training ship in Southampton Water.

In reply to MR. WHALLEY,

MR. HUNT said, that when the regulations respecting training-ships were thoroughly settled, the Papers should be laid upon the Table of the House. He stated generally the other day, when moving the Navy Estimates, that assistance would be given.

PUBLIC BUSINESS—THE EASTER RECESS.—QUESTIONS.

MR. HOLT asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether it was really intended that the House should meet on Thursday next?

MR. LYON PLAYFAIR asked, whether it was intended to take the Public Health Bill with 326 clauses as the Second Order of the Day on Monday next, or whether it was not to be postponed until after Easter?

MR. DISRAELI: Sir, it is always my wish to consult the convenience of the House with regard to the conduct of Public Business; but, at the same time, the public interest must be attended to. I see by the Paper that the Peace Preservation Bill is fixed for Monday, and I shall be quite ready, if the debate on that Bill concludes on Tuesday night, to meet the wish, which I know is not confined to one side of the House, by at once moving the adjournment of the House to Monday, the 5th of April, on which day I shall be prepared to take the Army Estimates. There is no prospect of the Public Health Bill coming on next Monday.

EDUCATION DEPARTMENT—EDUCATION (IRELAND).—QUESTION.

MR. SULLIVAN asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, If it is true that the Government intend to forbid by Law in Ireland, whether in public or private schools or otherwise, any element of education or branch of instruction not only permitted but prescribed in the case of English Schools under the Public Education Code?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH, in reply, said, the hon. Member for Louth had so carefully framed his Question, that he was unable to comprehend the exact point to which it was directed. From the varying circumstances of the two countries, both the law and the rules of the Education Department were different in many particulars in England and Ireland. He was not aware that the Irish Government had power to forbid any element of education, his impression being that its duty was to carry out the powers with which the law had invested it.

PARLIAMENTARY AND MUNICIPAL ELECTIONS ACT.

MOTION FOR A SELECT COMMITTEE.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE, in rising to call attention to the working of the Parliamentary and Municipal Elections Act, and to move for a Select Committee to inquire into the existing machinery of elections, with power to suggest Amendments in the same, said, that last year, when the subject was raised by the hon. and learned Member for Derry (Mr. Charles Lewis) and himself, they were told in public by the right hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster), the father of the Bill, and in private by the Home Secretary—

"That the time was coming when it would be really desirable to review the operations of the Act, and to find out exactly what had been the results; . . . that they ought to wait for the Reports of the Judges."—[3 Hansard, ccxviii. 375.]

They had waited for the Reports of the Judges, and they had those Reports before them. The case for inquiry could not be better put than it had been put last year by the right hon. Member for Bradford himself, when he said—

“He did not think the House would under-rate the difficulties with regard to the passing of such an Act. It was a perfectly new machinery, of great complication, and exceeding difficulty.”—[3 Hansard, ccxviii. 376.]

There had been points of difficulty in connection with the Ballot Act, and especially with regard to the marking of papers, raised by a large number of municipal petitions, and decisions had been given, which—to say the least of them—were not in agreement one with the other. In the case of a municipal election at Southport, the Commissioner decided that the ballot papers marked with a cross on the left-hand side, instead of on the right, were perfectly good. In the Athlone case, Chief Justice Monaghan said—of the Court—

“We give no opinion of the validity of the papers marked on the left-hand side. They had been previously rejected by the sheriff, but luckily they did not affect the result of the election, as the Petitioner had a majority without them.”

In the case of Wigtown, the Scotch Court had decided that those papers were bad, but in the Southport case, the Commissioner stated from the bench that he knew as a fact that the English Judges thought them good. England one way, Scotland the other, and Ireland neutral. In the case of Athlone, he might say, in passing, that one-thirteenth of the whole of the ballot papers had been more or less improperly marked. The Irish Court, however, decided certain points in that case—namely, that as regarded crosses on the right-hand side of the candidate's name, it was not necessary in Ireland that they should be placed upon the square left blank for them. In the case of the Wigtown Boroughs, Lord Ormadaile had decided that a vote should be rejected which was delivered by means of a cross “designedly made of a peculiar form,” and he reserved that vote for the decision of the higher Court in the special case. Lord Ormadaile had also reserved two papers which had been marked in ink, instead of pencil. He had also, in opposition to the opinion of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford, said—

“Numbers . . . had a stroke, not a cross, opposite the name of one of the candidates, and that is in no sense in conformity with the statutory direction. Whether it has been done innocently, or accidentally—or in pursuance of a preconcerted design in order to identification—it is impossible to say; but I think that if statutory declarations are to be given any effect to at all, it is very difficult to hold that these papers are marked in compliance with them.”

He had reserved for the higher Court, in a special case, a paper on which the cross was only a little above the candidate's name, but on the right, “because such a mode of marking the paper might be done for the purpose of identification.” He had also rejected a paper the corner of which was torn off, because that might have been done with a view to identification. Lord Neaves, in delivering judgment, said—also in opposition to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford—

“I think it essential to a good vote that the voter should make a cross thus pointed out, and that any mark materially different would be a deviation from what is prescribed, and a failure to fulfil the requirements of the statute. For anyone to put, instead of a cross, a circle or any other geometrical figure, would not be a compliance with the law, independently of the consideration that such a plain and wilful departure from what was intended would suggest strongly the suspicion of some sinister purpose.”

He rejected absolutely the papers which had lines or ticks on them, instead of crosses. He also rejected all papers on which there were two crosses in the place of one, a line on the back, or any marks in addition to the cross. He had also laid it down that the cross must be on the right-hand side. Lord Ormadaile concurred with Lord Neaves on all points. Lord Benholme differed from his two Colleagues on nearly all. Lord Moncreiff being absent, the opinion of Lord Ormadaile and Lord Neaves stood, and contradicted all the English municipal decisions, the statements repeatedly made in that House by the promoters of the Bill, and the almost uniform practice of the Returning Officers in England at the last Election. Although the Scotch Judges had differed on many of the papers by two to one; they had unanimously agreed that the mark must be one cross, whereas the right hon. Member for Bradford had repeatedly observed that any mark in the proper place was sufficient. He (Sir Charles Dilke) could not think that that was a satisfactory state of things as a preparation for the next General Election in this country. He might add that the Commissioner in the Southport case had decided to count the papers marked on the left, although he had the opposite decision of the Scotch Judges actually before him at the time. He said that he did not think their decision binding on him, and that he thought it wrong, but considered the point open to great doubt. The Commissioner, in delivering judgment in the Southport case, had said—

“I shall state in my report the difficulty there is in construing the 25th rule of the Ballot Act, and in all probability some enactment may be passed, either for the purpose of amending that section, or getting some declaratory Act explaining what is its meaning.”

He meant the words “then mark his paper,” the question being, what is a sufficient mark? The other points in connection with the inquiry which he (Sir Charles Dilke) proposed, and which had been dealt with by the Judges, were those of the secrecy of the vote, which came up in the case of Bolton, and in the case of Drogheda. The Bolton election had been held by the Judge to be a good one; but, in giving that decision, he had used very strong language with regard to Parliament. He said—

“If the Legislature have failed in providing safe-guards, the misfortune may be the misfortune of the public, but the fault lies at the door of the Legislature. I am satisfied that a deliberate violation of the provisions with regard to secrecy was attempted in this borough.”

In the case of Drogheda, it had been contended that there was a conspiracy between the sheriff and the under-sheriff to set aside the provisions for secrecy; and the Judge then said that if that had been proved he should have voided the election. He found that it had not been proved—although it was a fact that arrangements had been made by which secrecy was altogether violated—and he reserved for the consideration of the higher Court the question, whether, looking to the fact that the rules of the Ballot Act had in no sense been complied with, the election itself was invalid? Two of the Judges held that the election was valid, and two that it was invalid. The case, therefore, had been returned to the original Judge, who decided that it was valid. That was, the Judge said, sitting in appeal against a Court of four Judges, and reversing the decision of two of his most learned Colleagues. So much for the cases which had actually been tried and decided. In addition, however, to the actual decisions of the Judges, which, as he had shown, were of a contradictory nature, and left them in more need of inquiry than ever, they had now a very much larger amount of information than the hon. and learned Member for Derry and himself possessed last year, when they brought this question before the House, as to the principles which had guided the various Returning Officers in their practice. He would deal with certain of the details of the Act, one by one, with a view of showing that if they went to another General Election without inquiry, and without clearing up some of the most important points that could be raised, they would go to it with a certainty of Petitions involving scrutiny in a very large proportion of the constituencies of the country, and scrutiny meant, in the case of large constituencies, an expenditure utterly without parallel. He had there before him—and he had leave to use it, for it had already been partly published—an opinion as to the proper way of marking ballot papers, which was the first point of detail, and the most important, that he would raise. That opinion was given in 1873, at the instance of Mr. Curwood, the Town Clerk of Leeds, by the then Attorney General—the present Lord Chief Justice Coleridge. He might state that Mr. Curwood—who was one of the most skilled town clerks in England, and who had paid much attention to the details of the Ballot Act—had informed him that the aldermen of Leeds, each of whom was a Returning Officer for one of the 12 wards of that borough at the election of councillors, were about equally divided upon the question of what was a properly marked ballot paper; and that the circumstances under which Lord Coleridge's opinion had been obtained were these—That an election had been carried in one ward by the acceptance of papers which had been rejected in all the surrounding wards. Lord Coleridge had given it as his opinion that the cross need not be in the square, but he held that it must be opposite to the name; and he had advised—and his advice had been followed in the counting of votes at the last election of Leeds—that those papers were bad which had been held good by the Irish Court in the Athlone case, where the cross, although made on the right hand side, was a little above or a little below the name. He had also held that a line added to the cross, and that two crosses, were bad—in opposition, therefore, to the opinion of his then Colleague, the father of the Bill, the right hon. Member for Bradford, who had distinctly given the opposite opinion in that House. Lord Coleridge added a note at the end, that where—

"The voter has put an additional mark, his case appears to me to be directly within the mischief of the statute, and his voting paper may in my opinion be rejected."

Of the elections which he (Sir Charles Dilke) had personally attended at the counting of the votes, he might add that in the case of Hackney, the Returning Officer counted all the crosses on the right hand side, even though above or below the name, and held those on the left to be bad. At Chelsea, the Returning Officer held those placed on the left to be just as good as those on the right, and counted every paper, however marked, from which the voter's intention was clear, except those upon which had been written any words of handwriting. The Town Clerk of Glasgow had written to him—

"In deciding on the sufficiency of marks on papers, I proceeded on the principle that it is not necessary that the mark should be a cross [X], and that any other mark clearly indicating an intention to vote for a particular candidate would suffice. I also considered it not necessary that the mark should be on the right side of the paper. . . . It is to my knowledge that a large number of sheriffs of other counties proceeded on the same principle as I did, holding that the directions in the Act as to a cross on the right side of the candidate's name are merely illustrative of one of the best ways of putting the mark—not as prescribing the only way of doing so. But the Scotch Judges have adopted the rule that nothing but a cross on that side is admissible. I think, with deference to them, that this is wrong. I understand that the English Judges take the view on which I went."

That was to say that the practice of the largest city in Scotland was contrary to the decision of the highest Court of Scotland, and was supported by no decision but a municipal one in England—for it was idle to speak of mere hear-say as to the opinion of the English Judges. He maintained that that was not a satisfactory state of things. Hon. Members would be able, from their own experience, to confirm the statement that there were hardly two boroughs in England where exactly the same decisions had been given, which must certainly, in the case of a hotly-fought General Election next time, lead to an incredible number of Petitions accompanied by costly scrutiny. Mr. Pearson, an alderman of Stockport, had made a suggestion which ought to be considered by any Committee that might sit upon this subject—namely, that the ballot papers should be dark in colour with the exception of the square intended for the cross. Mr. Pearson had printed a large number of various forms of ballot paper of that kind, and they certainly made matters very much clearer for the voter than they were at present. Mr. Rayner, the experienced Town Clerk at Liverpool, had expressed his opinion in favour of Mr. Pearson's view. Mr. Pearson had been led to make that suggestion, by the fact that at the last municipal election at Stockport; the votes set aside amounted in the majority of the wards, although the election was very close, to 10 per cent of the total number polled; so that, subject to petition—and, as he had shown, the decisions on petition had been of an opposite character, one from another—the decisions of the ward aldermen as to the validity of doubtful votes gave, in many cases, the majority to one or other of the candidates at their discretion. A Committee would also probably re-open the question of whether the putting the cross against the name of the candidate for whom one voted was as simple a plan as that of striking out the name of the candidate against whom one voted, and judging from the letters that he had received from town clerks he should say that a majority of town clerks of English boroughs, who were on this subject the most experienced persons, considered that striking out was the better plan, although he himself did not share that opinion. One wrote,

"A voter says, 'I shan't support Blank'—'Then cross him off,' is the reply, and the vote is lost, even if it is not counted the wrong way."

The Town Clerk of Tiverton, like the Town Clerk of Leeds, had obtained a high legal opinion as to what, under the present law, was a properly-marked paper. In the Tiverton case, he (Sir Charles Dilke) had not leave to name the distinguished lawyer—also a Member of the late Government—whose opinion had been thus given, but he might say that it was directly at variance with the opinion of his learned Colleague, Lord Coleridge, for he held that the Act permitted of any mark—for instance, a mere tick—to be made, and that the Schedule was only directory, and not necessarily to be strictly followed so as to exclude votes. At Tiverton, where the contest was very close, a large proportion of votes, had, according to the town clerk, been rejected on account of two crosses being made instead of one, to indicate the voter's wish to plump, and of the cross being made on the name itself. Leaving the question of how the papers should be marked, he came to one only second to it in importance, and that was the subject of stamping. He had circulars in his possession from two rival firms, each of whom stated that there was nothing in the world so easy as to forge the marks of their rivals; and having carefully examined the subject, he was bound to say that both were right. Messrs. Shaw and Son, who had supplied a vast number of Returning Officers with perforating machines, and Messrs. Loevenheim, who manufactured the embossing machinery, abused one another in the choicest English. Now, the perforating machine had been most popular with the past Returning Officers, because it would do for ever and could be set to any design that might be wished. Mr. Gresham told the Committee on Returning Officers last year that—

“The perforator is an arrangement of pins of such a character, that if a man takes out his voting paper and shows it to a mechanic outside, and that if the mechanic has one of those perforators and arranges the pins to make the particular mark, he forges it within ten minutes. I myself will undertake to forge it in ten minutes.”

Now, he believed that statement to be absolutely true. Nevertheless, town clerks of such vast experience as Mr. Curwood in Leeds and those of others of the biggest boroughs in Ireland, were using those perforators and proclaiming their merits to their less experienced colleagues. The perforator worked very easily, and was therefore popular with Returning Officers; the embossing machine worked more stiffly—and whereas the perforating machine was pretty and simple, and spoilt very few papers, but was liable to be forged in ten minutes—on the other hand, the embossing machine, which took longer to forge, worked so stiffly that when a Returning Officer's hands got tired the mark made became so faint, that in the case of the Chelsea Election, for instance, they had to count—and did count by agreement—800 papers which would have been rejected by a judge, there having been on them but a very slight trace of the machine, they being equally divided between the two sides and not affecting the result of the election, and there being no reason to believe that any forgery had taken place; but still, they had only such a mark upon them as could, in fact, have been imitated by a thumb-nail. Sir Joseph Heron told him (Sir Charles Dilke) that at Manchester the number of unstamped papers was very large. But the whole question of stamping was one of exceeding difficulty. There was no check whatever upon “ballot-stuffing” frauds, except the official stamp on a ballot paper. A scrutiny cost so many thousands of pounds that an unscrupulous agent would run a good deal of risk to place his man at the head of the poll on the first occasion, and take his chance of a scrutiny. Now, he ventured to say that while the perforating machine was capable of easy forgery, there were very few large constituencies where the embossing machine was used; in which a sufficient number of papers were not wholly unstamped, or so improperly stamped that they would not have passed a Judge, as to affect the result of a return; and at the next General Election, when these things had been found out and appreciated by agents, a very pretty state of things for the lawyers would be the result. He might state a fact which came to his personal notice in the last election for Hackney, when he was representing the present Members in a booth on polling-day. The deputy Returning Officer, who stood in front of him, finding that when the pressure of voters was great, he could not supply them fast enough with papers, stamped a considerable number of papers before they were applied for, during those moments when there was less to do. He cautioned him as to the illegality of this proceeding, and as to its probable inconveniences, but he continued nevertheless. At last that happened which might have been foreseen—namely, that forgetting the point up to which he had stamped in advance, he issued a large number of papers in a wholly unstamped condition, and thus disfranchised a considerable number of voters. He had already expressed his opinion of the perforating shifting stamps. The embossed stamps, if frequently changed, would be good enough, if they worked more easily; but the designs being complicated ones,

Law on a Petition, in those cases where he had decided that only one agent of the candidate should be allowed to attend the counting, although there were many clerks engaged in it. On the other hand, as to the attendance of agents at the booths, the law was in such a state that it allowed the appointment of any number, who might crowd into the booth in the form of a perfect mob after they had once made their declarations of secrecy. The clause in the old Act, which was still in force, said that it should be lawful for any candidate to appoint an agent or agents to attend at each or any of "the booths." Sir Joseph Heron, the experienced Town Clerk of Manchester said, that the mode of counting ought to be prescribed by law, and he agreed with him. The numbers 1, 2, 3 and 4, which were placed on the left-hand side of the candidates' names, caused some confusion and were in the Act, he believed, by mistake. They had been put in to guide the illiterate voter, and were retained after another provision for the illiterate voter had been made. They confused the voter, and it was questionable whether they should not be omitted. On the other hand, whilst those were subjects which ought to be considered, there were many points connected with the Ballot Act which ought to be held to be outside the scope of the inquiry—for instance, the question whether there should or should not be a scrutiny. In the year in which the Ballot Bill passed, the Lords introduced a scrutiny, and they had weakened or made useless the clause inflicting penalties on the violation of secrecy. They had also somewhat relaxed the provisions relating to the illiterate voter. The two latter points remained in a condition of confusion, and needed inquiry. The former, or provision for the scrutiny, although personally strongly opposed to it, and although believing that it involved an immense amount of difficulty, he nevertheless felt bound to regard as an essential part of their present electoral law, and as one which must be viewed as being, until 1880, outside the scope of inquiry. Everything that could be said against the scrutiny, and by way of showing how unnecessarily it complicated the machinery of election, had been said by Sir Henry James, in 1872. Although the hours of polling had been dealt with by the Lords in the Ballot Act, still, as the hours had not been affected by the Bill in the form in which it ultimately passed, he should almost regard that as being also outside the scope of inquiry for the present. The strong point in the case for inquiry at the present time was that when the Committee sat and when the three Bills were discussed, even those Members who took the greatest interest in the question had less knowledge of the working of the Ballot than was now possessed by almost any hon. Member of the House, and it was curious now to look back, and notice what extravagant blunders were made and what misapprehensions prevailed. He made no allusion to a number of other points which had been raised last year by the hon. and learned Member for Derry and himself, because it seemed to him that the case, as it stood, was a sufficient one, and any one who wished to see them could find them in Hansard. By way of general remark he would say only this, that while opponents of the Ballot in general—if there were any, now that it received the support of the Conservative party—would probably desire inquiry in order to reveal the weakness, as they must think it, of the system; the strongest friends of the Ballot ought certainly to wish for it, because if they went to another General Election under the Ballot, without having cleared up these hard points, and all the wire-pullers in the constituencies being thoroughly informed upon the weak points of the Act, and having had ample time to consider the best modes of dealing with them, they would certainly have such a number of Petitions and scrutinies as to cause an outcry to be raised against the Ballot itself, and to seriously weaken the chance of its being continued when the new Bill was introduced—as it would have to be in 1880, immediately after the General Election itself. The hon. Baronet concluded by moving for the appointment of a Select Committee.

MR. CHARLES LEWIS, in seconding the Motion, said, that the exhaustive speech of the hon. Baronet the Member for Chelsea (Sir Charles Dilke) had left him but little to say in favour of an immediate inquiry being granted. On neither side of the House would there be any disposition to look upon the Ballot in an unfriendly spirit. In the main, both sides were actuated by one motive, which was to make such amendments in the Act as their past experience of its working told them to be necessary to prevent anything like wholesale disfranchisement. The old system had three advantages—namely, a minimum power of disfranchisement on the part of the Returning Officer, a minimum of disfranchisement in point of fact, and general uniformity of practice; and the new system had three correlative defects—namely, great power of disfranchisement, great disfranchisement in fact, and great diversity. The result was, that a great loss of votes took place under the change. At the last Tipperary election hundreds of votes were pronounced bad, and at the last Galway Borough election, out of 1,200 votes, 190 were bad. The practical disfranchisement of a constituency might result from two causes: either from ignorance, or incapacity on the part of the Returning Officer. At the last election for Tyrone it was found that an entire set of voting papers at one of the booths were without the official mark which it was the duty of the Returning Officer to place on them, and all the votes to which they related were in consequence rejected, without any default on the part of the voters, and without any means of setting the matter right. That fact proved the necessity of guarding quite as much against incapacity in the Returning Officer as in the voter. With respect to securing accuracy in the counting of the votes, that was entirely a matter of detail; but the very fact that it was a matter of detail—a matter at the same time of signal importance—formed one of the most cogent reasons why it should be remitted, amongst other things, to a Select Committee. The question of diminishing the expenses at elections ought also to form a subject of inquiry before the Select Committee. Both sides of the House were interested in taking care that everything should be done that was necessary to render the Ballot system perfect in all its details, especially where its defects led to the disfranchisement of voters, and he trusted that the Government would grant the proposed inquiry, as the interests of the constituents, above all things, required that the existing defects of the system should receive the earliest attention. By doing so, there would probably be few objections raised in future to a renewal of the Act.

Amendment proposed,

(Sir Charles W. Dilke.)

COLONEL MURE said, he should hardly have ventured to intrude on the attention of the House, had he not rather a strong personal case to put before them. He was returned for the county of Renfrewshire by a majority of 90 votes at the last General Election, and like all successful candidates, he was highly delighted at the result, because there were circumstances in his case which rendered his return rather a surprise to himself. He was surprised and not delighted however, a few weeks after, to find that a very remarkable Petition had been presented against his return. It was, in fact, a Petition quite unexampled in the history of elections in this country. It was simply this—There was no question as to the formalities, there was no question, either, as the validity of the votes recorded; but two ratepayers, under the powers of the Act, declared that in their opinion the votes had not been correctly counted. There was no prima facie ground for supposing that they had been wrongly counted, because the agents of both parties, as well as the Returning Officer, had been present at the counting. However, these two electors declared their belief that an error had been committed, and according to Scotch form the question was brought before the Court of Session, first on the point of revelancy, as to whether there was a prima facie case against him. He had to engage counsel, and he secured the services of the best to be had, and he was necessarily put to very considerable expense. The question of revelancy was decided against him and in favour of the Petitioners, on the ground that there could be no better instance of the invalidity of an election than the fact that the candidate who had polled the smallest number of votes should be returned. The objectors said—"We believe that the votes were not properly counted;" the other side said—"We believe that they were properly counted;"

and, consequently, the point of revelancy was sustained. At great expense and annoyance to himself the Petition was tried by the Court of Session; the numbers having been brought before the Court, were counted, and in the end it was found that he had been returned by two more votes than had first been credited to him. That was exceedingly satisfactory; but on the other hand, some people might say that was an argument in favour of bringing these charges, seeing that after all a mistake had been made; but he thought the House would see that the successful candidate was entirely at the mercy of two voters who declared that they did not think the numbers had been correctly counted. What he would suggest was very simple. That there should be a legal obligation on the agents of the respective candidates not to separate, or declare the result of the poll until they were agreed as to the correctness of the numbers polled on each side; and, further, that each agent should be bound to make a statutory declaration before the Returning Officer that he was satisfied with the correctness of the counting—such declaration being final and conclusive as to the question of numbers, but to have no bearing on the validity of the votes. Such a Petition as that to which he referred could not then be afterwards brought. It seemed to him extraordinary that some machinery had not been devised to settle the numbers on the night of the poll. He believed his was the only instance in which a Petition disputing the correctness of the counting had been presented, and he spoke to the late Attorney General on the subject, and he thought the matter was one worthy of the consideration of the present Law Officers of the Crown.

THE O'CONOR DON said, there was great hardship caused by the rejection of votes in cases where the presiding officer in any one of the polling booths had placed a mark upon the voting paper by which the voter could be identified. The provision of the Act on that point was intended to prevent the voter making known his vote in order to claim a reward; it was never meant that a voter who had voted in perfect good faith should be disfranchised by the act of another person. The result of the County of Leitrim election last year depended upon the reception or rejection of votes of that character. The matter had never been authoritatively decided, but it demanded careful consideration, for the objection on this account threw an enormous amount of power into the hands of the presiding officer, and it was therefore one that particularly wanted deciding at the hands of a Committee.

MR. MARK STEWART said, he thought the House ought to feel very much indebted to the hon. Baronet the Member for Chelsea (Sir Charles Dilke) for having brought the matter under their consideration, and he had made it quite clear that there ought to be some inquiry on the subject, so that the victims of the Ballot Act as it stood might not be martyred again when another election took place. The hon. and gallant Member for Renfrewshire (Colonel Mure) and his own were the only instances, he believed, of Petitions in Scotland, and that might be taken as a satisfactory result of the working of the Act in that country; but when great hardship fell upon any individual by the bad wording of a clause, or the difficulty of interpreting provisions, it was fair that they should come to this House and ask, at all events, that something should be done to repeal or alter those clauses. He was returned for the Wigtown Burghs, certainly by the narrow majority of 2, and every means was taken to ascertain whether or not he had been actually returned. The Returning Officer declared his election valid, and he accordingly took his seat in this House. But the opposite party embraced an early opportunity of presenting a Petition against him. The investigation into that Petition showed that the polling sheriffs had neglected to stamp three of his papers and he was disqualified from sitting in this House. That was a hard case, because the act of the polling sheriff, whether done advertently or inadvertently, was sufficient to vitiate an election. He was not there to impute anything to those officers who otherwise presided so efficiently at his election, but he considered the House ought to watch over the interests of its Members. Had his case come before an Election Committee of the House of Commons, he would not have been put to the annoyance and expense of a second election. That case was brought before the Court in Scotland, and some of the most learned on the

Had his case come before an Election Committee of the House of Commons, he would not have been put to the annoyance and expense of a second election. That case was brought before the Court in Scotland, and some of the most learned on the

Scotch Bench set themselves to decipher what the Act meant, and whether the Schedule was not to be taken as part of the Act or not, and whether the spirit or the mere letter of the Act was to govern any decision arrived at. The questions were argued by counsel by the hour, and the public could form but one opinion, and that was that the Act was inefficient as it stood, because what had been declared in many other instances to be good votes, were declared to be bad in his case; for instance, whether if the cross was a little to the right or left, whether it was a little above or a little below the name. After all this annoyance and anxiety, he came to his second election, when he increased his majority by six votes, but still it was thought necessary to petition against him, in the hope of finding out some flaw. A second time he had to undergo this annoyance, and one or two papers were again found not to be stamped at all. The polling sheriffs, who were engaged at great expense to the candidates, were alone to blame, it being no fault either of him or the constituency, and his second election was very nearly being voided through the carelessness and indifference of these officers. He thanked the House for having listened so patiently to what he had told them, and which was in his case a personal grievance.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, that his hon. Friend the Member for Chelsea (Sir Charles Dilke) had in his very fair statement referred to him so often that he trusted the House would permit him to say a few words. Having had to discharge the duty of framing the Ballot Act, he had looked forward to the Motion with a good deal of anxiety, lest a great deal of fault might justly have been found with the machinery. The clauses which set forth that machinery went through 14 or 15 revisions, and the Bill itself through a second edition; and it was due to himself to say that such complaints as had been made on the subject were not owing to any want of care, for he had taken great pains in framing the measure, and had the assistance of an able draftsman. But, besides the difficulty of adjusting an entirely new election machinery, there was much difficulty in carrying a measure of that kind through the House of Commons; and frequent alterations in Committee were a great danger to the correctness of the Bill. He was glad to find that no more flaws than those mentioned had been discovered in the Bill. As to the difficulty about the cross, he could speak as to what was the intention of the House in passing the Act—namely, that there was no intention of making the use of the cross compulsory, neither was it to be a disqualification if the voter did not put the cross in exactly the place or in the manner set out in the Schedule. The body of the Act simply required the voter to mark his paper; the first Schedule which laid down the actual rules was to the same effect; and the only allusion to the cross was in the last Schedule, containing directions for the guidance of voters. It would be most dangerous to the freedom of voting if the ruling of the Scotch Judges on this point were to affect elections generally, and in the result a great many fair and honest voters would be disqualified. That difficulty, however, might be met without a Select Committee. The House might strike out this direction in the Schedule, so as to render the present ruling in Scotland impossible in the future. His hon. Friend had brought forward several other blemishes. With regard to the illiterate voter, he could not help thinking that, with their experience, if the House had to pass the Act over again, there would be a large majority in favour of the provision which he had first brought in—namely, that there should be no special provision made for the illiterate voter. A very large proportion of those voters had not made use of the provision of the Act; but it was stated to have been used for the purpose of delaying an election. As to the Motion of his hon. Friend, he thought the time had come when it might be desirable for the Government to discover whether it was needful to amend the machinery of the Act or not, and he felt the most satisfactory mode of doing that would be by a Committee. It was for the Government to say whether it would be convenient to have a Committee that Session; but he thought they ought to have one in good time, before they were sent back to their constituents. Whatever might be the power given to the Committee, however it might be constituted, and whatever might be its Report, he thought the House should not lose sight of this consideration—that there was danger in prescribing absolute uniformity of practice. They must leave some discretion to the voter and to the Returning Officer. It was a difficult matter to guarantee uniformity, which might result in disqualification of the voter. On the other hand, he thought that any reasonable ground of doubt ought to be removed. He would only say further that he thought the time had come when inquiry would be advantageous.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, that whatever might be the opinion of individual Members as regarded the advantages or disadvantages of secret voting as established by the Ballot Act of 1872, they were all agreed in this—that inasmuch as it had been determined that that system should be adopted for a certain number of years, they should give it a fair trial. It would not, however, be receiving a fair trial if, when defects in its machinery were pointed out, measures were not taken for the purpose of curing them. He admitted, therefore, that it was desirable that an inquiry into its working should be instituted, for the purpose of ascertaining how improvements in it could be made. The hon. Baronet the Member for Chelsea had drawn attention to a number of defects in the practical working of the system, and, certainly many of them were very serious; and, on the hon. Baronet's showing, there was a grave question to be dealt with. It would be within the recollection of the House that in the course of the debate last year, the Secretary of State intimated that, inasmuch as the system of Ballot had had the test of one General Election, it would be desirable that its working should be considered before another election took place; and he believed there was now a very prevalent feeling that it would be advisable ere long to investigate the working of the Act. The hon. Baronet had adverted to a circumstance which pressed on the Government at the present time—namely, the number of Committees of importance now sitting. This rendered it undesirable to appoint a Committee during the present Session; but he (the Attorney General) felt he was in a position, on the part of the Government, to make this statement—that next Session they would be prepared either to deal with the question by legislation, or by moving for the appointment of a Select Committee, with a view to legislation taking place. Under those circumstances, he suggested to his hon. Friend that the present Motion should be withdrawn, and the matter left with the Government on the understanding he had pointed out.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, that the suggestion of the hon. and learned Gentleman entirely met his view, and he would accordingly consent to withdraw the Motion.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

CRIMINAL LAW—CASE OF LUKE HILLS.

MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS.

MR. P. A. TAYLOR, in rising to call attention to the case of Luke Hills, an agricultural labourer, sentenced by the Cuckfield Magistrates to three months' imprisonment, on a charge of breach of contract; and to move—

“That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that She will be graciously pleased to grant a free pardon to the prisoner.”

said, the case reminded one of the high-handed proceedings of the magistrates of the last century, and was such as he would rather have expected to have read of in the novels of Fielding or Smollett, than to meet with as an actual occurrence in the 19th century. The case raised a question as to whether justice could be properly administered by an unpaid magistracy. It appeared that in November, 1874, Hills entered the service of Captain Hyde; that in February last he gave a fortnight's notice to leave; and on that notice being given, the latter intimated to him, for the first time, that his engagement was of a permanent nature, the only written evidence being a memorandum said to have been made by Captain Hyde's son in a pocket-book at the time of hiring. He was thereupon brought before the magistrates on the charge of leaving his employment, and was fined £5, in addition to £3 18s. 2d. costs, or in default sentenced to imprisonment for three months. Now, Hills, who was 50 years of age or so, and who had obtained a good character from his last master, was simply ruined by such a sentence, for if he remained three months in gaol the stigma of being a gaol-bird would attach to him, and he would find it difficult in future to obtain employment. There was some dispute as to the amount of costs; but he could only say that the answer of the magistrates, given through their local clerk, did not say that £3 18s. 2d. was incorrect. There was, he might add, no pretence that there existed any written agreement between Hills and his employer; and the man and his wife had declared that not only had no memorandum ever been read to them to the effect that there was a yearly engagement, but that no such engagement had never been entered into. The magistrates had before them the statement made on the one side and the statement made on the other, and he knew no reason why the word of a working man of good character should have been utterly disbelieved by the Bench any more than that of his employer. But it was determined that the man should be convicted, and the magistrates accepted the employer's own estimate of the damage he had sustained through the man's leaving him. The man was a carter, and when he left his employer had only to get a new carter. What damage the master sustained it was difficult to see; but he nevertheless declared it to amount to something like £10, and Hills was sent to prison for three months. As to the legality of that decision he was informed by a magistrate and a lawyer that there was no summary jurisdiction in justices of the peace or petty sessions to determine questions of contract under the Master and Servant Act, except under the provisions of a former statute of George IV., and that that only applied to contracts in writing that were signed by both parties, which was not the case in the present instance. But, however, it might be legally, he unhesitatingly said that that decision was an act of gross oppression and tyranny. When Captain Hyde took Luke Hills before the Bench, composed as it was, he took him to a foregone doom. Hills was not tried by his peers, but by men who, if not aliens to him in blood and religion, were at least aliens to him in their interests, sympathies, and associations. They were employers—not employed. Six men taken entirely from the locked-out workmen in South Wales to try a dispute between their own class and their masters would be as fair a tribunal as that which tried that poor labourer. The case had excited considerable feeling in the neighbourhood, and a memorial, signed by some hundreds of the inhabitants, was sent to the Home Office praying for the release of Hills, who had been one month in prison. Pressure had been applied to prevent people from signing such a memorial, and he feared that those who had interested themselves in the matter would have reason to regret that they had done so. The memorialists received no answer from the Home Office, beyond a bare acknowledgment of the receipt of their memorial, and he thought the matter was entitled to greater attention from that Department. On the 9th of March the Home Secretary informed him, in reply to a Question, that he had had an answer that morning from the magistrates, but that he had not yet had time to read it. The magistrates, he thought, should have been requested to send an earlier answer. On the 8th of March a communication was sent from the Home Office to Brighton, saying that the right hon. Gentleman had thoroughly examined the case, and had come to the conclusion that he could not interfere. The right hon. Gentleman said he was not aware of that letter; but there ought to be some inquiry how it came to be sent, for it looked as if there was somebody behind the right hon. Gentleman greater than he was in his own Department. On the 11th the right hon. Gentleman endorsed the decision of the Bench, saying they had acted with perfect justice, benevolence, and kindness; but as the Labour Law Commission suggested that there should be no criminal punishment for simple breach of contract, the right hon. Gentleman recommended that the man should be freed from the rest of his sentence. On Monday, when asked if Hills had been released, the right hon. Gentleman said there had been some hitch, or he would have been released; but that from the form of the committal there was some doubt whether the pardon of Her Majesty would run. He, however, hoped it would be the opinion of the House that means should be discovered for liberating that poor man, and for removing the stain which at present attached to his character. The hon. Member concluded by moving the Amendment.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words

"an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that She will be graciously pleased to grant a free pardon to Luke Hills, an agricultural labourer, sentenced by the Cuckfield Magistrates to three months' imprisonment, on a charge of breach of contract,"—(Mr. P. A. Taylor.)

—instead thereof.

MR. GREGORY thought that, although there could be little doubt as to the legality of that decision, as there were, in fact, two statutes, either of which would warrant it, its propriety was another question, and might be a fair subject of discussion. As one of the Representatives of the county the case had come under his notice, for he had received a statement referring to it, but previous to coming to an opinion upon it, it occurred to him that there might be two sides to the question. He accordingly put himself in communication with the magistrates' clerk, and there had been no delay in forwarding him an answer on the matter. The version of the story that had reached him was somewhat different from that put forward by the hon. Member for Leicester (Mr. Taylor), and in laying it before the House, he would say that, as the hon. Member had referred to two eminent novelists, he (Mr. Gregory) would refer to another novelist of a more modern time, the late Mr. Thackeray, who laid down this great principle—that there was not a piece of mischief in the world without a woman being at the bottom of it. Captain Hyde swore that the man in question had entered into a contract with him for a year's service at 18s. a-week, and he was corroborated in that statement by his son, who produced a minute made by himself at the time to that effect, and, therefore, unless these two gentlemen were guilty of wilful and corrupt perjury, their account of the transaction must be taken to be true. It was further proved, in corroboration of this, that Captain Hyde had been to some trouble and expense in moving the goods of the man and of his family from a distant part of the country to his neighbourhood. It was true that the man's wife had declared that no statement was made at the time that the hiring was to be a yearly one; but both Captain Hyde and his son swore that the woman was not present when the contract was made, and the man himself declined to be put upon his oath, and to give evidence in support of his wife's story. Under these circumstances, what were the magistrates to do? Were they to believe the evidence upon oath which was before them, or were they to act upon the mere statement of the woman which her husband refused to confirm upon oath? As they believed the evidence of Captain Hyde and his son, the case resolved itself into one of mere damages. Captain Hyde satisfied the magistrates that through the breach of contract on the part of the man he had sustained damage to the amount of £9; but as he had only claimed £5, they limited their order to that amount in addition to the costs, which were 18s. 6d., and not £3 18s. 6d., as stated by the hon. Member, and instead of issuing their warrant for the payment of the £5 18s. 6d. at once, they gave the man a fortnight to make up the sum or effect some arrangement. To this order the man made no objection at the time; but his wife having subsequently advised him not to pay the money, he unfortunately followed her advice, and refused to comply with the terms of the order. The magistrates upon that had no alternative left them, except to sentence him to imprisonment in default, but without hard labour, telling him, at the same time, that he could obtain his release from prison at any time on payment of the fine. The man, therefore, was now in prison for non-payment of the sum of £5 18s. 6d., and he could not help thinking that the hon. Member, and those petitioners who felt so much sympathy with the prisoner, would have done better if, instead of bringing the matter before the House, they had subscribed the necessary sum to pay the fine, and so have obtained the man's release at once; and at all events, he trusted that the House would not lightly interfere in a matter of this kind, where a man was suffering imprisonment for wilfully refusing to obey the legal order of the magistrates.

SIR HENRY JAMES hoped that he should be acquitted of any desire to interfere with the course of justice or to throw any impediments in the way of magistrates discharging their important and often very difficult duties; but he could not help pointing out that the hon.

Member for East Sussex (Mr. Gregory) had altogether failed to answer the legal objection that had been taken to the conviction. He should, therefore, wish to ask the Home Secretary whether, in his opinion, the conviction of this man was legal or not? The hon. Member for East Sussex had said that some doubt existed under which of two Acts the conviction had been obtained, but he must know that the terms of the conviction itself must show under which Act it was obtained. The version of the story which had been given to the House that evening by the hon. Member varied in some of its details from that which had appeared in the newspapers; but the hon. Member had not informed the House that the contract in question was one that could never have been enforced in any Civil Court, it being, according to Captain Hyde's own account, for a year's service to commence on a future day, and not being in writing it was void under the Statute of Frauds. The prisoner, therefore, had been sentenced to imprisonment for the non-payment of damages for breaking a contract which could not have been enforced before a Civil Court. The Schedule of the Act of 1867—under which this conviction must have been made—set forth all the forms of contracts of service to which the Act applied, and he wished that the Home Secretary would point to the particular contract set forth in that Schedule which had been broken by the prisoner, so as to bring him within the operation of the statute. If the right hon. Gentleman was unable to do that, it would be a grave question whether the conviction was legal in any sense. It would, perhaps, be too late now to take steps to set aside the imprisonment, and he was afraid that, owing to the technical reason that the imprisonment was for the non-payment of damages, the Crown itself had no power to grant a pardon. [Mr. ASSHETON CROSS assented.] Under those circumstances, where the legal question was involved in so much doubt, he did not think that the House would press the right hon. Gentleman to interfere in the matter. The case, however, revealed a very sad state of the law, because it appeared that the doubtful decision of the magistrates, resulting in the unjust imprisonment of one of our fellow-subjects, was, for all practical purposes, final and irreversible, and that it was even beyond the power of the Home Secretary to set matters right. The magistrates had found a doughty champion in his hon. Friend the Member for East Sussex, but what he had stated did not appear to have been stated by the magistrates' clerk who was present. That was comparatively a small matter; but when the hon. Member said that this was the man's own fault, because he did not accept the alternative given to him, it must be remembered that that alternative was that his home should be broken up, and his wife and himself turned into the streets without shelter.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS hoped that the House would be very cautious as to the course it adopted in this matter. The case was disposed of under the Act of 1867; but he did not intend at the present moment to enter upon the question of the wisdom or the non-wisdom of that Act, because he intended to bring the subject under the notice of the House shortly after Easter. He hoped that the House would also be very careful that it did not enter into a discussion of two questions which it was perfectly incompetent to enter upon—first, the question whether the conviction was or was not right in law; and, secondly, whether, upon the bare statements of two Members of the House, however honourable, they would venture to come to a conclusion upon a question of fact that had been already determined by persons who had heard all the evidence upon it. He thought if the House discussed questions of law or fact in such cases, except in very flagrant cases, it would be entering upon a very dangerous course indeed. His attention having been called by the Notice given by the hon. Member for Leicester (Mr. P. A. Taylor), he went through the Papers, and thought that the case was worthy of grave consideration. In administering the law of 1867 as a magistrate he had always thought that the powers under the statute ought to be very leniently exercised. In the present case, the magistrates had before them the question of fact, whether this man was a yearly servant or not. He certainly thought that if he had been one of the magistrates, and if he had been aware of the unanimous Report of the Commission which sat to inquire into the operation of the Act, he should have administered that Act in a more lenient spirit. However, the magistrates had not that advantage, and they dealt with it in the ordinary way. They found that Luke Hills was a yearly servant who had broken his contract, and he was not convicted, but was ordered to pay a certain sum for damages. He was a carter, and it was no doubt held that he might have caused considerable loss to his employer. As to the amount, the magistrates decided that question upon the evidence before them. Under all the circumstances, he should have advised Her Majesty to allow the man to be discharged if it had been in Her Majesty's power to do so; but, after consulting those to whom he looked for legal advice, he found that, as the order was for the payment of damages—whether right or wrong he would not discuss—the power of the Crown did not run, and that to release a person who was imprisoned for debt would be interfering with the rights of one subject as against another. There was, therefore, no course open to him in the way of interfering. As it was impossible for the Crown, if the Motion were carried, to exempt the man from the penalty, he trusted that the hon. Member for Leicester would not press his Motion to a division that would be futile.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he thought that the remarks of the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary were a perfect justification to his hon. Friend the Member for Leicester (Mr. P. A. Taylor) for bringing the question before the House, and if the conclusion were a right one upon that Act of Parliament, the House had lost that power, which it once possessed, in reference to the detention of subjects of the Crown. It appeared that if the Home Secretary could carry out his wish he would advise a free pardon, and that strongly justified his hon. Friend the Member for Leicester; and it was a strong opinion that they should not leave the Act of 1867 in the position in which it stood. He was glad that the right hon. Gentleman proposed to call the attention of the House to the operation of the Act soon after Easter, as should there be a repetition of these cases the operation of the law would be most disadvantageous to the community, for they could not take up a newspaper without seeing that breaches of contract were very frequent, and the damage which they occasioned to persons was much greater than the loss of £9 by Captain Hyde. In the case under notice this man had been sent to prison for three months because he had broken a civil contract, while hon. Members of this House could break civil contracts without any such consequences.

MR. MACDONALD agreed in thinking that the hon. Member for Leicester was fully justified in bringing the question before the House. Cases of the kind were occurring daily, and he therefore trusted on that account the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department would bring in a measure after Easter which would allow a full discussion of the subject.

MR. M. D. SCOTT said, he did not complain that the hon. Member for Leicester (Mr. P. A. Taylor) should have brought the question before the House, but he did complain of his having done so upon imperfect information of the facts, and he also complained of the hon. Member having used hard words against the magistrates who determined the case. He spoke from personal knowledge, and not from hearsay, and he could say they were men who did all they could for the welfare of their neighbourhood and their fellow-creatures, and who were beloved by all around them. They knew how to do their duty mercifully, but they were appointed to carry out the law, and it was unbecoming of an hon. Member who could know nothing of these gentlemen to stigmatize them as tyrants and oppressors. Such language was deserving of the severest reprobation.

MR. P. A. TAYLOR said, it was no use pressing a Motion asking for a free pardon, which it would be impossible for Her Majesty to grant. He hoped, however, the discussion would do good, in the way of hindering the occurrence of similar cases, and in that view he would withdraw the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

CRIMINAL LAW—UNCONVICTED PRISONERS—PRISON REGULATIONS.

OBSERVATIONS.

SIR WILLIAM FRASER, in rising to call attention to the Regulations for the Government of Prisons approved by the Home Secretary as regards persons waiting for bail or remanded by a magistrate, and to the infraction of such rules in the Clerkenwell House of Detention, said, that after the warning he received last night he would do what he could to avoid bringing down upon himself and his subject the ridicule of the Home Secretary. There was something ludicrous, no doubt, in persons who were waiting for bail, or who had been remanded by a magistrate, scrubbing their own cells; but he would remind the right hon. Gentleman that when Cawnpore was taken the native chiefs who had participated in the mutiny were compelled to scrub floors as the most degrading act which it was possible for human beings to perform. He would now refer to a case of which he had no personal knowledge, but the particulars of which had been communicated to him by letter. A man named Mackay, living at 32, Coleman Street, near the Bank of England, was charged with some trifling offence, for which no punishment was inflicted upon him beyond being required to find bail for his appearance if called upon. His friends were not in London, and during the interval which elapsed before they entered into the required recognizance, he was detained in Holloway Prison, where he was obliged, although labouring under an attack of bronchitis and acute rheumatism, to scrub stone floors, on one occasion for eight hours almost continuously, with cold water; and the effect upon him was that he had to be removed to the hospital. Those were the facts of the case, and, if incorrect, he would hand the author of them over to the tender mercies of the House. They all remembered the case of the foreign clergyman who, about two years ago, having been arrested on a charge which was dismissed, was compelled to scrub the asphalt floor of his cell, and perform other menial offices. He, as a magistrate, had visited the House of Detention in which that gentleman was confined, and ascertained that all unconvicted prisoners were treated in the same way, while there were many unconvicted prisoners in the House of Detention who would be glad, for a trifling consideration, to do the work. He therefore gave notice at the Quarter Sessions of a motion to abolish that part of the rule which referred to the cleaning of their cells by prisoners on remand, and, after a very stormy discussion, on demanding a poll, found that the resolution was carried; and not lost, as the Chairman had declared it to be. No alteration had, however, since been made in the practice, and he could only suppose that the amendment of the rule had not received the sanction of the Secretary of State. In his opinion, however, the broad principle of justice required that the change he recommended should be made on behalf of a friendless and obscure class of persons who might be innocent; who frequently were proved to be innocent; and had, at all events, not been shown to be guilty. He sincerely hoped that view would be acted upon by the Government, especially as he understood, from what had passed between them, that it was in accordance with the wishes of the right hon. Gentleman. With respect to what had occurred last night, he might be permitted to say that, having been a Member of the House before the right hon. Gentleman, he had never seen a Minister turn round to his Party and ask for a cheer, without eliciting a response to his call; but he had never before known a person in the eminent position of the right hon. Gentleman to turn round to his own Party and, speaking to a humble and constant supporter, ask for the derision which the right hon. Gentleman had succeeded in obtaining yesterday.

MR. W. S. STANHOPE, in cases such as the one which had been brought under notice, regarded it as a defect in the law that an innocent person, who was unavoidably injured by its action, could not obtain compensation for the wrong which he sustained. He should be very glad if that fact were taken into consideration by Her Majesty's Government.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON regretted that, having spoken once upon the Motion to which that of the hon. and gallant Gentleman was an Amendment, his right hon. Friend the Home Secretary was precluded from replying to the Amendment and the observations which had been made by its Mover. With regard to the Amendment itself, he could assure his hon. and gallant Friend that the subject which he had brought under the notice of the House was one to which the attention of the Government had never been called. The Inspector General of Prisons stated in his last Report that there had been no complaint with regard to the rules and regulations for the treatment of prisoners. It was only that morning that the Home Office had received any complaint with regard to the particular case to which his hon. and gallant Friend had referred, and he could assure him that no time would be lost in inquiring into the facts. That being so, he hoped the Amendment would not be pressed to a Division.

MR. DISRAELI: I feel it my duty to make a few remarks upon certain observations of my hon. and gallant Friend, which I heard him make with regret, in reference to the manner in which my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department received his Question in reference to this subject yesterday. I have for many years known my hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Kidderminster; I have valued his acquaintance, and I am very glad to see him again in the House of Commons; but I cannot but feel that on this occasion he has shown a sensitiveness for which really there was no adequate reason. I happened to be in the House when the Question was asked by my hon. and gallant Friend; I heard the Answer of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, and, as both an impartial witness, and an old friend of the hon. and gallant Member I must express my own feeling as to what occurred—namely, that nothing of the kind which my hon. and gallant Friend has expressed was ever intended by the Secretary of State. If the House was fuller I could appeal to many hon. Members to confirm my view of what passed. I think that has occurred on this occasion, which in this House happens to all of us sometimes, and at this time it happened to my hon. and gallant Friend, to misunderstand an observation or an action. I am authorized by my right hon. Friend, who by the Rules of the House is unable again to speak, to state that nothing was further from his mind than to express by word or action any such feeling as my hon. and gallant Friend has described, and which he will, I trust, from this moment discard from his mind.

SIR WILLIAM FRASER said, he would withdraw his Amendment.

(Mr. Secretary Cross, Mr. Selater-Booth, Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress 18th March.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, he wished at the outset to express his regret that any observations he used on the previous evening had been understood by hon. Members to reflect on the hon. and learned Member for Salford (Mr. Cawley) and give him pain. Nothing was further from his intentions than to use observations which could have been interpreted or understood in any such sense.

MR. CAWLEY said, though he admitted that the observations of his right hon. Friend did for a moment give him pain, and were noticed by other hon. Members, he most cordially accepted the explanation which he had given. He was sure, from his personal knowledge of his right hon. Friend, that he could not have had any intention to cause pain or annoyance to any hon. Member.

Clause 3 (Local authority on being satisfied by official representation of the unhealthiness of district to make scheme for its improvement.)

On the Motion of Mr. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH, Amendment made, in page 2, line 18, by inserting after "local authority," the words—

"That any houses, courts, or alleys within a certain area under the jurisdiction of the local authority are unfit for human habitation or."

On the Motion of Mr. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH, Amendment made, in line 23, after "area," by inserting—

"or to the want of light, air, ventilation, or proper conveniences, or to any other sanitary defects."

MR. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH, in moving, as an Amendment, in page 2, line 29, to leave out from "if satisfied," to "shall," in line 32, inclusive, and insert "shall, unless they show cause to the contrary," said, he objected very much to the manner in which the clause was drawn, which, in his opinion, would make it inoperative. If a local authority were to have a debate, on the proposal of a resolution in favour of an improvement scheme, as to whether the official representation made to them was true, as to the practicability of applying a remedy, the sufficiency of their resources, and the advantage to be derived by the locality from the application of the proposed remedy, there would be serious risk that no resolution would ever be passed.

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY supported the Amendment as necessary against recalcitrant and reluctant local authorities. When a nuisance was ascertained, the local authority ought to be required to remove it, at whatever cost.

MR. GOLDNEY thought the Amendment of the hon. Member for Hastings (Mr. Kay-Shuttleworth) was much too extensive, as the Bill sufficiently provided otherwise against hostile efforts by unwilling vestrymen and others. The whole country would be thrown into a state of confusion if local authorities were compelled to apply a remedy without satisfying themselves that it was feasible.

SIR ANDREW LUSK believed the hon. and learned Member for Poole (Mr. Evelyn Ashley) was wrong in supposing that local authorities did not care a farthing about sanitary improvement. The local authorities throughout the Kingdom, he believed, did care for the health and the general well-being of the people in their districts. As to the metropolitan authorities, he knew they devoted a great deal of time and trouble to the well-being of those around them. He was against the Amendment.

MR. SHAW-LEFEVRE suggested that the only condition which the clause need express was contained in the words "if satisfied of the truth thereof," which might be left standing and the other conditional passages omitted. The question of sufficiency of resources was a consideration which the local authorities were certain to entertain sufficiently.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, that the clause had been drawn with great care, and, in his opinion, the terms of it were correct. He thought the confirming authority should be at liberty to exercise all moral, but not legal pressure, in the first instance, and that it should have every opportunity of making the necessary inquiries respecting the state of a given area. He should be quite willing to strike out the third "if" and the passage in which it occurred. In the metropolis he believed very great action would be taken under the Bill, and, although, of course, the effect would not be immediate, he expected that after a few years London would be quite a different place from what it was at present. He was disinclined, in the first instance, to compel the law to be carried out irrespective of any judgment as to resources.

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY remarked that the Labouring Classes Lodging House Act, passed in 1851, had been carried into effect by only one local authority—namely, Huddersfield.

MR. MACGREGOR felt inclined to support the Home Secretary. In the three burghs he represented, great things had been done by the municipalities in regard to drainage and the improvement of the public health.

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH was happy to be able to testify to the remarkable readiness of sanitary authorities, speaking generally, to undertake works of improvement.

MR. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH said, that as the Home Secretary had met him half-way, he would withdraw his Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. CAWLEY, in moving, as an Amendment, in page 2, line 36, after "area," to insert—

"And if it shall appear necessary or expedient to purchase any or all of the lands and buildings within such area, or to alter, vary, or stop up any streets within such area, or to make any new street therein, they shall apply for a Provisional Order for the same in the manner provided by the Local Government Acts, and the scheme shall be deemed to be an undertaking under those Acts,"

said, he proposed the addition with a view of simplifying the working of the Act, unless some reason could be shown for adopting a Provisional Order other than the Provisional Orders which could now be obtained. At present local authorities could obtain powers to purchase lands, make new streets, and otherwise improve a town. It was now proposed to re-enact what was enacted by other Acts, and he could not see the necessity of establishing a new form of Provisional Order differing only slightly from that which already existed. Such a multiplication of Acts was quite unnecessary.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, the Amendment would no doubt shorten the Bill, but it would not accomplish the purpose which the Government had in view as to the object of the Bill. In the first place, these Local Government Acts did not apply to the metropolis. In the second place, if the Amendment were adopted, it would give to the Bill too much of the character of a Towns' Improvement Act. This might seem a technical, but it was really a substantial, distinction. He did not wish this Bill to be dealt with as one passed for the purpose of beautifying towns. It was simply a Bill for improving the wretched and unhealthy rookeries which were to be found in towns, for re-building them in such a form as would be least expensive to the ratepayers, and, above all, for providing proper accommodation for the people who were displaced. One thread ran through the Bill, and he did not want to break it. Moreover, it was desirable that all the provisions of the Bill should be contained within the four corners of the Bill itself. Although he knew his hon. and learned Friend took a great interest in the Bill, yet, if his proposal were adopted, it would break through the arrangement, and for that reason he could not accept the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH said, he rose to move an Amendment which would bring within the scope of the Bill spaces cleared under the provisions of Torrens's Act. These spaces frequently remained a long time unoccupied, and became an eyesore and a nuisance. A space of this kind belonging to the Foundling Hospital had been for some time unoccupied. He was happy to say that within the last few days it had been disposed of to the Peabody Trustees. Under his Amendment such a space might be made available for the purposes of the Act. He would move, in line 36, at end of Clause, to add—

"Where, under the provisions of 'The Artizans and Labourers Dwellings Act, 1868' (31 and 32 Vic. c. 130), any houses occupied wholly or partly by persons of the working class have been or may hereafter be demolished, and an area has been or shall have been thus cleared, the local authority may, if they think fit, pass a resolution to the effect that an improvement scheme ought to be made in respect of such area, and after passing such resolution they shall forthwith proceed as aforesaid."

MR. GOLDNEY said, it was impossible to accept the Amendment without going beyond the scope of the Bill. It was equally impossible for the local authority to say that a vacant space was a source of injury to the public health; and to take that ground for the purpose of the Bill would be an unwarrantable interference with the rights of property.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, the Bill carefully avoided touching property which was not pronounced injurious to the public health; and owners of these cleared spaces might naturally say—"Why take this building land from us, when the nuisance you complained of has been removed?" He argued that the Amendment would interfere unduly with the rights of property, and he must therefore oppose it.

SIR ANDREW LUSK said, that people ought not to be tied down in the way proposed. Unless a man was at liberty to let his land in a way commercially advantageous, no matter what theories they might hold, they would fail.

MR. SHAW-LEFEVRE was of opinion that the object of the Provision—namely, that an alternative should be left to the local authorities to proceed either under the Act of 1868 or the present Bill—was desirable and should be carried out, if possible.

MR. CAWLEY was of opinion that the Bill would not work satisfactorily, unless it gave power to take more land than that it was immediately dealing with. He, however, did not think it would be wise to effect that object in the form proposed by the hon. Member for Hastings.

MR. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH said, his object was that the very worst places should be dealt with by the Bill. Obviously, the local authorities would see the advantage of putting Torrens's Act into operation with respect to those places; but when they had done so, they would have no power to build under this Bill. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would re-consider the matter before the Report.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

On the Motion of Sir HENRY SELWING-IBBETSON (for Mr. DUNDAS), Amendment made by adding at end of Clause—

"Provided always, That no person being beneficially interested in any lands within such area shall vote as member of the local authority upon such resolution, or upon any question relating to the purchase or taking of lands in which he is so interested."

On the Motion of Mr. Secretary CROSS (for Mr. STANSFELD), Amendment made by adding at end of Clause—

"Provided always, That any number of such areas may be included in one improvement scheme."

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 4 (Official representation by whom to be made).

MR. ASSHETON CROSS moved, as an Amendment, in page 2, lines 39 and 40, to leave out—

"To such board or vestry, who shall forthwith forward the same," and insert "or by such medical officer as is hereafter in this Act mentioned."

SIR ANDREW LUSK objected to giving so much power to medical officers, who, although well educated and intelligent, were often crotchety and defective in judgment. Why should they ignore the vestries and other local authorities? In his own constituency he knew that the members of the vestries were men of great intelligence and ability. They were elected by their fellow-ratepayers, and were therefore representative men. He thought that the House of Commons should be very careful in setting aside the authorities, who represented the principle of local self-government, and who were the proper persons to decide on questions which affected those who elected them. Taxation and representation should go together, and whatever might be said against vestries, they were at least as much to be trusted in such matters as a medical officer with a salary of £100 or £200 a-year, whose opinion might happen to be biased by a variety of causes. Those who elected the vestries would have to pay the costs of any improvements, and ought to have a voice in the matter. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would be able in some way so to shape the clause as to give that power.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, he had a very high opinion of local self-government and of the general intelligence of local authorities, who though undoubtedly doing a great deal, yet did not at all times do what one wished them. For the purposes of the Bill they must take things as they found them, and he would point out to the hon. Baronet that he did not by the Bill in the slightest degree interfere with the principle of local self-government, or sever taxation from representation. In the early part of the Bill the Committee had settled that the Metropolitan Board was to be the authority to put the Act in force, and there would be no use in having an intermediate authority. As the Bill was originally drawn, the medical officer was required to report to the local authorities. Some of the vestries had objected to this, and seeing that the Metropolitan Board was elected by the metropolitan vestries, they constituted, though not directly, a representative body. They were to be the local authority for the metropolis without the boundaries of the City, and what was now proposed was simply to do away with the Report to an intermediate body. The vestries would not be charged with the removal of rookeries; the Metropolitan Board would; and it was better to fix the responsibility on the body which would have to take action in these matters. So long as it existed as it was, it was the authority which ought to administer this Bill.

Amendment agreed to; words substituted.

SIR SYDNEY WATERLOW moved, as an Amendment, in page 3, line 2, to leave out "twenty" and insert "six." Its object was to obviate the cumbersome nature of the quantity of persons named in the Bill to be able to make a complaint to the medical officer.

COLONEL BERESFORD, who had given Notice of a similar proposal, said, it would be extremely difficult, as it was unnecessary, to get so large a number as 20 ratepayers to lodge a complaint.

MR. HARDCASTLE thought the Amendment which he would propose better than the one under notice. It was in page 3, line 2, to leave out "twenty," and insert—

"Two or more justices of the peace acting within the jurisdiction for which he is medical officer, or twelve."

His object in putting two or more justices of the peace was in order to give additional support to the medical officer upon whom devolved an important duty in carrying out the Act.

MR. HERMON said, he thought six were too few for the purpose desired.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, after consideration, he would accept the Amendment of the hon. Member for South-East Lancashire. He approved of 12, but had not put down any Amendment, because he could accept that of which Notice had been given.

Amendment (Sir Sydney Waterlow) by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment (Mr. Hardcastle) agreed to.

MR. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH moved, as an Amendment, in page 3, line 7, after "officer," to insert "within three weeks from the date of such complaint."

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, he had no objection to insert the word "forthwith," in lieu of the words proposed.

MR. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH accepted the proposal.

Amendment agreed to : word inserted.

MR. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH moved, as an Amendment, in page 3, line 10, at end of Clause, to add—

"The Local Government Board may, at any time when they deem it necessary to make a special inquiry into the sanitary condition of any part of any urban sanitary district, send one or more medical officer or officers to make such inquiry, who, after making such inquiry, may make an official representation to the Local Government Board, who shall forward it to the local authority, and such representation shall have the same incidents as if made by the medical officer of health of such authority."

MR. LYON PLAYFAIR hoped the Home Secretary would accept the Amendment. There was the utmost variety of medical officers in regard to qualification and salary. In many cases the salary was merely nominal, a medical officer of health being appointed just to comply with the Act. It was wise to empower the Local Government Board, when some great scandal occurred, to send down their own medical officer to institute an inquiry.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, the proper time to discuss this proviso was on Clause 9, which related to the metropolis.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

COLONEL BERESFORD moved, as an Amendment, in page 3, line 10, at end of Clause, add—

"Every registrar, when required by a vestry or district board, shall transmit by post or otherwise a return, certified under the hand of such registrar to be a true return, of such of the particulars registered by him concerning any death as may be specified in the requisition of the sanitary authority."

"The sanitary authority may supply a form of the prescribed character for the purpose of the return, and, in that case, the return shall be made in the form so supplied."

"The registrar making such return shall be entitled to a fee of two pence, and to a further fee of two pence for every death entered in such return, which fee shall be paid by the authority requiring the Return."

MR. GOLDNEY thought that such a provision would be to encumber the Bill, and was really a clause amending the law relating to the registration of births and deaths.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, although fully aware of its importance, he had not dealt with the question in this Bill, because he thought it should be dealt with in some other measure, such as the Public Health Act now before the House, and it was in that way that he proposed to do what was necessary. He hoped the hon. Member would withdraw the Amendment, and he would consult the Local Government Board about it.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 5 (Requisites of improvement scheme of local authority).

MR. ASSHETON CROSS moved, as an Amendment, in page 3, line 12, after "estimates," to insert—

"It may exclude any part of the area in respect of which an official representation is made, or include any neighbouring lands if the local authority are of opinion that such exclusion is expedient or inclusion is necessary for making their scheme efficient for sanitary purposes, it may also provide for widening any existing approaches to the unhealthy area, or otherwise for opening out the same for the purposes of ventilation and health. Also."

MR. CAWLEY moved an Amendment with the object of providing for "lands" instead of "neighbouring lands," as proposed by the Home Secretary. The right hon. Gentlemen was endeavouring to do that which would be absolutely impossible in many towns, and if his proposal were carried it would defeat the object of the Bill.

MR. SHAW-LEFEVRE proposed to amend the Amendment by inserting words, the object of which was to enable the local authority to add other lands and houses to those already condemned by the medical officers, on the ground that such additions were necessary to develop fully the valuable building sites for the purpose of this Act. The difference between the Amendment of the Home Secretary and his Amendment was this—the right hon. Gentleman bore in mind sanitary considerations only, but he (Mr. Shaw-Lefevre) added other considerations.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, he was bound to stick to his original Amendment, as this was essentially a sanitary measure, and ought not to be made use of for building and speculative purposes.

MR. WHITWELL thought the Amendment solved the difficulty, and would provide for the accommodation of the persons who might be displaced by improvements. He was quite willing to give a dispensing power to the proper authority in this matter. He had introduced in the Bill a provision of the Lands Clauses Act, which enabled persons to take lands, and unless it be absolutely necessary, he did not desire to make the power compulsory.

Amendments (Mr. Shaw-Lefevre and Mr. Cawley), by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment (Mr. Secretary Cross) agreed to.

MR. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH said, he would admit that the clause was greatly improved by the addition just made to it by the Home Secretary. There were cases, however, in which it would be most undesirable that houses should be rebuilt upon the particular area cleared, which might be in itself unhealthy from its situation near a river or otherwise. Or again the local authority might be able to show that sufficient dwellings existed already for the accommodation of the people who were displaced. It was desirable to lay down on what grounds, and on what grounds alone, the sites might be allowed to be elsewhere than on the areas which had been cleared. He begged, therefore, to move the Amendment which stood in his name—namely, in page 3, line 13, after “compulsorily and,” leave out to end of Clause, and insert—

“(Except as hereinafter provided) shall, within the limits of the area included in the scheme, or in the vicinity of such area, afford a site or sites for suitable dwellings capable of housing as many persons of the working class as may be displaced, and shall make provision for proper sanitary arrangements. Provided, That the site or sites for suitable dwellings as aforesaid may be afforded on any lands to be taken by agreement within the district of the local authority, that the scheme may prove to be equally or more desirable, having regard to the wants of the working classes, to health, and to economy. Provided also, That if the scheme shall prove that sufficient and suitable dwellings already exist, capable of housing the said persons, no site or sites as aforesaid need be afforded.”

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, that his objection to the Amendment was, that it might relieve the local authorities of the burden of providing houses for those displaced, which they knew would be the least productive part of the scheme, and he doubted, in the next place, whether the local authorities would undertake the responsibility of providing lands. He should be willing to give the confirming authority power to class these restrictions to a reasonable extent.

SIR ANDREW LUSK said, the object of the Bill professed to be to provide suitable buildings for the working classes, but the place should be an open question. He had passed many years of his life in the City of London, and he and almost all merchants were glad to get away from the City in the evening for the beneficial effects of fresh air. Then why should they wish to confine the working classes to the City? To do so would be to expose them to damage and deteriorate their health, and render them the little, puny people such as those whom they daily saw in the streets. He should like to see the working classes get out into the fresh air, and to have the physique of their forefathers. People seemed to forget what London was—a metropolis comprising many miles of streets; and was it, he asked, a place to confine the working classes in if it could be avoided?

MR. FAWCETT wished to put a question to the Home Secretary. He wanted him to tell the Committee why there should be this special provision for the working classes, who were quite capable of taking care of themselves? He had read throughout this Bill that if the working classes were displaced accommodation must be provided for them. Now, why should the working classes have accommodation provided for them more than for any other class of people? There were small tradesmen whose conditions and wants should be thought of, and for whom suitable accommodation should be provided—

THE CHAIRMAN: I beg to remind the hon. Gentleman that he is not in Order in discussing the general principle of the Bill on the Amendment. The question before the Committee is the Amendment requiring such legislation as would provide suitable accommodation for the working classes.

MR. FAWCETT submitted that the question he had addressed to the Home Secretary was perfect relevant.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, with respect to the question of his hon. Friend the Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett), submitted that if the hon. Member had the least notion of the great displacement of the dwellings of the working classes in London by railway companies' works and for other improvements, and of the miseries which they suffered, he would admit that the Bill was necessary to provide suitable dwellings for their accommodation in lieu of those pulled down.

MR. KINNAIRD did not concur with the hon. Baronet the Member for Finsbury (Sir Andrew Lusk) that it would be either convenient or accommodating to the working classes to be borne away from London to the Arcadia which the hon. Member wished to see provided for them. He would take, for instance, the class of printers, and it was well known that it would not be convenient for them to live far away from their work.

MR. FAWCETT said, he was not satisfied with the answer given by the Home Secretary to his question, and he would raise the question again on the Report of the Bill. The Home Secretary seemed to think that he (Mr. Fawcett) had not considered the miseries of the working classes; but he begged to state to the right hon. Gentleman that he was as anxious as any man could be to alleviate the sufferings of those classes. That did not, however, affect the point he had raised. He should be glad if the words "working classes" could be left out, and the words "those who have been displaced" substituted.

Amendment agreed to.

SIR SYDNEY WATERLOW moved that the words "at the least" should be added to the Proviso requiring that any improvement scheme should provide for the accommodation "of as many persons of the working classes as may be displaced." His own experience had proved that it was possible to provide by new buildings for even more persons than had before occupied the particular area.

MR. CAWLEY thought cases might occur where it would be impracticable to accommodate the same number.

Amendment agreed to.

MR. FAWCETT moved, with regard to the same provision, that the words, "of the working class" should be omitted with the view of substituting "those who earn wages." There were others besides working men, such as clerks and those of small means, who might be displaced, and who were entitled equally with them to the consideration of the Legislature.

Amendment proposed, in page 3, line 14, to leave out the words "of the working class."—(Mr. Fawcett.)

MR. J. G. TALBOT said, that the objection of the hon. Member to the clause as it stood was one that went to the principle of the Bill, and ought to have been made on the second reading.

MR. STANSFELD thought that the Government ought to accept the Amendment of the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett), which was quite consistent with the principle of the measure.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS was afraid that the right hon. Gentleman opposite had not apprehended the principle of the Bill at all. If he would be kind enough to read the Preamble he would find that it recited that the object of the measure was to provide accommodation for such of the working classes as might be displaced from their dwellings under the provision of the Bill.

SIR SYDNEY WATERLOW said, that where houses were removed the "working classes" were understood to be persons who occupied under weekly tenancies, and therefore the definition would include poor clerks and other people of slender means. Quarterly tenants, on the contrary, would receive compensation. If the Amendment of the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett) were accepted, the unfortunate ratepayers might be called upon to provide accommodation for any Members of Parliament who might be turned out of their houses in consequence of this measure being put into operation.

MR. STANSFELD said, he could not accept the reproof of the right hon. Gentleman, who was too much in the habit of administering reproofs to those who thought differently from himself. The right hon. Gentleman assumed that no hon. Member who sat opposite to him had read the provisions of this Bill, but he begged to inform him that he had read them most carefully. As to the Preamble of the Bill, to which the right hon. Gentleman had referred, he wished to remind him that it had not yet been passed. The object of the Bill, as he understood it, was to provide accommodation for the same number of persons, whether they belonged to the working classes or not, who were deprived of their houses under the provisions of the measure.

MR. FAWCETT said, he felt bound to take a division on his Amendment. The right hon. Gentleman had stated last night that the object of the Bill was to abolish rookeries; but the measure had grown considerably since then, and it was now a paternally patronizing Bill for the provision of habitations for the working classes.

MR. W. E. FORSTER hoped the Committee would not proceed to a division before knowing more clearly on what it was about to divide. He could not agree with his hon. Friend the Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett) that the Home Secretary, in seeking to remove a very crying evil, desired to make the Bill a piece of class legislation. If, however, he wished to retain the clause as it was, he ought at least to give the Committee a definition of the words "working classes." For his own part, he thought that the term might be omitted without interfering with the beneficial operation of the Bill.

MR. J. S. HARDY considered that the question which had been raised as to what was meant by the working classes was an idle one. No one could doubt the meaning of the proposal, which was to the effect, where a number of houses and small shops were pulled down, and the tenants displaced, they should, within the same area, be provided with houses and small shops, or else they could not have suitable dwellings. With regard to the expression "working classes," it comprehended not only artizans, clerks, translators, but even the Solicitor General; in fact, every person who earned his income by industry.

MR. MACDONALD hoped that the words objected to—and which would lead to invidious distinctions, which would be well understood outside the House, as he thought they were inside it—would be struck out by the right hon. Gentleman having charge of the Bill.

MR. BROGDEN considered the retention of the words "working classes" would lead to difficulties being placed in the way of the working of the Bill. The local authorities who would have to carry out the provisions of the Bill would be unable to discriminate between who were the working classes and who were not, unless they were provided with a definition.

MR. HARDCASTLE called upon hon. Gentlemen opposite who objected to the definition "working classes" to suggest some words to be substituted which, being inserted in the Bill, would be likely to effect the object which they all had in view. That object was to secure suitable dwellings for those persons, and not throw upon the local authorities the responsibility of ascertaining to what particular class the persons inhabiting the houses to be pulled down belonged.

SIR HENRY JAMES said, the object of the clause was to provide a substitute for displaced buildings, and he saw no reason why they should raise difficulties by the use of the words "working classes." If it was meant to provide houses for the poorer classes, the words ought to be left in a general sense. At all events, it was not a question whether they should supply licensed victuallers with new shops or supply small shops in the place of those which might be pulled down. It was simply a proposal to provide suitable dwellings for those destroyed in the way of a numerical replacement. He hoped the Home Secretary would give the Committee a definition of the words "working classes."

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, it was only the preceding evening that he was asked to change the title of the Bill to the designation of the very class it was now proposed to strike out. The term "working class" was no new one. It was to be found in the Standing Orders, which were passed annually, and in which no definition of the words were given. Beyond that it was made use of as far back as 1866 in the Edinburgh and Glasgow Improvement Acts, and was perfectly well understood. The authorities who had the carrying out of those Acts were not allowed to pull down dwellings unless they obtained a certificate from the sheriff that accommodation had been provided for such and such numbers of the working or labouring classes, and no difficulty had ever arisen in the matter.

MR. GOLDNEY (for Mr. GREGORY) moved, as an Amendment in page 3, line 18, after "area," to insert—

"It may also provide for such scheme or any part thereof being carried out and effected by the owner or with the concurrence of the owner of any property subject to the same, under the superintendence and control of the local authority, and upon such terms and conditions to be embodied in the scheme, as may be agreed upon between the local authority and such owner."

He understood that the Home Secretary had consented to the insertion of this Proviso.

MR. FAWCETT wished to know whether the Home Secretary had any reasons for not inserting a Proviso of this sort in the Bill originally; and if he had, what were the arguments that induced him now to consent to the insertion of this Proviso?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, one great object of the Bill was to relieve ratepayers from all unnecessary expense. Surely, if owners wished to effect improvements of their property, they should be allowed to do so.

MR. FAWCETT said, the question could not be settled in that offhand way. Under the Proviso corrupt arrangements might be made between the owners of tumble-down houses, by which extravagant compensation would be given to the latter, and the expense of building houses in lieu of the houses that had been taken down would be thrown on the ratepayers.

MR. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH said, the right hon. Gentleman had put an Amendment on the Paper for a long time similar to this Proviso. He hoped it would be accepted, for there were many landowners in London anxious to improve their property, like the Dukes of Bedford and Westminster, who were now prevented by the temporary interests which other persons had acquired.

Amendment agreed to.

On Question, "That the Clause, as amended, be agreed to?"

MR. FORTESCUE HARRISON pointed out that the provision by which the re-building of houses could be carried out on areas which extended beyond the municipal boundaries might have the effect of disfranchising some of those who were evicted under improvement schemes. The Bill applied to some of the boroughs in which he was interested, and he hoped the Home Secretary would consider whether or not the effect that he had referred to might follow.

MR. FAWCETT said, as the clause required that the local authorities should carefully ascertain the number of the working classes who would be displaced by a proposed scheme of improvement, it was essential to define what persons belonged to the working classes. Did the phrase include persons in reduced circumstances, a curate living on £100 a-year, a clerk whose salary was £80 a-year, or simply a labourer who worked for daily wage, or an artisan earning weekly wages? If a mistake was made last Session in inserting the phrase in a Standing Order without defining its meaning, that was no reason why a similar mistake should be made now.

SIR JAMES HOGG said, that as representing one of the local authorities who would have to carry out the Bill, they knew perfectly well who were meant by "the working classes," and it was unnecessary further to define the meaning of the words.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, that as the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett) wanted Parliamentary authority, it should be borne in mind that between the year 1851 and the present time a long series of statutes had been passed bearing such titles as the "Labouring Classes' Lodging House Act," the "Working Classes' Dwellings Act," and the "Artizans' Dwellings Act." Surely, these statutes afforded sufficient Parliamentary authority for anybody.

Question put, and agreed to.

2. Confirmation of Scheme.

Clause 6 (Improvement scheme by provisional order to be confirmed by Parliament. Publication of notices. Service of notices. Petition to Secretary of State or Local Government Board), verbally amended, and agreed to.

3. Execution of Scheme by Local Authority.

Clause 7 (Duty of local authority to carry scheme when confirmed into execution).

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. Fawcett.)

MR. ASSHETON CROSS hoped the Committee would still continue the consideration of the Bill.

MR. FAWCETT said, that the clause was a most vital part of the measure, raising as it did the question whether the carrying out of the scheme should be obligatory. As he had pointed out at the previous Sitting, the local authorities might by that clause adopt either of three courses—namely, first, sell or lease the land, when cleared, to private individuals for the carrying out of the scheme; secondly, sell or lease it to a body of trustees for the same purpose; or, thirdly, with the consent of the confirming authority, they might carry out the scheme themselves. But there was no absolute security that the scheme would be carried out at all after the land had been cleared. In that state of things the hon. Member for Maidstone (Sir Sydney Waterlow) had given Notice of an Amendment to the effect—

THE CHAIRMAN interposed, and said, that it was not in Order to discuss a prospective Amendment on a Motion to report Progress, though the hon. Gentleman might refer to it if he wished merely to indicate his grounds for supporting that Motion.

MR. FAWCETT said, what he wished to do was merely to show that his Motion to report Progress was reasonable. In case neither of the three courses to which he had referred was adopted, the hon. Member for Maidstone proposed that if any person offered a price for the ground and that price was refused by the local authorities, the person who had made the offer might appeal to the con-firmer authority, who would appoint an arbitrator to say whether the price was a reasonable one or not. That Amendment raised a question too important to be satisfactorily discussed at half-past 12 o'clock, and it was for that reason he had moved that the Chairman do report Progress.

MR. DISRAELI said, that as with the exception of some eccentric assumptions of the hon. Member for Hackney the Government had no cause to complain, having made reasonable progress, he would consent to the Motion.

Question put, and agreed to.

House resumed.

Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Monday next.

MUTINY BILL.

(Mr. Raikes, Mr. Secretary Hardy, The Judge Advocates.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress 18th March.]

Clause 26.

CAPTAIN NOLAN moved an Amendment the effect of which would be to allow a court martial to sentence non-commissioned officers to a lesser punishment than reduction to the ranks, by giving it power to reduce them to a lower grade of rank, or to put them at the bottom or in any other position on their list.

Amendment proposed,

At the end of the Clause, to add the words "and may sentence any non-commissioned officer to reduction to the ranks, or to be placed at the bottom or in any other place in the list of his rank, or to be reduced to an inferior rank of non-commissioned officer, and, in case of reduction to the ranks, may further sentence him to the same imprisonment as that to which a soldier is liable."—(Captain Nolan.)

MR. STEPHEN CAVE thought the Amendment was not necessary or desirable, inasmuch as a non-commissioned officer need not be tried by a court martial, but could be reduced to the ranks without it. To place him, therefore, at the bottom of the list by sentence of court martial would be a useless waste of power. A commanding officer was not obliged to promote a non-commissioned officer according to seniority. It was only the class of duty that was affected by seniority, not pay or promotion. If a man was not fit to be a serjeant he was seldom fit to be a corporal. If he was degraded, he lost authority over the men, and it was far better that he should at once be reduced to the ranks and recover his position by good conduct.

Question put, "That those words be there added."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 34; Noes 175; Majority 141.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 27 to 106, inclusive, agreed to.

Clause 107.

COLONEL ALEXANDER, in moving, as an Amendment, in page 64, line 9, to leave out all after "be" to "State," and insert "served on the commanding officer of such soldier, and the said commanding officer," said, it was intended to transfer to the commanding officers of regiments a power which was now exercised by the Secretary of State for War, and which was most embarrassing to him. It was a matter of great regret to commanding officers of regiments that they had not the power so to direct things in relation to the wants of soldiers' wives as that they should not be sent away dissatisfied. Commanding officers should have a power which they now had not, to compel soldiers to support their wives and children in the same way as civilians were bound to support theirs. He submitted that soldiers' wives should be compelled to show their marriage certificates. When he commanded a regiment, he felt the want of such a power; however, as he apprehended that his Amendment would embarrass the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War, he would withdraw it.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. P. A. TAYLOR said, that the Mutiny Act formerly exempted the soldier from the necessity of supporting his family. That provision was repealed, while Lord Cardwell was at the War Office; but the concession was accompanied by so many difficulties as to be altogether valueless. When any order had been made against a soldier, copy of such order should be left at the office of one of Her Majesty's principal Secretaries of State, and the said Secretary of State might withhold a portion, not exceeding 6d., of the daily pay of a non-commissioned officer not below a serjeant, and 3d. of any other soldier. When such soldier was quartered out of the district where the action arose, the summons should be served on his commanding officer, and such service should not be valid unless there be left therewith a sum sufficient to enable the soldier to attend the hearing of the case and return to his quarters; and no summons should be valid if obtained after an order had been given for the embarkation for service out of the United Kingdom. He would therefore in page 64, line 10, move, as an Amendment, to leave out "may" and insert "shall;" the Amendment having no reference to the case of women who might have claims upon soldiers. The words "may" and "shall" might almost be taken as convertible terms.

Amendment proposed, in page 64, line 10, to leave out the word "may," in order to insert the word "shall."—(Mr. P. A. Taylor.)

MR. STEPHEN CAVE denied that the words could be regarded as convertible terms. It must be remembered that the Army was in an artificial position, and the Secretary of State ought to have a certain amount of discretion in his power. Soldiers were especially liable to charges of this kind by loose women who knew they had a better chance of getting money out of them, than from civilians who could and did constantly abscond. There were two things to guard against, vexatious charges, and collusion. The late Government were responsible for the wording of the clause; but after very anxious consideration he did not know how it could be improved.

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN said, the clause was framed by the late Government with the view, while admitting the liability of the soldier in such cases, of protecting him against got-up charges. As such, it was of a tentative character, the principle of liability being entirely novel to the Army. He wished to know how it had worked.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, it was a principle put forward by the late Lord Hardinge, that the Crown alone should interfere with the pay of the soldier, and that no other authority should intervene at all. The only case in which that rule was broken was that of drunkenness, when the pay was stopped by the commanding officer. No instance had been brought before him as a grievance, and he was informed that the Act was considered to work well.

MR. STANSFELD said, he thought that as a change had been so recently made, the question was whether it would work well. He could confirm the statement that the clause had been introduced by the late Government as merely tentative.

Question put, "That the word 'may' stand part of the Clause."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 138; Noes 56: Majority 82.

MR. STANSFELD moved, line 13, after the word "soldier" to add words enabling the Secretary of State to withhold a portion of a soldier's daily pay for such a time as might suffice for the payment of the amount required to be paid under the order or decree of the justices.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY objected to the Amendment, the object of which, so far as it could properly be done, was carried out by the clause.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. P. A. TAYLOR moved, as an Amendment, in line 15, to leave out after "decree" to the end of the Clause—namely, that part relating to the summons. No woman could now proceed against a soldier in a case of affiliation without first lodging money enough to bring him from the place where he might be and then to convey him back. She must, in fact, lodge £2 which could only be repaid to her out of a payment of 6*d.* a-day. That was a bar to the possibility of the woman getting justice.

Amendment proposed, to leave out from the word "decree," in line 15, to the end of the Clause.—(Mr. P. A. Taylor.)

MR. STEPHEN CAVE opposed the Amendment. The soldier must have money to travel to the place where he was summoned to appear, and how was he to get it? It was not to be expected that the captain should provide for his travelling expenses, and his comrades were not likely to make a purse for him. The clause had been in operation for two years. The hon. Member had not brought forward a single case of hardship, nor had he proposed an alternative. Had he done so, it would have been considered. But the Government were certainly not prepared to strike out the provision altogether.

MR. MUNDELLA said, that in 99 cases out of 100 the necessity of lodging £2 was a practical denial of justice to the woman. Certainly the poor betrayed woman should not be called upon to make a deposit which was beyond her means. Let the Government pay the money, and then deduct it from the soldier's pay.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN resisted the Amendment, as there was no practical complaint against the working of the present arrangement. No instance had been brought forward of any such denial of justice as had been assumed by the last speaker to be its effect; and in the absence of any such proof he hoped the House would retain the proviso.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 122; Noes 48: Majority 74.

House resumed.

Bill reported, without Amendment; to be read the third time upon Monday next.

SALE OF COAL, &c. (NO. 2) BILL.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 101.]

IRELAND—PEACE PRESERVATION ACT —CARRYING ARMS.—QUESTION.

MR. CALLAN asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether it is a fact that a money payment has been made to Mr. John M'Caffrey, junior, of Dundalk, as compensation for an alleged withholding or cancelling of a licence to carry arms under the Peace Preservation Act; and, if so, by whose orders, out of what fund was the money paid, and to whom charged?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS - BEACH, in reply, said, the case alluded to took place before he came into office, and appeared to have been pressed upon the attention of the late Government. The man had lost his licence to carry arms, and, owing to some neglect or carelessness, he was for some time deprived of the right of carrying arms. For that deprivation it was thought that some compensation ought to be given to him, and a few pounds were, accordingly, awarded to him as compensation. He must decline to say out of what fund the money was paid.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT (IRELAND)— LEGISLATION.—QUESTION.

MR. MOORE asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether he intends bringing forward any measure this Session dealing with Local Government in Ireland; and, if so, when he hopes to lay it before the House?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH, in reply, said, that the Question covered a very wide ground. It was probable that almost any measure he might introduce relating to Ireland would to some extent deal with the subject of local government. As, however, he did not know what particular point the hon. Gentleman had in his mind, he was afraid he could not answer the Question.

THE LOCK-OUT IN SOUTH WALES.

QUESTION.

MR. MACDONALD asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether it be true, as stated by Mr. G. W. Clark, the Chairman of the Merthyr Board of Guardians, at a recent meeting which was reported in the "Western Mail," that the Secretary of State had placed at the disposal of the Chairman of the said Board of Guardians a force of military and police; whether he was aware that Mr. G. W. Clark was one of those concerned in the lockout in South Wales; whether he can state to the House if Mr. G. W. Clark applied for the police and military force after he had consulted his brother magistrates of the district, or did it on his own responsibility; and, whether he will lay the Correspondence that took place between himself and Mr. G. W. Clark upon the Table of the House?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, he was not aware till very lately that Mr. Clark was Chairman of the Board of Guardians, although he was aware he was one of the masters concerned in the lock-out in South Wales. As the hon. Member appeared to be under some misapprehension as to the facts of the case, he would briefly state them. The first intimation or request made to him about this matter was not by Mr. Clark alone, but by the stipendiary magistrate, who called upon him on the 25th of January, and requested him to send some of the metropolitan police into the district. He declined to accede to the request, and heard no more of the matter until the 23rd of February, when he received a letter from the stipendiary magistrate to the effect that he had received intelligence from the superintendent of the county police, who was of opinion that riots would probably occur, and that in the then existing state of the force under his control, without help, it would be impossible for him to preserve peace. He went on to say that if he could obtain 100 additional police, it would be sufficient to preserve the peace. If it were impossible to obtain that number, he asked that a military force might be in readiness in case any disturbance should take place, adding that they would not be sent for unless their services were actually required. Those persons, he stated, who were best able to give an opinion on the subject seemed to think that special constables would be of no service in the present state of affairs, and the stipendiary added that what he had himself seen that morning on his way to the police court gave him strong reasons for believing that the opinion of the superintendent of police was well founded. That communication he (Mr. Cross) forwarded to the War Office, and orders were given in consequence of it alone. He received a similar communication from Mr. Clark, and this 'was the whole Correspondence on the subject.

TRADE MARKS—LEGISLATION.

QUESTION.

DR. CAMERON asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether it is his intention, this Session, to introduce a Bill dealing with the question of Trade Marks?

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY, in reply, said, that a Bill on the subject referred to in the Question of the hon. Member had been prepared, and he hoped the hon. Member for Whitehaven (Mr. C. Bentinck) would move for leave to introduce it immediately after Easter.

GLEBE LOAN (IRELAND) ACT, 1870.

QUESTION.

MR. FRENCH asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to introduce a Bill this Session for the continuance of "The Glebe Loan (Ireland) Act, 1870," which expires in September next?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH, in reply, said, that the subject had been brought under his notice by the right hon. and learned Baronet the Member for Clare (Sir Colman O'Loughlen) during the debate on the Bill introduced this Session by the hon. Member for Downpatrick (Mr. Mulholland). He was not yet able to announce whether it would be his lot to introduce a Bill that

Session for the continuance of the Act. It would be necessary that some communications should first pass between the Treasury and himself and the Lord Chancellor of Ireland, who was expected very shortly in London.

POST OFFICE—MAIL SERVICE IN THE NORTH OF SCOTLAND.

QUESTION.

MR. LAING asked the Postmaster General, Why the correspondence of the counties of Sutherland, Caithness, and Orkney has been deprived of all connection with the up limited mail, except on Sundays, since the opening of Railway communication to Wick and Thurso in July last; whether it is the intention of the Post Office to restore that connection; and, whether it is intended to accelerate the down limited mail, so as to reach Wick and Thurso in time for an evening delivery in those towns, with a corresponding acceleration of the mails to and from Orkney?

LORD JOHN MANNERS, in reply, said, that the trains between Sutherland and Caithness, on the Highland Railway, did not run in connection with the up limited mail, and the cost for a special train in the night would be so much out of proportion to the advantage to be gained that the Government would not be justified in incurring it. There was no present intention to accelerate the down mail, for even if it were done, it would only allow of the delivery of letters at Thurso late at night and the despatch of mails for Orkney the next morning as at present.

POST OFFICE TELEGRAPHS—ORKNEY AND SHETLAND.—QUESTION.

MR. LAING asked the Postmaster General, Why Orkney and Shetland have been so long deprived of the benefit of a postal telegraph; and how soon they may expect to be placed on a footing of equality with other parts of the Kingdom in this respect?

LORD JOHN MANNERS, in reply, said, that the negotiations for the purchase of the telegraphic cables to Orkney and Shetland had been in progress since the beginning of 1873. So many difficulties had arisen in the matter that no settlement had yet been arrived at, and he was afraid he could not at this moment say how soon such a settlement would be made.

ARMY PROMOTION—CAPTAINS OF THE LINE AND ROYAL MARINES.

QUESTION.

MR. WHALLEY asked the Secretary of State for War, with reference to the promotion to the brevet rank of Major in 1872 of certain Captains of the Line and Royal Marines whose commissions bore date previous to April 1860, Whether it is intended to concede similar promotion to those Captains of the Line and Royal Marines whose commissions as Captains are anterior to May 1863, many of whom have held that rank for upwards of nineteen years, and all having been superseded by the promotion of the first Captains of Engineers and Artillery in 1872?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY, in reply, said, that although, in consequence of the numerous promotions in the Artillery and Engineers, there had been a large supersession of the captains of the Line and Royal Marines, that supersession had not extended so far as was generally thought; because, though the length of service of captains in the Artillery and Engineers had been longer as such than that of the Captains of the Line, yet, in their general service, their relations were pretty nearly equal. The question was one of such magnitude that he was unable at present to hold out any promise as to what might be done.

THE BOARD OF TRADE—NIGHT ATTENDANCE.—QUESTION.

MR. PLIMSOLL asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether he will consider the advisability of keeping some officer in attendance at the Board of Trade Offices in Whitehall during the night, to act immediately upon such telegrams as may arrive from Board of Trade Surveyors at the Ports, asking for instructions in cases in which ships are apparently dangerously overloaded and which are about to go to sea in that condition?

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY: Sir, the office-keeper and porter remain at the Board of Trade every night, and they receive any telegrams which arrive from surveyors at night, and forward them immediately to the officer responsible for the subject of them, who is often so called up at night, and has sometimes himself to go on inspection of a ship going to sea. It would not be advisable, in the language of the Question, to have a staff of officers kept every night at Whitehall qualified to act themselves immediately on such telegrams.

MR. PLIMSOLL said, he should repeat his Question, because, on calling at the Board of Trade at night, he had found telegrams which would not have been delivered but for his calling.

ARMY—LANDGUARD FORT.

QUESTION.

COLONEL JERVIS asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether the attention of the War Department has been called to the following passage of a Report by Sir John Coode, C.E., dated May 26th, 1874, to the Board of Trade, respecting Landguard Common:—

“With respect to the danger to be apprehended from the encroachments of the sea, if the eastern and western foreshores of Landguard Common be not protected by means of such works as I have recommended, there would be reason to apprehend that on the first occurrence of unusually high tides, accompanied by strong gales from any point between S.E. (by South) to S.W., further and much more considerable damage would be done, and it would be far from improbable that a second channel might be cut through from the German Ocean to Harwich Harbour, isolating Landguard Fort, the lighthouse, and works at the point, a state of things which I need scarcely say would prove seriously detrimental to all interests concerned;”

and, whether he is aware that it is proposed to close up Walton Creek adjoining the said common, and that the Harwich Harbour Conservancy Board have drawn the attention of the War Department to the probability that the closing of such creek before the War Department has been enabled to carry out the work necessary for the due protection of Landguard Common, would most probably cause that very disaster pointed out by Sir John Coode; and, if so, what steps have been taken in the matter by the War Department?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY, in reply, said, the attention of the War Department had been called to the passage in a Report by Sir John Coode, alluded to in the Question; they were also aware that it was proposed to close up Walton Creek, adjoining Landguard Common, and had called the attention of the Board of Trade to the proposal. The War Department had ascertained from the Board of Trade that they were willing to carry out the project of Sir John Coode. Action, however, was deferred, pending the acquisition by the War Department of the land on which the works would have to be carried out, and in respect of which a notice under the Defence Act had been served on the lord of the manor. It should be observed that, although the War Department was concerned in the matter so far as related to the preservation of the ground occupied by Landguard Fort, the question of preventing the formation of a channel through the Landguard Peninsula from Harwich Harbour to the sea was one for the Board of Trade to deal with in communication with the Harwich Harbour Conservancy Board.

INLAND REVENUE OFFICE, BRISTOL. QUESTION.

MR. KIRKMAN HODGSON asked the First Commissioner of Works, What steps have been taken to carry into effect the recommendation of the Commissioners of the Inland Revenue for the removal of the Inland Revenue office in the city of Bristol to a more central position?

LORD HENRY LENNOX, in reply, said, his attention had been called to the recommendation of the Inland Revenue Commissioners in the matter referred to. It was now under his consideration; but he feared he could not at present give any distinct promise that the work would be proceeded with this year.

THE METROPOLITAN BOARD OF WORKS BILLS.—QUESTION.

COLONEL MAKINS asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If his attention has been drawn to the fact of Bills being introduced by the Metropolitan Board of Works at great cost to the ratepayers, without any statutory authority enabling them to initiate legislation, especially in reference to the gas supply of the Metropolis; and, whether the Government propose to confer such power upon that body by special Act?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, the Government had no such intention; but the Metropolitan Board of Works claimed the power under the Metropolis Local Management Act, a section of which said that where it appeared to the Board that further powers were required for the purpose of any work for the improvement of the metropolis or for the public benefit, the Board might apply to Parliament, and the expenses of such application might be defrayed like other expenses of the Board. The Board also claimed that under other Acts similar powers were conferred upon them, more especially with regard to gas. There was no intention on the part of the Government to increase the power which the Board already had in this respect.

DEATHS BY AGRICULTURAL MACHINERY.—QUESTION.

SIR EDWARD WATKIN asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If his attention has been called to the fact reported by the Registrar General, that in the three years 1870, 1871, and 1872, two hundred and twelve deaths have arisen from accidents connected with agricultural machinery; and, if he proposes to institute any system of inquiry into the causes of this class of fatal accidents?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, it was perfectly true that during 1870, 78 deaths had occurred from accidents caused by agricultural machinery; that in 1871 there were 64 such deaths; in 1872, 70; and in 1873, 68. It was not, however, the intention of the Government to make any special inquiry into this matter, because all the causes of death were to be found at the office of the Registrar General. The information, therefore, was open to anyone who chose to go to the Registrar General's office.

PUBLIC HEALTH BILL—THE AMENDMENTS.—QUESTION.

MR. ERNEST NOEL asked the President of the Local Government Board, in reference to the Public Health Bill, Whether it is his intention to have the

Mr. Gathorne Hardy

Clauses that are amendments of former Acts, printed separately, so as to keep distinct such parts of the Bill as are merely for the purposes of consolidation from those which are changes in the Law?

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH, in reply, said, that he intended to have the whole of the substantial Amendments introduced into the Public Health Bill set forth and clearly explained in a Paper which would accompany that measure. The Paper would contain detailed references to every clause in which these Amendments occurred.

INFANT LIFE PROTECTION ACT, 1872

—BABY FARMING AT EXETER.

QUESTION.

MR. CHARLEY asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been directed to the evidence adduced at the trial of a baby farmer, named Bessy Binmore, sentenced by Mr. Justice Lush at the Exeter Assizes to twelve years' penal servitude for starving to death an infant entrusted to her care, that three other infants entrusted to her care had died in her house during the previous eighteen months, and that her house was unregistered under "The Infant Life Protection Act, 1872," (35 and 36 Vic. c. 38); also to the statement of the learned Judge at the trial that "baby farming had of late prevailed to such an extent that it was necessary to vigorously suppress or efficiently regulate it;" and, whether he is willing to issue a circular to the local authorities named in the Schedule to the Infant Life Protection Act, calling upon them to enforce that enactment in their respective districts?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, his attention had been called to the case. Mr. Justice Lush informed him that the case was a very bad one, and in consequence he had found it necessary to pass a severe sentence; and that in the course of the trial he had expressed his surprise that the local authorities had not provided any register, and that no means had been used to put in force the Act of 1872. It was to be hoped that the case would awaken attention among local authorities to the requirements of the Act, and that a register would be provided. Before issuing a Circular, as requested by the hon. and learned Gentleman, the best way would be for him to move for a Return of all the baby farms which had been registered. If he did so, he (Mr. Cross) would not object to it.

MR. CHARLEY gave Notice that he would move for such a Return.

NATIONAL SCHOOLS (IRELAND)— DRILL.—QUESTION.

MR. SULLIVAN asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, If it is true that in the "Instructions to Inspectors on the Examination of Children in Public Elementary Schools," issued by the Education Department (England) on the 8th May 1871, the following instruction is laid down:—

"You should reckon the discipline of a School imperfect in which a certain amount of drill is not part of the School routine: If time is set down in the 'Time-Table' for drill, you should see the boys put through their exercises;"

Whether it is true that in Ireland a monitor, teacher, or inspector of Schools would be liable to prosecution and imprisonment for teaching, inspecting or acting in a like manner; whether it is true that, under the "New Code (England)," under the headings "Grants to Evening Schools, Articles 106—112, Calculation of Attendance," it is laid down (in order to secure the Capitation Grant),—

"24. Attendance of boys at drill under a competent instructor for not more than two hours a week and forty hours in the year, may, in a Day School be counted as a School attendance;"

Whether it is true that "such attendance of boys" at drill in Ireland, whether in School or elsewhere, would render them liable to prosecution and imprisonment; whether prosecution and punishment of boys of sixteen and seventeen years of age in Ireland cannot be cited in which no other offence was charged against them than that of "keeping step" on a public road; and, whether boys removing from a School at Liverpool to one in Dublin will carry along with them to Ireland the immunity from prosecution, and the State encouragement to drill under which they had studied in England?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS BEACH, in reply, said, that the hon. Member had in this instance specified very exactly the points on which he required information. Any Question, however, which related to the proceedings of the English Education Department, or to the instructions issued by that Department, ought to be addressed to his noble Friend the Vice President of the Council (Viscount Sandon). For his own part, he had no means of obtaining the information in that respect other than those open to the hon. Member. But with respect to Ireland, it was by no means true that a monitor, teacher, or Inspector of Schools would be liable to prosecution and imprisonment for teaching, inspecting, or acting in the manner alluded to. Nor were children attending and learning school drill liable to such "prosecution and imprisonment." As a matter of fact, the discipline of the National Schools in Ireland would be considered imperfect, unless it embraced a certain amount of drill as part of the school exercise. As to the cases of boys of 16 and 17 years of age being punished for keeping step on a public road, no such case had ever come under his notice; but school drill was a different thing from military drill for disloyal purposes. Boys removed from Liverpool to Dublin enjoyed in the matter of school drill the same advantages, he believed, as they would do in this country.

MR. SULLIVAN gave Notice that on an early day he would call attention to the matter, to enable the Chief Secretary to ascertain where the convictions referred to were carried out.

INTOXICATING LIQUORS ACT (IRELAND)—INCREASE OF CRIME.

QUESTION.

MR. SULLIVAN asked the First Lord of the Treasury If his attention has been called to the charge of the Lord Chief Justice of Ireland to the Grand Jury of Kildare County on the 16th instant, and the charge of Mr. Baron Dowse to the Grand Jury of Wexford County on the 17th instant, in which those Judges deplored the recent serious increase of crimes arising from intoxication, while noticing the decrease of crime which otherwise would have been displayed in the calendar; whether his attention had been called to like declarations from many of the Irish Judges during the recent assizes; and, whether, in view of these declarations by Her Majesty's Judges and of the strong representations of the Irish Members as to the certainty of such results arising from such increased facilities for drinking as were afforded by the Intoxicating Liquors (Ireland) Act of last year, it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to propose the repeal of the said Act?

MR. DISRAELI: Sir, my attention, and I believe that of hon. Members of the House, has been called to the recent charges of eminent Irish Judges to the Grand Juries of that country, as to the great increase of crime arising from intoxication. But I have not observed from any of those Charges that that increase has been attributed by any Judge to the Intoxicating Liquors Act of last year. Of that Act we must necessarily have a very slight and limited experience; it is similar to the Act passed in England, and therefore I cannot announce to the hon. Gentleman that it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to propose its repeal. At the same time, I must state, touching this subject, that my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant, when he brings in the Prison Discipline Bill, will take care, by the introduction of a clause for enforcing better discipline and carrying out the sentence, to do that which incidentally and indirectly will have a tendency to check those excesses which proceed from drinking.

PEACE PRESERVATION (IRELAND)

(Sir Michael Hicks-Beach, Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Sir Michael Hicks-Beach.)

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU said, that this Bill raised one of the most important questions which could be brought under the consideration of Parliament, going as it did to the very root of legislative power, and touching immediately the liberties of the subject. It was a Bill, moreover, which was regarded with thrilling interest and the greatest anxiety by a considerable portion of Her Majesty's subjects. That being so, it was not too much to ask the House to lay aside every prejudice, and endeavour calmly and deliberately to consider the question in order that they might arrive at a just and right conclusion—and there were many prejudices which would have to be discarded if Parliament wished to arrive at such a conclusion; and among them was the most common of the failings which beset the human mind—the desire of exercising power. There were two different kinds of power, the exercise of which produced very opposite results. There was the power that consisted in the exercise of moral influence; and the man who sought to exercise that power might be held to be actuated by a moral ambition. On the other hand, there was a power which consisted in the exertion of physical force; and to use this was justly regarded as ignoble, and it generally culminated in rendering the user an oppressor and tyrant. Well, government by physical force was the simplest of all forms of government, inasmuch as the Governor had simply to declare his will. That kind of government, however, was not that which tended to the happiness or to promote the contentment and loyalty of the people. Coercion was readily had recourse to because it was so easy; and when these exceptional acts were repeated frequently they at length became the permanent form of government. That most certainly was not the way to govern; and his proposition was that exceptional or coercive legislation was neither right nor expedient, but was, on the contrary, most unjust and impolitic; and he said the employment of physical force was so ready a means of government that it behoved every Government to be on their guard lest they should shirk the difficult task of acquiring moral influence. Count Joseph De Maistre had said what had since been frequently quoted, that “any one could govern in a state of siege;”—meaning that as long as you had physical force at your command it was easy to make people do what you desired. But the danger was that some day that physical force would fail, and that the predominant power of the population on which you relied might withdraw their allegiance. Then that would happen which we are told of in Holy Writ, when one of the most powerful Kings of Israel, in the glowing language of Scripture, said to his subjects, “My father chastised you with whips, but I will chastise you with scorpions.” But the physical force on which he relied did fail him in an unlooked-for hour, and ten-twelfths of his kingdom were taken away. The true ruler, on the contrary, did not seek to govern by physical force, but by moral influence. The Chief Secretary stated as one reason for introducing a Coercion Bill, that the people of Ireland wanted separation from this country. He (Lord Robert Montagu) might meet that statement with a direct denial; but assuming it to be correct, what deduction did he draw from it? That the English Government had not known how to rule, but had resorted to coercion to save them the trouble of learning how to govern. The assertion of the Chief Secretary was therefore a condemnation of his own and previous Governments. What he called exceptional legislation was the application of different fundamental principles of legislation to different parts of the country. England was to be governed upon the principles of freedom of conscience, liberty of the Press, and liberty of the subject; while Ireland was to be governed on the principles of intolerance, under Press laws, under a system of restraint, and what he might almost call illegal imprisonment. That he would say was exceptional legislation; and when such legislation was had recourse to, they applied a system of freedom to one country and of coercion to the other. Such a principle was unknown to our earlier history. Until the time of Queen Anne the principles of all legislation were agreed to and published by the King in Council, and every parish was allowed to apply those principles as it thought fit. Even in taxation no budget was brought forward, but each county was told what quota it had to pay, and the different parishes imposed the taxation on houses or lands as they thought proper. England in those days was but a federation of free Republics. To apply that to Ireland, what was the system proposed by the present Prime Minister? What was required, he said, in 1868, in a very remarkable speech, was this very freedom of Government under a strong Executive. His opinion was that “they should return to the ancient system of self-government.” “Local self-government” and “freedom” were synonymous terms according to the present Prime Minister. Although he (Lord Robert Montagu) did not belong to his Party he was proud to say he had learned the principles of political science from the right hon. Gentleman. On the 18th of March, 1869, the present Prime Minister said—

“The Tory Party, however it may at times have erred, has always been the friend of local government, and . . . on local government political freedom depended.”—[3 Hansard, xciv. 1693.]

He might make a similar quotation from the late Prime Minister: and when two such eminent men agreed in opinion, they could not do wrong in accepting their dicta. The late Prime Minister had just published a pamphlet on what he called “Vaticanism.” He did not agree with the doctrines the right hon. Gentleman laid down in that pamphlet; but he agreed with him in this—that,

“As a rule, the real independence of States and nations depends upon the exclusion of foreign influence proper from their civil affairs. Wherever the spirit of freedom, even if ever so faintly, breathes, it resents and reacts against any intrusion of another people or Power, into the circle of its interior concerns, as alike dangerous and disgraceful.”

With the adoption of Revolutionary principles came centralization, which imposed the details of laws on all the people of a country, regardless of the special conditions of any locality. These centralized laws were felt to be a hardship; but, instead of returning to the true principle of local government, we resorted to the bungling system of permissive legislation. It would be far better merely to assert the principles of legislation, and to leave each locality to apply them in its own manner. If, then, it was a hardship to enforce details on all places alike, how much greater was it when we altered the principle of law, and forced on one part of the Kingdom principles which were utterly alien to its feelings and destructive of its progress. They were told in Blackstone that the Habeas Corpus Act was the second Magna Charta of the liberties of Englishmen, because through it no man could be detained in prison without just cause. But while the Habeas Corpus Act was enforced in England, while no one was arrested on suspicion, and while no one could be detained longer than was necessary to bring him to a fair trial, in Ireland it was quite different. In that country a man might be arrested and thrown into prison on suspicion, on mere surmise, on a calumny whispered into the ear of a magistrate, and the arrested person might be detained during the pleasure of the Lord Lieutenant. So that in the most important matter affecting the liberty of the subject, there was one law for England and Scotland, and another for Ireland. Such inequalities would be deemed astounding by an “intelligent foreigner” from China or Japan. They could be justified only on the ground of necessity. The late Prime Minister, speaking of the Peace Preservation Act in 1870, said it was not a measure to be adopted unless under a most stringent necessity; it was a strong application, like alcohol, which might give temporary relief, but which laid up disease for the future, and it ought to be applied only on the apprehended outbreak of civil war: and the present Leader of the Opposition (the Marquess of Hartington) said the Government would not be justified in bringing forward the measure until every other remedy had been tried and failed. And the present Prime Minister, in a speech he made last year at Buckingham, declared that “Ireland was ruled by coercive legislation of the most severe and most stringent kind,” that it “was governed by laws of coercive and stringent severity, such as did not exist in any other quarter of the globe;” and he asked—and properly asked—such coercive severity need continue until the year 1875?—and he said in this speech that the country was debauched by the application of laws founded on violence and aggression. Thus, the right hon. Gentleman traced the necessity for coercion in the present to coercion in the past. He also spoke of Members being returned who were pledged to the “dismemberment of the Empire;” but in applying that phrase to the adherents of Home Rule, he did them great injustice, because it was the object of Home Rulers to strengthen the unity of the Empire by returning to ancient and Tory principles of Government. No one in Ireland desired to bring about Home Rule by violence; its advocates sought it only by persuasion, argument, and legislation. In introducing this Bill, the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland said it was his duty to show that such legislation was necessary; but, instead of making out a strong case for it, he did the very reverse. He said the country was comparatively free from theft, immorality, and those crimes of brutal violence which too frequently occurred in England, and he showed that there was a remarkable diminution in agrarian crime, and for these reasons he said the re-enactment of the law would require careful consideration—yet after this declaration, the right hon. Gentleman came down to that House, and announced that the Peace Preservation Act must still be kept in force. The Protection of Life and Property Act applied only to Westmeath—the county he had the honour to represent—and in that and the adjoining county the right hon. Gentleman said the absence of violence bore testimony to the extinction of the Ribbon conspiracy. Crime, he said, had diminished in Ireland—but still the country must be coerced. Such statements went to prove that exceptional legislation was unjust. Under the Peace Preservation Act there had been only 144 seizures of arms, in respect of which 38 persons were summoned; only 14 were arrested, and of these 4 were committed, and 10 were discharged. Many of these charges had reference, perhaps, to the possession of a fowling-piece, or a blunderbuss which would not go off. Of 36 persons arrested for being out at night only 4 were committed, the other 32 being set at liberty. Of 12 persons arrested for merely being strangers, only 2 were committed. Three witnesses were arrested on suspicion that they were about to abscond, and they were all discharged. In 1870 the number of agrarian outrages said to have been committed were 1,329, of which a large number occurred in Westmeath—and this constituted the alleged necessity of the measure. That number went on decreasing every year, until in 1874 only 213 cases of agrarian outrage occurred, and they were nearly all cases of writing threatening letters. Under the Life and Property Protection Act there were 19 arrests in 1871, and not a single arrest in 1874, nor had there been a single person in prison for offences under the Act since June, 1874. So far from making out a case, these figures showed that the Act was not necessary, and if it was unnecessary nothing could be more unjust or imprudent. If the House examined the general statistics of Irish crime, it would be found from a Blue Book published last autumn, that in the year 1864 the number of indictable offences throughout Ireland was 10,865. They went on gradually diminishing until 1873, the last year given, when they were 6,942. Previous to 1864 the agrarian outrages in Ireland were about 356 a-year; in the year 1872-3 they were only 255. The number of violent and dangerous assaults and of ordinary assaults showed a similar diminution. The Returns proved a singular fact—which was admitted by the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary himself—that in Ireland crime, generally speaking, was concentrated in the large towns, while the rural districts were comparatively free. Thus the excess of crime in Dublin over Westmeath was not less than 92 per cent, yet there was no Protection of Life and Property Act for Dublin. In Cork city the excess of crime over Westmeath was 66 per cent; in Galway, 64 per cent; while in Kildare, the rural district in which crime was most frequent, the excess was 36 per cent more than in Westmeath. Yet no Peace Preservation Act was put in force against these localities; while unfortunate Westmeath had to suffer the full infliction. Again, the rural district of Kildare was higher in crime than any other in Ireland:—and why? because there was a camp of English soldiers at the Curragh of Kildare—against whom no Peace Preservation Act was put in force. In 1873 the Prison Inspectors asserted that most of the crime in Ireland was due to drunkenness. An able statistician, Dr. Hancock, had pointed out the effectiveness of the machinery for the apprehension and detection of crime in Ireland. Excluding the superior officers there were 25 policemen for every 10,000 people in Ireland, while there were only 12 in England and Wales. While only 25 per cent of offenders escaped in Ireland more than 50 per cent escaped in England. Yet, with all this well-paid machinery for the detection of crime in Ireland, 22 per cent less offences were committed than in England. If, too, they examined the number of persons sentenced to penal servitude and to capital punishment respectively in England and Ireland, the latter country would be found in the better position. If coercive and exceptional legislation was necessary for Ireland it followed à fortiori that the Government ought to propose it for England and Scotland. As the Chief Secretary for Ireland had alluded to the rampant brutality which prevailed in England, he had, for want of anything better to do, cut a few little scraps out of The Times of riots and violent assaults during the last few months. There were, for example, the Fraserburg riots, where 300 or 400 people sacked the police office and threw the furniture out of the window. Then came a disturbance and riot at Sheffield on Saturday, at midnight; there was fierce fighting in the streets, there were cries to burn down the house of one of the offending parties, and a large number of police were assaulted and brutally injured; and a fight at Alnwick between the pitmen. Then there was an extract from The Pall Mall Gazette narrating how three men had assaulted a married man who was standing at his own door, insulted his wife, and on his interfering to protect her, knocked him down and attempted to murder him. The number of cases of violence reported from various parts of England was so great that no one could have been surprised to hear some time back that the Home Secretary was meditating a sort of Coercion Bill for England. He, for one, however, was astonished to learn subsequently that the right hon. Gentleman had abjured his intention, for it was clear that a measure of the kind was much more urgently needed in England than in Ireland—especially after the ruffianism they had heard of as having occurred at Birmingham and Hanley. He thought, then, that he had clearly shown coercive Acts to be unnecessary in Ireland, and, being unnecessary, it followed that they were unjust. It might be asked why two Governments, one of which professed to be Liberal but was, in reality, most illiberal, and the other of which, while professing Toryism, abjured that principle of self-government which, according to the Prime Minister, was at the root of Toryism, should have forced coercive legislation upon Ireland? The reasons were not far to seek. The landlords of Westmeath, who desired to make evictions, had memorialized the Irish Government to liberate the “captains” of the Ribbonmen from prison—the object of the memorialists being that these “captains,” if well paid, should give timely information to the magistrates and the landlords and would also protect the last-named class in the carrying out of their eviction processes. A short time back the Chief Secretary for Ireland said he was not aware of these memorials; but he (Lord Robert Montagu) was aware of them, and knew the names of some of the signatories.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: The noble Lord is in error. I did not say I was not aware of these memorials. What I did say was I had made inquiries, and that no such memorials had been presented.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU was afraid the right hon. Gentleman had been misinformed. Such memorials had been presented signed by magistrates, and one of the persons liberated in consequence of such memorials was Captain Duffy, who was at the present time at large in Westmeath. If the Chief Secretary was not aware of any such memorials was it not somewhat curious that the Bill now before the House should contain a clause giving the Lord Lieutenant power to do the very thing for which they petitioned? Why did they insert a clause providing that the Justices should have power to liberate prisoners whom they deemed it “inexpedient” to punish without proceeding to conviction. If the persons charged were innocent it would be the plain duty of the Justices to discharge them, and no discretionary power of discharge would be necessary. The obvious meaning of the clause was to empower the Justices, who desired this timely information, to liberate evil-disposed persons who had hitherto been engaged in misleading the people. It was a great injustice to the people of Ireland, and it was specially unjust to the people of Westmeath, to give power to the Justices to set at liberty the members of illegal societies. There was another clause in the Bill to which he took exception. This was a clause to continue the operation of an Act of 2 & 3 Vict. c. 74, continued by the 11 & 12 Vict. c. 89, in relation to the taking and administering of unlawful oaths in Ireland. The first mentioned Act was passed in order to exempt the Order of Freemasons on certain conditions from the operation of the Act of 50 Geo. III. c. 102, and 4 Geo. IV. c. 87, against the administering and taking unlawful oaths in Ireland. The Act of 2 & 3 Vict. rendered it penal for any Society to have and use secret signs and passwords; all persons offending against the provisions of that Act were declared to be guilty of felony, and liable to seven years' transportation; but the second clause exonerated Freemasons from these consequences on condition that two members of the lodge made a declaration on oath before a justice of the peace that the lodge was formed in conformity to the ordinary rules of the Freemason's lodges of the kingdom. Another condition was that on the 25th of March in every year two members of each lodge were to appear and swear before a magistrate, and declare what were the objects of the society, and also deposit with the clerks of the peace a list of the members and office-bearers; otherwise they might be held guilty of felony and subjected to seven years' transportation. He had made inquiry in Dublin recently, and found that the conditions of the exempting Act had not been complied with in any instance, so that every member of a Freemasons' lodge in Ireland was at the present time a felon, and liable to seven years' transportation. It was not difficult, therefore, to imagine a Law Officer of the Crown, who happened to be a member of the Grand Lodge in Dublin, being called upon to prosecute himself. Imagine the hon. and learned Gentleman or the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland, when he interposed to prevent O'Donovan Rossa or Mitchel from taking their seats in this House, being interrupted by the information that he was as much a felon as they were, and equally disqualified from sitting in the House of Commons. If it could be shown that the right hon. Gentleman was a member of any such illegal Society and subject to those penalties, the career of the right hon. Gentleman, hitherto so brilliant, would by this untimely discovery be nipped in the bud. He might go further and imagine worse. He might imagine the popular Lord Lieutenant, on returning to the seat of his Government, anticipating a brilliant reception and a warm welcome from the people of Ireland—and finding himself in the custody of two sergeants of police, on the charge that he was a member of a Secret Society, being the Master of a Lodge that had not fulfilled the conditions of 2 & 3 Vict. c. 74, continued by 11 & 12 Vict. c. 89, and therefore guilty of a felony and liable to seven years' transportation under 50 Geo. III. c. 102. Of course, this was all pure imagination; but, in point of fact, each of these distinguished men was liable to punishment under the existing law. It would be a sad thing for Ireland to find her popular and handsome Lord Lieutenant wasting his sweetness on the desert air of Van Diemen's Land. It was clear that legislation at variance with constitutional principles was carried out differently in different parts of the country. The policy which he would desire to see pursued towards Ireland was that indicated by the Prime Minister himself when he said that the Irish ought not to be treated as a conquered people; and the Tory Party boasted that their policy was to give to the Irish people a power of local self-government. The Prime Minister knew the generous hearts which Irishmen possessed; he knew that in the warmth of their affection they would forget the past, however unjust it had been, if only a kind sympathy were extended to their country, and that they would heartily co-operate with him in carrying out a just system of government in the future. Having read history, the Prime Minister knew that the Irish were the bravest of the brave—he knew how Irishmen had distinguished themselves in the Peninsular, in the Crimean War, and in every other war, and he knew that they, of all peoples, most hated oppression and injustice. He (Lord Robert Montagu) warned the Government that the Irish people would some day resent the tyranny under which they groaned, and that the continuance of coercive measures would bring about that very dismemberment of the Empire which was now so much dreaded. He called upon them to be wise in time, while as yet the Irish people might be turned into their warmest friends and supporters; and remarking that Ireland had always been the weak point of this country, he reminded them of the Pennsylvanian line, which turned the tide of victory at the time our North American Colonies separated from us. The policy he urged upon the present occasion was the policy of the Prime Minister as announced in his speech in April, 1868:—

“I say that during the period when I have had a lead in public life—I am sorry to say more than five-and-twenty years—I have acted conscientiously on this principle alone, and I ask what was the policy which we pursued in Ireland? That policy was a policy of conciliation."

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "this House disapproves of the imposition or maintenance of exceptional legislation, except in those cases where urgent grounds, proving the necessity of it, have been clearly shown; and that sufficient grounds for the maintenance of any exceptional legislation have not been proved to exist at present in Ireland,"—(Lord Robert Montagu.)

—instead thereof.

MR. R. E. PLUNKETT: Sir, I do not propose to follow all the ramifications of the discourse of the noble Lord the Member for Westmeath (Lord Robert Montagu), nor to comment upon the first part of his speech, as the question of Home Rule is not at present before the House. With regard to the second part, I will only say that his statistics as to the diminution of crime in Ireland must afford pleasure to every Irishman. But they only show that these restrictive measures have been successful, not that they should be repealed. Could he have produced such statistics before these restrictions were imposed, there would have been no question of imposing them. But by way of an argument against their continuance, he states that in England, where these laws do not exist, there is more crime than in Ireland, where they do. He even shows that in those parts of Ireland where only the less stringent of them are in force, crime is 92 per cent, 56, and 34 per cent in excess of the crime in those districts where these measures are imposed in all their stringency. It is admitted that Ireland is at present governed by laws of exceptional stringency, and the question before the House is, whether these laws, so far as they are not repealed by this Bill, ought to be continued. And the principle upon which we must decide appears to be a very plain one. If the ordinary laws of the United Kingdom are sufficient to preserve peace and to protect life and property in Ireland, we ought not to add to them others of an exceptional character. If, on the other hand, the ordinary laws of the Kingdom are ineffective, or cannot be carried out in Ireland, then it is clearly the duty of any Government of that country to pass such supplementary measures as shall be necessary to keep the peace and to give protection to life and property. The question has been raised whether we have evidence of the insufficiency of the ordinary law. I fear that the history of Irish trials, even of those which have recently taken place, shows only too clearly that the ordinary law is not sufficient. If witnesses can be found, they give evidence at the risk of their lives, and even upon the clearest and most conclusive evidence, juries will not dare to convict. Until we can rely upon Irish juries to do their duty we cannot say that the ordinary law is sufficient for Ireland. Then we have the declaration of the right hon. Baronet the Chief Secretary for Ireland, that the Government have information which satisfies them that these restrictive measures cannot yet be withdrawn; but he added that this information could not, without breach of faith, be laid before the House. Certainly that reservation has a most unpleasant sound about it; and probably, when the noble Lord the Leader of the Opposition rose to reply, some hon. Members may have expected that he would take exception to it. But the noble Lord had himself been Chief Secretary for Ireland, and had in that capacity earned respect both in Ireland and in England; and he, speaking with more knowledge on this matter than any other Member of the House, was so convinced of the necessity of these measures, that, rising above Party considerations, he frankly supported Her Majesty's Ministers. If the welfare of Ireland had been preferred to Party interests many years ago, I do not think we should have been discussing these measures now. I say that these measures have been rendered necessary by misrule in the past; but now that England admits that, and is only anxious to do what is best for Ireland, it is childish to let resentment for the past make us blind to the necessities of the present. To my mind, the very fact that the Government cannot produce the information which they possess, points to a state of things in Ireland that would make it very unwise to withdraw these laws. They were not imposed by any one Act. They were introduced only as necessity arose. They are not—except the Westmeath Acts—

operative, but permissive; they did not apply of themselves to any part of Ireland, but were only imposed on such districts as required them. And I think the fact that it has been found necessary to include under their action every part of Ireland, except, I believe, Tyrone County and parts of Fermanagh and County Down, show that they were not uncalled for. Both the present and the late Government of Ireland agree that they are necessary, and we know that they do not speak without having ascertained the opinion of the resident magistrates. No one attempts to deny that these laws have prevented a great deal of crime, and, as far as I know—and I have been watching the list pretty closely—not one single Petition has been presented against them. They are stringent; but with the Amendments which this Bill proposes, I do not think that they injure any peaceable subject of Her Majesty. An hon. Member complained last year that he had been prevented from carrying a revolver without a special licence—I think it was the hon. Member for Cavan. But I think that his complaint tells more for the Bill than against it. For why did he want to carry a revolver? Either as a weapon of attack or as a means of defence? If he wanted it for purposes of attack, that is a strong argument for this Bill; if he wanted it for self-defence, what does that reveal about the state of Ireland? It is not upon the farmer or the labourer that this Bill will press, so long as they are peaceably inclined, though it may inconvenience country gentlemen, who often want to carry arms from one county to another. The farmer rarely wants to carry wants beyond the limits of his own holding, and this, and more than this, he can do under the Bill before us. He has only to get a licence through a stipendiary magistrate, and unless there are good grounds for refusing him, no substantial farmer will have any difficulty. It is quite true that licences “have” been refused to small farmers, on this ground, that where they are known to possess arms, it very often happens that their houses are broken into and their arms carried off. If hon. Members will look into the Appendix of the Report of the Westmeath Committee, they will find whole strings of such robberies. So that it comes to this—that in the case of men who cannot take care of their arms, it is evidently better both for them and for the community that they should give them up to the police than to nocturnal marauders. It may sound strange to English ears that a man is more likely to be attacked, if he is known to have arms; but we have ways of our own in Ireland, and that is one of them. There is no class of men to whom these laws are so necessary as to the farmers. I hope the House will bear with me if I give a brief illustration of this by a few facts which I may give on the authority of an Irish magistrate, though I can corroborate most of them myself. Shortly before the passing of the Westmeath Act, Ribbonism spread over a part of Meath which had until then been one of the quietest in Ireland. First, shots were fired at night, apparently without any particular object. Then, farmers received threatening letters, and were ordered to employ one man or discharge another under pain of assassination. I may remark that not one of these letters was sent to a landlord. The next phase was, that houses were fired into, and then a train was fired at, and a second-class carriage riddled with slugs. The farmers were in fear of their lives—they were the slaves of an invisible society, and might be forced to employ a man who was worse than useless, and whom they felt to be a spy upon all their actions. A reign of terror was established, and those who lived in thatched houses scarcely dared to sleep at night. But if the farmers were to be pitied, there were some who were still worse off at that time. There were many men in that neighbourhood, who either in very early youth or under compulsion, had taken the Ribbon oath. Many of these had for years led respectable lives, and some were in positions of considerable trust. But with this revival of Ribbonism they were plunged into a degrading servitude. Body and soul, they seemed in the power of a secret gang of murderers, who might command them to commit any crime under pain of being murdered if they refused. Nor was this a danger that threatened them alone, they knew too well that their wives and children might be the victims as well as themselves. All this misery was caused by four men. Everyone knew who they were; but not a man dared give evidence against them.

Lord Spencer, whose unfailing energy and industry deserve the warmest gratitude of Irishmen, knew almost every detail of their lives; but not a witness could be got to come forward openly. The leader of the four was arrested, and then occurred something sadly characteristic of Ireland. Two thoroughly respectable farmers were frightened into giving bail for this man. They said afterwards that they never thought their bail would be taken. While things were in this state, the Westmeath Act was introduced into this House. What followed? This Ribbon quartette did not await its passing. They vanished, and with them every sign of disturbance in that neighbourhood. Confidence has been restored since it has been seen that the law is stronger than the Ribbon Society, and there is now comfort and prosperity where all was terror and disturbance. I would ask the House on which side the coercion lay. Are people more free under the reign of terror or under the reign of law? And I would point out that the virtue of all laws of this sort lies rather in their duration than in their severity. The evil we have to contend against is one of long standing, and it cannot be cured in a moment. A contempt for law, which has been engendered by the vacillation of the past, will not be eradicated by vacillation now. The well-disposed in Ireland have been too often sacrificed in vain attempts at pleasing those who regard every concession as a sign of weakness. It was the alternation of foolish sentimentalism and spasmodic severity that was so fatal to the progress of Ireland in days gone by: that oft-repeated attempt at governing Ireland upon the "Irish ideas" of those whose one idea was to have no Government at all. There was no want of truer ideas in Ireland. Again and again, when England has looked round for the man to govern her greatest colonies or lead her proudest enterprizes, she has found him in an Irishman. But she did not then go to the class from which she drew her Irish ideas. And now, again, the gentlemen of Ireland have offered their advice, they have warned the Government that the time has not come when these laws can be removed, and I think the House should not lightly reject their counsel. I most earnestly hope that the day is not far distant when these restrictions may be withdrawn, but every rash attempt to anticipate it only puts it further off. It is for this reason that I have spoken—for this reason alone that I shall support the Bill.

Mr. OWEN LEWIS said, he opposed the measure on behalf and in the name of the people of Ireland, in the name of the fundamental principles of the British Constitution, and in the name of our common humanity. That Constitution, as wisely carried out in England and Scotland secured the happiness and contentment of the people, and there was no more ardent admirer of it than he was; but, unfortunately, in Ireland they knew very little of what constitutional government was. All the Irish people knew of the Constitution was, that it was continually being suspended by whatever Ministry was in office. If they wished to make Ireland as contented as England and Scotland, she must be governed in the same way. The whole history of Ireland was one scene of coercion, which had always produced sedition, and then sedition was laid hold of as an excuse why coercion laws should be continued. To make Irishmen contented they must treat them wisely, and, above all things, justly. Were Irishmen so treated they would become at once contented, happy, and loyal. These coercion laws were not only harsh and unjust, but they were unnecessary and uncalled-for. They were not asked for by the working men, the shopkeepers, or the professional men, but only by one class, and that class was the Irish gentry. It was a class, however, which did not represent either the feelings or the sympathies of the Irish people, and certainly did not possess their confidence. In days when their power was untrammelled, they treated the people as serfs and helots; and in later times they had been opponents of every concession, and of every attempt to restore to the people the national rights of which they had been deprived. In 1829 the gentry opposed the emancipation of three-fourths of their fellow-countrymen. In 1867 they opposed religious equality; in 1871 they opposed a moderate system of tenant-right; in 1872 they opposed both the passing of the Ballot, and the passing of the Juries Bill which provided that no man, however humble, should be punished until a jury had been impartially selected. In 1873 they opposed religious education in Ireland, although they had supported it in England; and in 1874 they opposed the extension of municipal privileges and the borough franchise in Ireland, while now in 1875 they sought, he was sorry to say, the re-enactment of these laws. The Bill was unjust and uncalled for, and before they passed such laws, they should consider the feelings of the people upon whom they would impose restriction. They had been told that no oppression would be suffered under it, because the officials would see that everything would be done justly; and though no one could doubt the humanity of the Lord Lieutenant and the Chief Secretary, yet they ought not to be asked to pass this exceptional law, a law which Englishmen and Scotchmen would rebel against if proposed for their countries—they would not entrust their liberties and freedom to men because of their humanity. Personal liberty and freedom ought to be enjoyed in Ireland, as in other parts of the Queen's dominions, as a matter of right and of course, and it was too sacred a thing to place at the disposal of any set of men, however careful and conscientious they might be. The law was unnecessary in Ireland. The condition of that country did not justify its being passed. He ventured to say that at the present moment Ireland was more peaceful than she had been for many years before, and that there was there perfect security for life or property. In fact, contrasting the feeling and bearing of the two peoples, the English and the Irish, there was more necessity for laws of the kind in England than there was for them in Ireland. To show that oppression might occur under those Acts, he would refer to the case of Patrick Casey, that had been brought under the notice of the House by the senior Member for the city of Limerick (Mr. Butt), in which the only son and support of an aged father was suddenly seized and incarcerated for two and a-half years, without trial and without being allowed to be visited by his family. In fact, he could see no difference between the law, as applied to Ireland, and those laws which existed in France in the last century under the old regime, and which had led to the dethronement and downfall of the Bourbon dynasty. In France a man could be arrested at the will of the monarch, and he could be incarcerated for any length of time without being brought to trial—kept in gaol without knowing the name of his accuser. The same thing could occur in Ireland, the only difference being that the prison in France was called the Bastille, and in Ireland Kilmainham; that the system in France was called lettres de cachet, and in Ireland the warrant of the Lord Lieutenant. If they wished to see the people respect the laws, they should take care that the laws were of such a character that they deserved to be respected. He protested, in conclusion, against those Coercion Acts in the name of the Constitution, because their continuance would tend to weaken the hands of those who wished to teach the people to seek the redress of their grievances by constitutional means; and he protested, in the name of his country, and of their common humanity, against exceptional laws being passed for Ireland.

MR. CONOLLY said, he regarded the speech of the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down as more suitable for a debating society than for a practical Assembly like that House. The fact was they had just heard a speech which was very forcible in reference to the value of the British Constitution, but had nothing specially to do with the matter then before them. One and all of the hon. Gentlemen upon the benches on the other side seemed to be purblind, for they consented with marvellous agreement, to ignore that which alone could justify exceptional legislation, and that was the existence in Ireland of a most brutal conspiracy, which was called the Ribbon Society. The hon. Member who had just spoken had extolled the British Constitution; but had kept studiously in the dark that deep stigma upon Ireland of which he ought to be more ashamed than he was of his advocacy of a time-serving popularity. If the hon. Gentleman wished by supporting a policy that would set gangs of murderers and evil-disposed persons free, to the injury of commerce, the encouragement of social terrorism, and the destruction of the liberty of the lower orders in Ireland, to build up his popularity thereby, he (Mr. Conolly) could only say he did not envy him in it. He was proud to belong to the order of Irish Gentlemen, and it was a defamation to state that they opposed Catholic emancipation, or that they opposed tenant-right, or that they had not represented the people of Ireland honourably, uprightly, and conscientiously. He confessed that these discussions caused personal pain to him, because it was disagreeable to acknowledge that so long as this plague-spot remained in Ireland, measures must be adopted to ensure the government of Ireland. Every one who was acquainted with the ramifications of that dark and black conspiracy knew that it was their duty to ask for exceptional measures. It was impossible there could be a parity of laws and an exercise of the Constitution in the two countries so long as Ireland remained what she was. Therefore it was that those who were acquainted with Ireland and the Ribbon conspiracy which existed there came forward and asked that these exceptional powers should be granted. He would be delighted and hail the day as one of the happiest he ever saw if equal laws could be applied to the two countries, but in the name of all that was right and truthful let them not tell the House and the country that Ireland had any right to equal laws until she had removed from her soil that odious and black spot—the Ribbon conspiracy, and when that had been done then they could come and ask for equal laws for their country.

MR. WHALLEY said, he would ask why the Government did not come to the help of English Members, and tell them what was the real cause of this measure. By not doing so they incurred great blame. The hon. Member who spoke last (Mr. Conolly) spoke of the Ribbon conspiracy, but they all knew, as it was known all over the world, that it was the priests' conspiracy which the Ireland had to fear. There was, in fact, a double government in Ireland. Could any one name an instance of any country in the world where such an organization as that of the Romish priesthood was permitted to array themselves against the Government of the country? The Romish priesthood were an organized Government—a rival Government to the Sovereign, and to the laws of the country. He blamed the Government for not doing justice to the country by firmly grappling with that evil. He complained of the late and the present Governments that they did not in justice to the country, the Constitution, and to themselves, and in mercy to hon. Members, give some reasonable excuse for this exceptional measure. He had sought by means of simple statements of facts to make the real nature of this conspiracy known throughout the country. For that purpose, he sent forth the unhappy man Murphy, who created so great a consternation among those who sided with the priesthood, that he was kicked to death in the town of Whitehaven. The murderers of Murphy were sentenced to six months' imprisonment; but that period was reduced to three months' and they then returned in triumph to their fellow townsmen. That was all the work of the Roman Catholic priests. He (Mr. Whalley) might be asked, where was the remedy for this? If his advice were asked, he would say that men ought to go forth and proclaim on the platform the errors of the Roman Catholic religion, and he would appeal to the right hon. Gentleman opposite to listen to him. Let him give him (Mr. Whalley) the power; let him go into Ireland armed only with the sling and stone of free discussion, and accompanied by a few men like the unfortunate Murphy, and he believed that he could do more than Prince Bismarck did in Prussia. That was all that was needed to justify this House before the country and the world in retaining these measures of coercion. He had not less sympathy for Ireland and her honest peasantry than those hon. Members who were sent over specially to represent her, and he would ask them whether they really believed that any English Member wished to renew these Acts for the purpose of oppressing the people of Ireland? Did they not believe that that House had made many sacrifices to remove practical grievances? Was not that really felt by the Irish Members? He was anxious to express the pain he felt at the continual renewal of these Coercion Acts, and to make an appeal to the right hon. Gentleman to let the country and the world at large know that what the Government had to contend against in Ireland was the same power with which the German Government were now struggling—namely, the Roman priesthood. Whether that power was manifested under the form of Ribbonism, or Fenianism, or any other "ism," let them call it what they might, that was the one sole cause of all these troubles, of Irish discontent and disturbances. Again, he asked them to give him (Mr. Whalley) the power to repress those disturbances. It was found necessary in the time of Queen Elizabeth to send forth faithful, honest, and true missionaries, and to bring before the people the sort of discipline doctrine, customs, laws, and usages by which they were governed, in order to show them what passed. In support of his appeal, he might state that the man to whom he had before referred, Murphy, preached in the neighbourhood of Birmingham, and that he (Mr. Whalley) was with him on more than one occasion. He asked the House to mark this—that although a chair was always placed on the platform for a Roman Catholic priest, there was no other answer to what was said but riot, and sometimes murder and assault, in every direction. The result was—and he quoted from the leading organ of the Roman Catholic party in this country—that not a single Roman Catholic priest could be seen in the streets of the towns where Murphy preached.

An hon. MEMBER rose to Order. The remarks of the hon. Member for Peterborough were irrelevant to the question before the House.

MR. SPEAKER said, the hon. Member for Peterborough was in Order.

MR. WHALLEY: He did not very distinctly catch the observations of the hon. Member opposite, nor did he understand the nature of the intimation which the Speaker had been pleased to give him. However, he would now conclude his observations. He wished to express to hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway his very sincere regret that he placed such confidence in Her Majesty's Government that he must support them in this matter. Upon the other hand, he most earnestly appealed to right hon. Gentlemen opposite, for their own credit's sake and for the sake of the credit of the country, to give to that House and to the world at large, some better excuse for this Coercion Bill than had been suggested by the hon. Member who had spoken about Ribbon societies. They would have to recognize some day—and the sooner the better—that they had to contend in Ireland and increasingly in this country with a foreign Power which knew nothing of our Constitution, except as far as it could make use of it to carry out its own ends, which were antagonistic to our laws, our institutions, our national character, and to the honour and the social interests of this country, besides being repugnant to the conscience of every man who called himself an Englishman.

MR. KAVANAGH said, that he should not have trespassed on the time of the House, but for some remarks of the noble Lord the Member for Westmeath (Lord Robert Montagu), who had said in no measured terms, that the conduct of this country towards Ireland was grossly tyrannical and coercive. That strain was taken up by hon. Members opposite, and echoed and re-echoed, until at last an hon. Member found in the Irish famine the curse of British rule. The hon. Member went further than that, and said the result of English policy had been to turn the population of Ireland into rebels. He (Mr. Kavanagh) thought the hon. Member must have been carried away by his feelings, for he could hardly have remembered what the state of affairs was at that time; he could hardly have remembered that if it had not been for the charity and generosity with which England went to the aid of Ireland in that hour of need people would not have lived to be rebels, but would have perished of want. He had never yet heard it said that, with all their faults, the Irish people were wanting in gratitude, and the hon. Member for Meath must have forgotten himself in making such a remark. He (Mr. Kavanagh) endorsed the old saying that "Speech is silver, and silence is gold;" but they might be too silent, and he felt bound, on behalf of his constituents, to come forward now, and not allow the imputation to be cast upon them that they were either participators in, or sympathizers with, the crimes against which these Acts were framed. His constituents regretted with him, sincerely and earnestly, the necessity which first caused the adoption of them, and which he now regretted to believe rendered their continuance necessary. Against what was the law relating to murder framed? Was it not against the crime of murder? Who felt it as a restraint or coercion? Was it not those who committed murder? Who felt the law against the administration of unlawful oaths to be coercive? Was it not the conspirator? Who felt the law enacted against the writing of threatening letters as coercive? Was it not the dastardly coward—and crime made dastardly cowards of all her votaries? Those laws were not felt as coercive or as restraints save by those who wanted to break them, and he believed that they could have no stronger proof of the necessity for their continuance than the fact that they were felt as a restraint. Those laws to the well-disposed and peaceable inhabitants were a protection, not a restraint; and he thought that hon. Members opposite paid their constituents a very sorry compliment by representing them as groaning under the oppression of laws that were directed against such crimes. On behalf of his constituents he repudiated any such idea. His constituents felt with him sorrow and regret that Her Majesty's Government, who were responsible for the peace of the country, should feel obliged to come to that House to ask for such power; but he emphatically denied that his constituents felt those laws either as a restraint or a coercion. He confidently asserted that, for the last four years, since the mad dream of Fenianism had vanished, no case either of arrest or prosecution had taken place in the county of Carlow. As far as that county was concerned, therefore, these Acts were a dead-letter, and he might say, on his conscience, that they might be repealed without the slightest risk or danger, so far as regarded the county of Carlow, if the Government chose to show that mark of favour to a well-disposed and peaceable part of the country. He was not, however, there that night to ask for this favour; he was there only to defend the character of his constituents, not to seek for them licence to commit crime. He wished from his heart that the same could be said for the other parts of Ireland. He wished from his heart that hon. Members opposite, instead of exciting the passions of the people by describing to them the Peace Preservation Act as one of tyranny, would show them how, if they ceased to desire to commit crime, the law would cease to oppress, and the so-called yoke to gall. With reference to the Motion of the noble Lord, which was now before the House, he heartily agreed with the first part of it—

“That this House disapproves of the imposition or maintenance of exceptional legislation, except in those cases where urgent grounds, proving the necessity of it, have been clearly shown;”

but he entirely dissented from the concluding sentence—

“and that sufficient grounds for the maintenance of any exceptional legislation have not been proved to exist at present in Ireland;”

and therefore he should give to Her Majesty's Government his support for the second reading of the Bill.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY said, he had attended carefully to the arguments which had been urged in support of the Bill, and he was bound to say he found little in them beyond what been adduced on former occasions and for the same purpose. There was, however, one feature in some of them against which he felt it his duty to protest. The hon. Member for Donegal (Mr. Conolly) had asked an hon. Member at this side of the House how he dared to make the statements he did as to his county; and his example was followed by the hon. Member for Peterborough (Mr. Whalley), who asserted that the opponents of the Bill were advancing arguments which they did not in their conscience believe. He (Mr. O'Shaughnessy) would only say that if such expressions might be used in that House, the sooner the debate ended the better. The hon. Member for Carlow had spoken of the freedom of his county from the kinds of crime that had led to the passing of these Acts. What the hon. Member had said was well-founded, and had a very important bearing on the nature and necessity of these laws; for it was well known in Ireland that Carlow had been singularly fortunate in that respect, beyond all other counties in the South of Ireland; and also that the cause of that immunity was the fact that in Carlow the people had a race of kind and beneficent landlords, who allowed their tenants and others around them to live and prosper. That was the reason why Carlow thus stood out among Irish counties, and why Coercion Acts were unnecessary for it. Now, two courses were open to an hon. Member who stood up to oppose Coercion Laws. He might say there was nothing either in the quantity or in the nature of Irish crime that required anything, in the way of repression, more than the fair and impartial administration of the ordinary law. He believed that that argument commended itself to many Members who knew Ireland and the Irish people well, and had as great an interest in the welfare and contentment of the country as Her Majesty's Government could have ; but he must, at the same time, state that he did not believe it would be possible to induce a majority of the House to coincide in that view. The second course was this. An opponent of the Bill might say, that he saw it was useless to argue the question upon the nature and quantity of Irish crime, or upon the other grounds on which it was sought to justify coercion ; but admitting that crime did exist in Ireland to an extent to call for powerful means of repression, he might contend that coercion was not the proper course, because, according to all past experience, it tended not to eradicate, but to perpetuate, the evils against which it was directed. The Government admitted, by the restrictive measures they had eliminated, and those they proposed to mitigate, that the disorders of which they complained were disappearing ; and what, then, was the nature of the evils against which their Bill was directed ? To answer that question correctly, it was necessary for them to inquire into the origin of those evils ; for until that was clearly ascertained, and knew what they were dealing with, it was impossible for them to tell whether the remedy of coercion or some other was the proper one. They must also consider what had been the effect of coercion in past years, and what would be its probable effect in the future. The evils that were said to justify coercion were of two very distinct kinds. The Government declared that life and property were endangered in Ireland by combinations of class against class and of interest against interest. They declared that it was the circumstance of agrarian crime that required a special remedy — that while English crime was isolated and proceeded from the passions of individuals, agrarian crime seized on a large body of Irishmen as by a common impulse in their efforts to assert real or imaginary rights. Another ground was that of disaffection to English rule. He could not deny that there existed in Ireland, on the part of a large number of the people, a desire of separation from England, as distinguished from a desire to have the management of their own affairs ; but no one pretended to think or to hope that that disaffection would develop into rebellion within any proximate time. Taken at its highest and its worst, Irish disaffection was likely to be, in theory, no doubt, enthusiastically embraced by a certain number of persons, but it was quite incapable of being brought into action. That being so, there was no immediate danger to this country, and, so far, no occasion for restrictive measures ; and it was therefore at least possible to suspend them in order that the Government might try in the interval the effect of a constitutional treatment of the country. That method, however, could only be tried at intervals of freedom from attack, such as the present. Those were the two great crimes alleged against Ireland, but it was said that there was another phase of Irish life, not partaking of the nature of crime, but having a certain relation to it. The bulk of the people had no actual participation in crime, but it was said that they stood aloof from its detection and punishment, giving no assistance in the jury-box for its repression. It was then said that in such circumstances crime could not be repressed without the intervention of the special laws, and that the Irish people had themselves made the necessity for the introduction of coercion, a principle confessedly alien to the normal condition of a free State. Now, let them assume that all that was true, and ask themselves what was the origin of these laws. He did not think that Irishmen were more free from faults than other men ; but the wisest statesmen had admitted that, to a large extent, agrarian disturbances in Ireland, the disorganization of society, the disaffection of the lower class, and the apathy of the middle class, were the natural result of the laws enacted for Ireland by successive Governments. From the year 1800 every Government had persisted in postponing measures of redress and reform, no matter how much needed, until all hope of obtaining them had been quenched in the hearts of the people. Promises remained unfulfilled, and wrongs remained without redress long after their existence was admitted. If they had carried out the stipulations made at the time of the Union, they would possibly never have heard of the agitation for Repeal which O'Connell organized. For that they had Mr. O'Connell's own word. He constantly said that his motive for organizing the Repeal agitation, was the impossibility of obtaining just and necessary reforms in that House. A famine, and the desperation which famine brought, came in 1847. All the materials for a conflagration were present, and they burst into an insurrection in 1848. That insurrection was abortive and immediately put down; but the result of half-a-century of their policy was to leave Ireland completely disorganized and disaffected. Then came a demand for tenant-right and religious equality. They were urged under constitutional forms until all hope of success seemed at an end. The upper classes in general were ostracized from political life by their want of sympathy with the people, and every General Election left them less numerous in that House. The middle class had become apathetic on political subjects, and political power was passing more and more every day into the hands of the Irish democracy. Then came Fenianism, and they left Fenianism and the British Government to settle accounts between them. Fenianism being put down, the English Government made certain concessions which were as just and necessary 20 years before as when they were introduced. Was it wise, however, that the idea should be lodged in the minds of the people that abortive insurrection was the only way of obtaining measures of justice? There was another thing which had a very strong bearing on this subject of coercion—namely, the wide line which separated the gentry, and particularly the Protestant gentry, from the great mass of the people in Ireland, with the exception, he was happy to say, of a few places like Carlow. That separation arose from differences of race and creed, and an undue maintenance of privileges and territorial rights. A great portion of the coercion laws were passed for the maintenance of those privileges, but more generally for the maintenance of those territorial rights; and that fact alone was quite enough to maintain and enlarge the breach that existed between the gentry and the people. A still worse fact was, that those laws were administered by a magistracy belonging to the very class in whose interest they had been passed, and the consequence was, the utter alienation of the upper Protestant class from the people. The same causes, if they were still suffered to exist, must of necessity prevent Irishmen from fusing into a united nation, and entering into the practice and the spirit of the Constitution. Again, up to a comparatively recent time, the Bench was filled by men taken exclusively from one race, who had spent the best part of their lives in combating, within that House and out of it, every measure of relief demanded by the other. He did not mean to say anything against the ability or the honesty of the Judges. It was enough to say they were the partizans of one section, and that no confidence was felt in their administration of the law in any case involving class interests. A very strong feeling had now arisen in Ireland that many important constituencies had ceased to return Representatives in the proper sense of the word, and had become mere gifts at the disposal of the Liberal Minister or his Irish friends. Again, until the other day, juries were substantially selected from one class and from one creed. Lord O'Hagan's Act had altered that, and if complaint was now made of the acquittal of prisoners by Irish juries, it would be easy to find their counterpart and cause in the hasty convictions of juries chosen from the ascendancy under the old system. During the last 75 years they had had coercion laws in Ireland of varying degrees of stringency, and what had been their effect? They were utterly powerless as preventive measures. They had not prevented the outbreak of two rebellions, or the existence of a spirit of disaffection so dangerous, that in the opinion of right hon. Gentlemen on both sides of the House it would break out again into rebellion on the first favourable opportunity. Nor had they eradicated the crimes which they called agrarian. They felt it impossible to maintain the code in its rigour on the face of their admitted diminution; but it was the Land Act that, by the partial redress it had given, and the nascent spirit of confidence in the law which it had generated, had diminished those crimes. Ministers know well that it was only after that tardy concession to justice was felt that the diminution began. It was surely not unreasonable to say that a system that had thus failed for 75 years, and in a country the freest in Europe from general crime, ought to be abandoned. If the alleged evils of Irish society were not within the reach of the Common Law, they were too deep-seated to be repressed by a measure which had so long been tried in vain. To get rid of them, the House must place Ireland under the Common Law, and must bring to its administration, instead of political Judges and officials, the gentry, the middle classes, and the body of the people of Ireland. They must confine to the Judges those judicial functions which were proper to their office, for thus alone would they re-establish the prestige of the Bench in Ireland, and the confidence of the people in its justice. The Irish aristocracy must cast aside the remnants of the spirit of ascendancy of a class apart from the people, and must show their willingness to enter into cordial relations with the people, and then the greatest obstacle to the pacification of Ireland would be removed. But that obstacle could not be removed whilst these coercion laws existed on the Statute Book. The middle classes must be roused from the apathy into which a long course of mis-government had plunged them.

Mr. O'Shaughnessy

Notice taken that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members being found present.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY resuming, said, that that interruption, he believed, was due to the suggestion of a Member of his own party, whom he begged to thank for it. He would say in conclusion that if they wished to pacify the Irish people and introduce into that country a healthy public and political spirit, they must not rely on a policy which had led to an unbroken series of failures. Before the late Liberal Government went out of office, the Irish Government had been carried on by means of patronage, which, in fact, vitiated the whole of the public service and created general dissatisfaction and discontent. That must be remedied. He scarcely expected that a majority of English Members would vote for the Resolution of the noble Lord; but he did hope that every Irish Member and every Member on both sides of the House, who desired the ultimate reconciliation of Ireland, would vote against a continuance of this coercive and exceptional legislation.

MR. J. P. CORRY said, that as an Irish Member, representing one of the most populous and certainly not the least prosperous constituency in Ireland, he wished briefly to state the reasons why he could not support the Motion of the noble Lord, and would give his vote for the second reading of the Bill. English and Scotch Members might be misled by the assumption of some hon. Members opposite, who claimed to speak in the name of the whole of the Irish people. He denied that they did so, or that they in any way represented the general feeling of the people of Ireland. There was a very large and influential section of the Irish people who did not sympathize with the noble Lord and his Friends in their views, and who took exception to such an airing of what were called Irish grievances.

Notice taken that 40 Members were not present: House counted, and 40 Members being found present,

MR. J. P. CORRY, resuming, said that, considering the inflammable materials existing in parts of Ireland and the attempts to cause excitement there, it would not be wise to repeal the Coercion Acts altogether. Indeed, from his knowledge of Ireland he considered that the Government had in the Bill gone as far in the way of a relaxation of the existing coercive legislation as they could at present safely go, and he hoped that before the time fixed in those Bills had passed, a better state of feeling would exist.

MR. O'REILLY rose to Order. He wished to know if the hon. Member was in Order in reading his speech.

MR. SPEAKER ruled that the hon. Member would not be in Order in reading his speech.

MR. J. P. CORRY proceeded to say that in Belfast there had been some disgraceful riots, which he (Mr. Corry) took an active part in suppressing; but no respectable man took part in these proceedings, and when the magistrates asked the Lord Lieutenant to issue a special proclamation, which he was entitled to do under the Coercion Acts, they were seconded by no class more strenuously than by the working class. Peace was thus restored, and during the two years throughout which that proclamation was in force, he never heard that any person was aggrieved by it, the people being quite as free as if they were living in London. He confessed that he felt some anxiety, when the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland proposed this, as to the extent to which he was going to give up the safeguards which had made life and property more secure in Ireland; but he had no doubt the Executive Government would use the power which would be given them under the Bill in the mildest way, and he trusted that in a short time the whole of Ireland would be relieved from its operation. Complaints had been made by hon. Members opposite as to the sources from whence the Government received the information on which the continuance of preventive measures were based. That information was from the magistrates and those who were responsible for the security of life and property in Ireland. He regretted that the Government had been compelled to bring in such a Bill, but, under all the circumstances, he could not do otherwise than support them.

SIR PATRICK O'BRIEN said, the circumstance of his having long had the honour of a seat in that House, while it afforded him on many previous occasions an opportunity of speaking on questions of a similar character to that then under any consideration, prevented his offering new remarks to the House, and he should have refrained from addressing it were it not that his county was specially made to suffer by the provisions of the Protection of Life and Property Acts. The history of Ireland was, unfortunately, in a great degree a recital of coercive measures. The existence of crime, though created in a great degree by unjust legislation, and often still more unjust administration in former times, seemed in some degree to warrant the introduction of stringent, if not oppressive, legislation. But of late years he was happy to find a change of opinion on all sides of the House in reference to Irish matters, and while opposed to the measure under consideration, he was fully prepared to admit that the feelings of English Members on the Government side of the House, as well as those upon the Opposition Benches, were not unkindly disposed towards Ireland, and that in the support which they were giving to a measure of restriction of the Constitution in that country, they were influenced by a desire to repress crime there rather than to deprive the Irish people of the benefit of constitutional laws. Neither had he any doubt that the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland had every desire to do justice to that country, and he regretted that the Government had not been able to carry out their intentions. In former years when measures of coercion were introduced for Ireland, the very existence of a nomenclature referring to illegal organizations afforded some slight prima facie case for their introduction. The names Whiteboy, Terry Alt, Molly Maguire, and others, were not then unfamiliar, and imported the existence of illegal and dangerous confederacies. There were no such designations now existing. It would not be pretended that this Act was a remedy against Fenianism. He (Sir Patrick O'Brien) on a late occasion had given the reasons for his belief that that confederacy was now powerless in Ireland, and he would not weary the House by repeating the reasons for forming that opinion. The question, then, for their consideration was, on what grounds the Government sought for a renewal of these Acts, and that led him to regard the state of society existing when similar legislation had been proposed for their consideration. When Earl Grey was Premier and asked Parliament to pass a Coercion Act for Ireland, he stated that in one province, in one year, as many as 173 murders had been committed. In a subsequent year Sir Robert Peel, in justifying a similar measure, used the remarkable words that in that year more blood had been shed in Ireland than had sufficed to roll back the fiery torrent of French valour at Busaco; and when Sir George Grey subsequently proposed measures for a like purpose, he also stated that there had been in the previous year 96 homicides and over 200 attempts at robberies of fire-arms. He might fairly ask the Government to contrast the existing state of affairs in Ireland with what it was in those days. The hon. Member for Donegal (Mr. Conolly) had stated a short time ago that hon. Gentlemen who opposed the Bill would let loose the marauders now in prison. But where were the marauders? Why, with all the power they possessed for their capture, the Government had not a single man in gaol under the Act of July, 1871. During the interval between the introduction of Sir Robert Peel's measures and those of Sir George Grey evictions in Tipperary were almost unlimited.

Mr. J. P. Corry

One gentleman was so often shot at as to acquire the name of the "woodcock," but he had lived down all the ill-feeling against him, and became one of the most popular landlords in that county. He had seen by the public prints that a shocking murder had recently occurred at Ferbane. But that was an isolated case, and he gathered from the public prints that it had been caused by family differences. He, in common with his friends who sat around him, was there to assert that murder admitted of no palliation, and he would resign his seat in that House, much as he valued it, before he would desist from proclaiming that sentiment in every society. Now, as regarded the clauses referring to the possession of arms, it was a cruel hardship that a respectable farmer was obliged to obtain the licence of a resident magistrate in order to enable him to obtain a gun to destroy vermin on his farm or to protect his property. The mode of granting these licences was most objectionable. Without mentioning names, he would assert that in granting those licences there was no uniformity of action. One resident magistrate would grant a gun to a respectable man, holding some 30 or 40 acres of land, and across a narrow brook another resident magistrate would refuse a man in precisely the same circumstances a similar privilege. It was idle to say that this poor man had his remedy in an appeal to the Lord Lieutenant. He would not be listened to in opposition to the resident magistrate, when, as was often the case, he was backed up by the local magistrate of the district; and talking of magistrates brought him to the consideration of the probable administration of this law. Under the amended Act the magistrates had more power than under the old Acts, for they possessed the summary jurisdiction which had been alluded to. He was not there to speak with disrespect of the Irish magistracy, or of any other class of his fellow-countrymen. But he would say, that his firm belief was, that for years past the majority of gentlemen included in Her Majesty's commission did not possess the entire confidence of the mass of the people. Again, no doubt, it might be said that the distinguished nobleman who at present presided over the Irish Government and the right hon. Baronet would see to the proper administration of this law. But he believed this would not be found in practice to be the case. The noble Duke was justly respected in Ireland, and was a fair and impartial governor; but, then, he was a layman, and must rely upon others learned in the law. The distinguished Gentleman who was now Lord Chancellor of Ireland, who was an honour to the University he represented, and whose fame was appreciated in that House, had no charge of these matters. They rested in the charge of the right hon. Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland. Of that Gentleman's character and honour he would speak with all respect; but he would not be doing his duty to his constituency if he did not say that he believed that he had no practice in the criminal law, and was therefore not qualified to carry out the provisions of this stringent Act. He believed that he had made out a case against the Bill. There was no fear of Fenianism, and there was at present scarcely any agrarian crime in Ireland. Should the occasion arise, and that it was shown Government could not be carried on without resource to coercive measures, that House he knew would willingly recognize the necessity, and he, for one, in such an event, would not oppose the measure; but, as he said before, no case of necessity had not been shown, therefore he should vote against the second reading.

THE O'CONOR DON said, he agreed with the noble Lord the Member for Westmeath (Lord Robert Montagu), who introduced the Amendment, in his general objections to measures of a coercive character; but he could not conceal from himself, and it would be uncandid to conceal from the House, that the Bill now before them was in a very different form from that in which it had been presented to them in 1873. The Government, in asking for these extraordinary powers, had made great and important concessions, and many of the restrictions that formed provisions of previous Bills did not appear in this one. For instance, the Bill of 1873 contained clauses restricting the liberty of the Press, which had disappeared from this Bill. It contained provisions for the arbitrary arrest of strangers—clauses rendering persons going out at night liable to arrest. It contained several other provisions of a most stringent and coercive character, which had not been heard of up till 1870, but were then introduced in consequence, it was said, of the very disturbed condition of the country. All these provisions had disappeared, and it would be a great mistake not to admit, to the fullest extent, the concessions which had been made by the Government. When the Bill of 1873 was before the House, he moved an Amendment which was tantamount to its rejection on the second reading, and he then stated that these Coercion Acts could only be got rid of by degrees. It was impossible for any Government to sweep them away all at once. He blamed the Government of that day for having re-introduced the Acts without the slightest relaxation, and without any intimation of the ultimate abandonment of these measures. Holding that opinion, then, and being of the same opinion still, it would be uncandid if he did not give the Government every credit for what they had done. In the principle they had adopted he entirely concurred. Nothing could be more unfair or contrary to the fact than the statements that Bills of this description had their origin in English feeling. He did not believe there was any feeling in this country which would force on the Government measures of this kind with regard to Ireland. They had their origin in Ireland; and they had been renewed from time to time in obedience to demands which came from Ireland. ["No, no!"] It was most unjust to represent these measures as emanations of English hostility to Ireland; they had arisen from demands from Ireland which, to a certain extent, compelled the Government to yield to them. He could understand that the right hon. Baronet who so ably filled his position of Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant went to Ireland actuated by the very best intentions, imbued with great admiration for the British Constitution, an ardent lover of freedom, and anxious that the Irish people should enjoy all the liberties of Englishmen. That right hon. Gentleman, on arriving at Dublin Castle from England, heard on every side that exceptional laws of this description were necessary, and the demand for coercion came chiefly from those who were entrusted with the responsibility of carrying out the ordinary law—namely, from the magistracy and the gentry. The truth was, they—the magistracy—had been so accustomed to carry on the government with the assistance of these extraordinary laws, that it had become almost a matter of second nature with them to fall back upon the Executive for assistance, and if these laws were swept away suddenly, those who were responsible for the government of the country would perhaps unconsciously fail in their duty, while those who were inclined to violence and outrage would take advantage of that state of things. The safest course was to relax these laws gradually, to accustom the magistracy to rely upon the ordinary law of the country, and not to seek for any extraneous assistance from the Government of Dublin Castle. If the Bill of the Government were confined to the re-enactment of the state of things which existed before 1870, even with the addition of what were known as the Westmeath clauses, he should feel that he could not conscientiously vote against the second reading, although, unless forced by absolute necessity, he should probably not give his vote in its favour, having such an inherent objection to laws of this description. But he was sorry to say that the Bill was not entirely confined to the state of things existing prior to 1870. The Bill seemed to him to be capable of being divided into two portions—those which related to what were called proclaimed districts and to the county of Westmeath and parts of the neighbouring counties, and those which extended to the whole of Ireland. All the enactments which came under the former head were clearly special in their character, and limited in their operation. It would be possible for the Executive, even if the Bill passed, so far as those clauses were concerned, gradually to withdraw the proclamations until the whole of Ireland would be as free as any part of England. And the same with regard to the portions which related to Westmeath, those rested with the Executive, and might have no practical operation whatever, and he believed that, at the present moment, there was not a single person confined in prison under those clauses. The hon. Member for Donegal (Mr. Conolly) had said that the Bill was justified on the ground of the existence of a Ribbon conspiracy, and that while that conspiracy existed, it was advocating a time-

serving popularity to oppose it. But were there not provisions in the Bill which referred to the whole of Ireland, and did they not all admit that the Ribbon conspiracy was not universal over the whole of that country? The man who held that Ireland was in the worst condition would admit that there were portions of the country which were as free from any unlawful conspiracy as any portion of England. And yet there were clauses in the Bill, over which the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland had no power, and which, whether he liked it or not, would be in force in the most peaceable districts in Ireland, and, amongst these provisions, he would notice the one by which the innocent inhabitants of a locality were mulcted with a tax and a fine, because it happened that an isolated crime of agrarianism had been committed amongst them. On what possible ground could that be justified? If the object were to compensate the individual who had suffered, why was the imposition confined to agrarian crime? If the object was to punish the offender, directly or indirectly, that object was defeated in nine cases out of ten. If the offender was an evicted tenant or a discharged labourer, he would not bear any portion of the penalty; and, indeed, if it fell in part on the successor of an evicted tenant, he would be gratified by that fact. If the object were to prevent local sympathy with the offender, or to lead to his detection, he would ask whether, since 1870, the imposition of the fine had produced evidence against a single offender, or any assistance in vindication of the law. The police tax was based on the same principle; but that was a special payment exacted from a locality, in consideration of extra police being sent to it, and there was some justification for it ensuing out of the fact that the inhabitants of the district received some protection through the presence of the police; and yet the evidence before the Westmeath Committee of 1871, went to show that that tax produced dissatisfaction, disloyalty, and discontent among the respectable portion of the community. It was declared by nearly every witness examined before the Westmeath Committee, that such an imposition had been attended by the most lamentable consequences, and that instead of adding to the peace and tranquillity of the country, it had a contrary effect. These clauses were included in the Bill, and seemed to him to be utterly monstrous in their character. They implied such impotence on the part of the Government, such a return to the ages of barbarism, that he should oppose as heartily as he possibly could any Bill in which such proposals were contained. There were also other proposals which extended to the whole of Ireland. There was one which empowered the police to arrest and bring up persons who were believed to be able to give evidence upon a charge for which no one was in custody, and who were unwilling to give evidence. What evidence could be got from an unwilling witness that would be of the slightest use upon a criminal trial? He thought the only effect of such a clause would be to cause irritation. Then, what could be more unconstitutional than the provisions relative to arms? If every one who had possession of arms were made to take out and pay for a licence, the Government would know by whom arms were kept; but the existing irritating provisions were of much more severity than in the Acts previous to 1870, and they were continued in the present measure. With regard to the character of the Bill also, he considered the form in which it was drawn to be very objectionable. A number of previous statutes were referred to, and it was impossible to understand the various provisions without consulting four or five Acts of Parliament. That complaint, he admitted, applied to many other Bills; but it would have been easy, in the present instance, to have the clauses of the old Acts, which were to be continued, introduced in the Bill, so as to make it complete in itself. Another objection was that Clause 3 embodied a number of provisions which should constitute five or six different clauses. For these reasons he was obliged to vote against the second reading. Irish Members, however, in their representations to their constituents, ought not to overlook the concessions which the Government had made. He appealed to some of his hon. Friends below the Opposition Gangway, who exercised great influence in Ireland, to place before their countrymen the bright as well as the dark side of the present Bill, and to remind Irishmen that it would depend upon themselves, whether it would or would not be followed up in future years by further concessions. It would depend upon the course taken by the Irish people during the next succeeding years whether the Bill, when its term expired, would be allowed to die out. That would, no doubt, be the result, if peace, order, and tranquillity continued in Ireland, and nothing would be more deplorable than that outbreaks should arise. He trusted that his hon. Friends would impress upon their fellow countrymen the necessity of proving by their conduct that coercion laws were unnecessary; that the concessions of the Government would be received in a proper spirit; and that, in future, no pretence would exist for saying that exceptional legislation was necessary for Ireland.

MR. ROEBUCK said, he was anxious, for two reasons, to express his opinion in support of the Bill now before the House. First, he believed the Government had a very invidious duty thrown upon them in being obliged to bring the measure forward, and he considered they ought to be supported by all those persons in that House who really thought they were doing their duty; and, secondly, he was desirous that the Bill should not wholly be discussed by Irish Gentlemen, but that English Gentlemen should also express their opinion upon it; and being an English Member, and representing a large English constituency, he wished to say a few words on that coercive measure before the debate was concluded. His name had been mentioned already in the course of the debate, and he had been spoken of as generally one who was an enemy to Ireland. That assertion he denied. When he first entered that House he found Mr. O'Connell there defending what he called, and what he felt to be the interests of Ireland, and no man stood more faithfully and strenuously at his side than himself (Mr. Roebuck). Mr. O'Connell had to meet real grievances in Ireland. He complained of them, and compelled the English Government to reverse them, and while so doing Mr. O'Connell had his most strenuous support. But the history of Ireland had really to be taken into consideration when they were discussing the Bill before them. He acknowledged at once, as he had often done before, that the government of Ireland by England in former times was about as bad a government as the world ever saw. The people were subject to every sort of oppression, their religion was oppressed, their consciences were coerced, and they were made, in fact, the slaves of the English people; and what was more curious than all was, that the colonies introduced by England into Ireland became, in the course of a generation or two, more Irish than the Irish themselves, and, in fact, portions of the most disaffected part of the Irish people. One of the most remarkable things in connection with the history of Ireland was the history of the county of Tipperary. Tipperary was very nearly depopulated by Oliver Cromwell, and his army supplied the place of the original inhabitants of that county. Cromwell's soldiers formed connections with the women of Tipperary, and ever since Tipperary had been one of the most turbulent counties in the whole of Ireland and the most opposed to England. For that, however, he did not blame the people of Tipperary, seeing that the people of that county, and Ireland generally was up to a certain period, as he had said, very ill-governed. But the government of Ireland changed when the people of England got a large share of the government of their own country—that was after the Reform Bill of Earl Grey. Since that time the English people and the English Government had striven to do justice to Ireland by removing the laws which coerced them, and for the most part they had succeeded. At that very moment—and he said it boldly—the people of Ireland were as well governed as were the people of England; and the curious thing was this—that while one could not rase out from a people the recollection of wrongs, which had been burnt into them by a long series of cruel and imperious acts, the only chance we had of turning and changing the popular mind of Ireland on the subject was rendered difficult by the extravagant language of hon. Gentlemen sent to that House by the Irish people. What he had to complain of was, that the wild conduct which those hon. Gentlemen had hitherto pursued in opposition to the Government of England had led the people of Ireland to believe that they were still subjected to the same harsh and horrible form of government under which they had previously groaned. This was the reason why these laws were necessary, and he charged hon. Gentlemen from Ireland, the leaders of the Irish people, with being the cause of the Coercion Acts under which their countrymen were now suffering. But he must say that during the present debate, he had remarked a very decided change in the language usually held, and he felt that if that language had always been held, these Coercion Acts would not have been necessary. [Laughter]. Hon. Gentlemen might laugh, but he said that they were here before the English people as before a jury, and they must abide by their acts and their language; though, he said, that by that language which they were now employing, they would conciliate the people of England. But there were effects upon the people that had been working for centuries, and considering the way in which the people of Ireland had been treated, they could not expect to make a change in an instant. He had seen for some generations past—for he was now, unfortunately, an old man—he had seen, through them all, the Governments of England endeavouring, with the best of their ability, to govern the people of that kingdom. But he was told that they had now brought about a state of peace in Ireland, that showed the utter uselessness, and that it was wholly unnecessary, to have these laws now in existence. Of this, however, they were aware that before these laws were passed, there were in Ireland great disorders, and the moment these laws were passed, they vanished—they went off to America. Repeal these Acts and they would all come back; and they would have again exactly that state of things that these very laws were brought in to obviate. What he wished to say was, that he quite coincided with the language used by the speaker who immediately preceded him, the hon. Member for Roscommon, (the O'Connor Don), that these Acts should die out peacefully, and if, as he said, the people of Ireland should show by their quiet conduct and their obedience to the law that they did not need these coercive measures, he (Mr. Roebuck) was of his opinion, that no Government of England would dare to re-enact these laws. But that must be done by experience; it could not be effected by at once sweeping away these Acts of Parliament from the Statute Book. Let them remain there as a dead letter.

Let the people of Ireland show that they were obedient to the law; let the people of Ireland show the people of England that they did not desire to be separated from England; and when they showed them that these laws were unnecessary, let them be abrogated. But so long as the leading Gentlemen of Ireland distinctly advanced their opinions, that Ireland must be separated from England, or be ruled by a Government wholly separated from that of England, he told them that it was necessary that these coercive laws should be retained. Let them show that they had lost and given up that wild opinion of separation and Home Rule, and he told them what he believed to be the exact truth—let them show that they were really one with them in England, a united people, living under one law and under one Legislature, under one Sovereign; let them show that they were really one with them, acting lawfully and obediently to the laws, and then they would find that no further Coercion Bills for Ireland would have to be passed in the Imperial Parliament.

MR. O'REILLY said, the hon. and learned Member who had just spoken had brought a grave charge against the hon. Members who, in that House, represented the Irish people—a charge that they had by their language caused disaffection and disorder in Ireland. He challenged the hon. and learned Member to give proof of any such utterances.

MR. ROEBUCK explained that his observation did not refer exclusively to the present Members for Irish constituencies, but to all the successive generations of Irish Members.

MR. O'REILLY said, he would accept the explanation. Having been in the House for 14 years, he could speak for the utterances of Irish Members during that period; and he asserted most distinctly that to none of those utterances could be traced the cause of the coercion laws under which the people of Ireland were suffering. The Irish Members had always drawn a distinction between the past and the present, and had always recognized what had been done for Ireland by the sweeping away of the alien Church, the securing of freedom of elections, and the reform of the municipal corporations. He wished also to acknowledge the fair advance towards improvement in the matter under notice made by the Government; and he admitted that in regard to exceptional legislation, the Government was entitled to make large demands upon the confidence of the Legislature, and he would have been glad if he could have accepted those proposals without offering any opposition to them. On the present occasion, however, he found it impossible either to vote for the second reading or to refrain from voting against it. He contended that the Executive were entitled to make large demands upon the Legislature when they expected insurrectionary movements, and if he had been in Parliament in 1848, as he was in 1866, he should have hesitated long before refusing the Executive the measure they asked for. But there were no such insurrectionary movements in Ireland existing now as to call for any exceptional legislation whatever, and, therefore, the Government were bound to state their reasons for the Bill. This legislation applied to all Ireland. Taking, as a typical question, the law affecting the possession of arms, powers such as were contained in the Bill could only be justified on two grounds—first, the possession of arms with a view to insurrectionary movements; and, secondly, the possession of arms as likely to lead to agrarian or other crimes. The Executive Government did not profess themselves as having the slightest fear of insurrection, although there were some men, strangers to the country, who preached armed resistance, and others, young, excitable, and foolish Irishmen, who wasted their money in the purchase of arms with a vague view to insurrection. Personally, he should applaud any Government which prevented such fools wasting their money for any such purpose. In his opinion, the only weapons which ought to be prohibited were those which were capable of being used for military purposes. The use of ordinary fire-arms would, he believed, be sufficiently restricted by the imposition of a tax. He contended that the law, as it stood, was of no practical use, because if a man was bent on murdering his neighbour, he would soon find a weapon to do the deed with. Beyond that, there were great anomalies connected with the levying of the penalty, and he maintained that that legislation would not prevent agrarian outrages. The suggestion which he had to offer was that there should be a registration of arms, and, as he had said, a tax put upon the possession of them. The greater part of Ireland was now proclaimed, but districts in the North, where they shot each other, had not been proclaimed until recently.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: Will the hon. and gallant Member allow me to explain that all parts are proclaimed except Tyrone, and portions of Antrim, Down, Donegal, Fermanagh, and Derry.

MR. O'REILLY: The railway outrage took place in a proclaimed county, and, therefore, that did not prevent the possession of arms.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: That was in the county Tyrone.

MR. O'REILLY: There was no question about the county Louth, and no question of Ribbonism there, and yet county was proclaimed. Twenty-five years ago Ribbonism did prevail in that county, but it had vanished through the action of Cardinal Cullen. The stipendiary magistrates granted the licences; but they did not all act on the same principles. What he complained of was, that that should not be left to those gentlemen, and what he wished to point out was, that the law was practically inoperative. He appealed to the heads of the Government, and not to the permanent officials in Dublin Castle, to re-consider this matter. The Act was not useful for any purpose, except to make the people feel that they had a grievance. The law was an absurd one, and an insult to the people, and therefore it was injurious to the peace and prosperity of the country. Next, as to the fining of localities. That was an exceptional law. Such laws might be necessary and useful; but this law also was neither. It gave the Government power to send down extra police at a great charge. This legislation in many other instances than those to which he had referred was uncalled for, and useless for its own purposes. He and his hon. Friends would not oppose legislation against the possession of arms intended for military purposes, or against particular districts as to which strong evidence was adduced; but they must oppose exceptional legislation for all Ireland vesting power in the Executive Government which might devolve upon persons more liable to panic and the abuse of power than the present Lord Lieutenant and Chief Secretary,

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA said, that the hon. Member for Belfast (Mr. J. P. Corry) had stated as his reason for supporting the Bill, that in Belfast no inconvenience was suffered by any respectable person in consequence of their not being able to carry arms. He was not aware that any inconvenience was felt by respectable people in St. Petersburg. The argument adduced by the hon. Member for Belfast for supporting the present law, or a continuation of it, would equally apply to the establishment of an absolute despotism in this country. He did not believe there had been any Ribbonism in Ireland for several years, but there was a very active Ribbon organization 25 years ago, and since then all bad conduct had been termed Ribbonism, just as Fenianism, which had practically ceased in Ireland, had become a term affixed to people in a disaffected state of mind. If he believed that those organizations existed, he would support the Government in their endeavours to repress them, but he did not believe in their existence. He admitted that coercive laws were the result of a certain Anglo-Irish opinion in Ireland, but the persons who formed it did not represent England; they leant on the power of the Empire for the purpose of securing class privileges, and they influenced unduly a Parliament imperfectly acquainted with the condition of Ireland, which by coercion produced mistrust in the minds of the people, provoked outbreaks, and then, in times of panic, resorted to further coercion. The ordinary law, if applied with firmness and vigilance, would accomplish all that was required. These laws had originated in a panic arising not from authentic information, but generated by rumour, which, as had been rightly said, was dispersed broadcast without any certain authority, to which malignity had given rise, and to which credulity gave magnitude.

MR. DODSON said, he did not know whether it was intended to continue the debate on another night; but, so far as it had gone, he thought it might very well be brought to a close that evening. Whether it was continued or not, if a division was taken on the Amendment of the noble Lord, he should certainly esteem it his duty to give his support to the Government, and to vote in favour of the second reading of the Bill. The Government was responsible for the peace, order, and security of Ireland. Being so, they came forward, and on that responsibility asked the House to support the Bill. Under the circumstances, it would require very strong proof of the absence of any necessity for such legislation to induce hon. Members to refuse to vote for its second reading. At the same time, he agreed that the Bill was very clumsily drawn, and very difficult to construe. It was not framed in a manner calculated to render the law intelligible. That, however, was not a peculiarly Irish grievance. They all knew the old maxim—"English law is the perfection of reason." According to Swift, it was to be understood not of the natural reason of man, but that which was to be acquired by long practice in the Court of Chancery. He did not know what amount of reason, nor where acquired, would be necessary in order to construe such legislation as that contained in the clauses of the Bill. For instance, the effect of the 3rd clause was that certain recited Acts, as quoted by one Act, as partially repealed by a second Act, as amended by a third Act, and as continued by a fourth Act, should be read and construed as modified by a fifth Act. The hon. and learned Member for Sheffield (Mr. Roebuck) was rather severe on the conduct of Irish Members generally; but he (Mr. Dodson) was glad to hear him exempt the present generation; because, during that discussion, the hon. Members for Ireland did not, in his mind, deserve the imputations cast upon them. It appeared to him that most of the criticisms and observations of Irish Members, especially of those who had spoken lately in the debate, were directed not so much against the second reading of the Bill as against particular clauses, which could be best considered in Committee. That made him doubt whether it could be intended to carry that debate beyond that evening, and whether the noble Lord should press his Resolution to a division. It must be remembered that the Bill in several important respects relaxed the provisions at present in force, and restored legislation to the state in which it existed previous to the Preservation of the Peace Act, 1870.

The stringent clauses as to newspapers were repealed; but he understood from the Chief Secretary's speech that those clauses were repealed because they had done their work, and because he thought that the circumstances were now such that they were no longer necessary. He did not understand the right hon. Baronet to say that those clauses had been either useless or inoperative in their time, but the contrary. One of the grievances upon which the noble Lord had insisted was the power given by special proclamations; but the Bill proposed to repeal the powers given under the special proclamations. The hon. Member for Roscommon (the O'Connor Don) had objected especially to the continuance of that portion of the former Act which placed on a proclaimed district the charges for extra police, and also for compensation for injuries done, remarking that the burden did not fall on the criminal, and did not stimulate the inhabitants to exert themselves for his discovery. But the principle of that legislation was not peculiar to Ireland. It prevailed in the case of riots in England, where the district was made liable by law for the damage done by the rioters; although the burden did not fall on the guilty, or fell, at least, on the innocent quite as much as the guilty, while it also did not necessarily lead to the discovery of the criminal. The object, however, of such legislation was to set the feeling of the community against the perpetration of such acts, and thus to discourage their repetition by making the people of the district indisposed to encourage amongst them those who had been, or were likely to be, guilty of such crimes. It had been urged also that, while it might be wise not to allow the indiscriminate possession of arms by a population liable to be incited to the unlawful use of them by agitators coming perhaps from another country, yet the possession of arms for purely sporting purposes ought not to be prohibited. That objection, however, did not operate against the second reading of the Bill, and it might easily be met by moving an Amendment in Committee confining the prohibition to revolvers, rifles, and weapons suitable for warfare. The noble Lord the Mover of the Amendment had tried to show that there were fewer crimes of violence in Ireland than in England, and fewer in Westmeath than in the parts of Ireland to which the Westmeath Act did not apply. Well, however that might be, the supporters of the Bill might reply that those results, if they were real, were owing to the operation of the very Acts which the noble Lord so strongly condemned. But in truth, they could not argue correctly from the number of crimes as to legislation of that sort; because in Ireland they had to deal with a state of society very different from that existing in England. In Ireland the sympathies of the population were not with the law, but against the law; and the offender was not a mere individual, but a member of a secret society, whose commands he obeyed, whose support he received, and among whom he was regarded as a hero, whereas in England he was looked upon as a pariah and an outcast. The noble Lord quoted statistics to show that crime was diminishing in Ireland, and especially in the districts to which the Westmeath Act applied, wishing them to infer that the Act might be repealed. But if crime was diminishing, so also was the stringency of the Acts being diminished, and it must be the hope and wish of every hon. Member that, at a time not far distant, that kind of legislation for Ireland would be altogether dispensed with. He could not but hope that the remedial legislation for Ireland which had now been carried on for the past 40 or 50 years was telling with effect in a constantly-increasing ratio, and that they were now approaching the term of Coercion Acts for that country; but for the present, as the Government declared on their responsibility that they thought a continuance of these Acts was necessary, he should vote for the second reading of the Bill.

Mr. MOORE said, he must contend that in a case of this kind the burden of proof as to the alleged disturbed state of Westmeath and other parts of Ireland rested upon those who instituted this system of legislation—a system which was so totally opposed to the British Constitution. It was legislation which, if brought in for this country, the people of England would not tolerate for one hour. No facts whatever to justify it had been laid upon the Table of the House for hon. Members to study, as would have been done if the introduction of such a measure with regard to any English county had been contemplated. He was perfectly prepared to support the Government in anything that might be necessary for the maintenance of law and order; but, at the same time, when they brought forward such a measure as that before the House, it was their duty to submit the facts to the House. He believed those facts would show that the outrages occurring in Ireland extended over a very small area. He (Mr. Moore) was the Representative of Clonmel, and a resident landowner in Tipperary. He had travelled through that county day and night, alone and perfectly unarmed, and he should be sorry to do so in most of the English counties. There must be a fairer understanding and a greater freedom in the expression of public opinion before Ireland could be successfully governed. He strongly condemned the system of "back-stairs government" in Ireland, under which private information was given without any proof of the facts upon which it ought to be founded. It would be well if more weight were given to the expressions of opinion of the Irish Members, who were really responsible for the country, and whose interest it was, quite as much as it was that of the English Government, to maintain the peace and order of the country.

MR. P. J. SMYTH said, he was sure the House would admit that his duty to a great constituency assailed, forbade that he should give a silent vote on the question. As a Representative of Westmeath, he thought he had some reason to complain that the right hon. Baronet had cast all the onus on that county. The people proper of Westmeath—the farmers, farm labourers, traders, and shopkeepers—were a frugal, industrious, and peaceable people. Nature had done much for their fine county, and as far as in them lay they tried to second her beneficent designs. The acts which a few years ago cast a baneful shadow over the lakes and fields of Westmeath, were the acts of a very few individuals—strangers some of them to the county—strangers all of them to the feelings and manners of her generous people. He was not there to excuse or palliate any—the slightest violation—of the eternal laws on which civil society rested, but he felt that Parliament should have paused before affixing a stigma on a great county and prosperous community. Still more should it pause, now that no cause, save suspicion, had been shown for the renewal of Coercion Acts. He submitted that before hon. Members could justify to their consciences the re-enactment of the Westmeath Act, two things should be made clear. First, that a wide-spread agrarian conspiracy did actually exist in that county; second, that the perpetrator of outrage was beyond the reach of the ordinary law, wisely and firmly administered. Of the first, there was not even an allegation; of the other, there was no proof. The testimony of the Judges of Assize during the last four years was uniform, and to the one effect, that Westmeath was tranquil. The late Lord Lieutenant, Earl Spencer, on whom was cast the odious, and he was sure to a nobleman of his nature, the irksome and painful task of administering the Act, had not hesitated to go, accompanied by the Countess, in the midst of that lawless population, and unguarded and unattended, enjoy the sports which the lakes and fields of Westmeath afford. If magistrates chose to harbour suspicions, and ask the House to legislate on a maybe—a perhaps—a sky might fall, look out for larks—the answer of the House should be—"We have other work to do than, Session after Session, to tear up our Magna Charta and our Constitution, and with the fragments erect for your gratification barricades against suppositious and imaginary crime." Magistrates, like ordinary persons, should come into that high Court with clean hands. But it was notorious that the exterminator was the precursor of the Ribbonman in Westmeath. Quis tulit Gracchos de seditione querentes? He had no wish to impeach the magistracy or the landed proprietary of Westmeath. Among them were good and estimable men. But he might ask them, whose is that domain stretching in a westerly direction from the county town on towards the spot where the sweetest poet in the English language was born, and the scene of the "Deserted Village" laid? And where were gone the little homesteads that once studded every mile of that road? They were levelled, wantonly levelled, to give width and scope and grandeur to that demesne. Well might poor Goldsmith's lines of prophetic inspiration rush upon the mind—

"Sweet, smiling village, loveliest of the lawn, Thy sports are fled and all thy charms withdrawn;

Amid thy bowers the tyrant's hand is seen,
And desolation saddens all thy green;
One only master grasps the wide domain,
And half a tillage stints thy smiling plain."

The one only master was one of those magnanimous magistrates who blushed not to come to the door of that House praying for coercion against their county. He spoke then under the correction of the right hon. Baronet. He presumed not to put any question, but he ventured to affirm that among the signatories to a memorial praying for the release of persons arrested under the Westmeath Act were magistrates who now memorialized the House for a renewal of that Act. If the statement were uncontradicted, he would leave the House to draw its own inference. Mr. Marlay, a gentleman of whom he would be sorry to speak a disrespectful word, had published in The Times a letter advocating coercion for the county of which he was an extensive proprietor, a magistrate, and Deputy Lieutenant. He was answered through the Irish Press by the Rev. Mr. Barton, P. P., of Castletown, the largest parish in the county. Mr. Marlay testified to his own suspicions. Father Barton testified to facts within his personal knowledge. Mr. Marlay expressed a fear that Ribbonism still existed. Father Barton said—"It could not exist without my knowledge, and I say there is none of it." Mr. Marlay was an absentee during the greater portion of the year. Father Barton dwelt continually in the midst of his people. On whose testimony ought that august Assembly of English Gentlemen to proceed to give judgment in that cause? When His Excellency the Duke of Abercorn issued his circular to the magistrates, he (Mr. Smyth) was astonished it did not occur to him as Chief Governor of Ireland—not for a class but for all orders of her people—that magistrates were not the only persons to be heard. There were farmers, traders, shopkeepers, all whose interests lay in the maintenance of peace and order, and on whose shoulders rested the burden of the county rates. Why were they excluded? Why above all were the Catholic clergy ignored in the inquiry? Who so qualified as they to express a true opinion as to the state of the country, and give wise counsel to the Executive? The motive of the exclusion was transparent. Coercion was a foregone conclusion, and but one body only, and that a body dependent on the Executive, could be found to give it countenance. He answered for Westmeath. She would be found equal to this new trial. She would maintain peace and order within her borders. But that affront she would, with becoming dignity, resent. The object avowedly of that new Coercion Act was non-political, but it would not be without a political effect, and in a direction the opposite of that intended by Government. It would intensify the faith of those who, like him, cherished the dream of a magnificent and independent Ireland yet to be. A great statesman said, on a memorable occasion in that House—"My great difficulty is Ireland." Continue that course of class legislation—for such it was; maintain the Convention Act—that blot upon the Statute Book; renew the Westmeath Act; perpetuate the Peace Preservation Act—your principle distrust, your guide suspicion—and the great difficulty of Sir Robert Peel would become, of the right hon. Gentleman, the insuperable impossibility.

MR. O'CLERY supported the Amendment of the noble Lord the Member for Westmeath. He could only say that such a course of legislation as that proposed by the Government was quite worthy of the Liberals of the House; because it was a matter of history, that more Coercion Acts of the most stringent and tyrannical character had been introduced under their rule, than by any other Government since the passing of the Act of Union. Such Acts must prove utterly useless to prevent crime in Ireland, and the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland had had the candour and boldness to state, for the first time, that the object of this sort of legislation was to prevent insurrection in that country. Therefore, instead of being termed "The Peace Preservation Act," the Act now sought to be renewed should be called "The Insurrection Prevention Act." It was sad to see that the result of the Union between England and Ireland was that, after 75 years of English rule, it was necessary to pass an Act to prevent insurrection in the latter country. That was an indication that there was something radically wrong in the English government of Ireland. What did they find at present? They found the Government of England, which professed to be the friends of freedom, and which gave shelter to the political refugees from other countries, bringing forward a most unconstitutional measure against the people of Ireland. He was free to say that the English Fleet was employed in countenancing and encouraging revolution in Sicily; but there was no parallel between the case in Sicily and that of the Irish people. The Irish people were not naturally revolutionists; and when other countries were revolutionized, the Irish people resisted the revolutionary movement; they had no sympathy with such movements, and he sincerely hoped they never would. There had been times when Englishmen had trampled upon law and upon the Throne, and then they termed the Irish, who had stood fast by their faith and by their Sovereign, rebels. The people of Ireland were frequently told that they enjoyed the benefits of the British Constitution; yet in the face of such a boast, and in a time of profound peace, such a measure of coercion as that now before the House was brought in by the Government. It was said there were at present 40,000 armed men, including the Constabulary in Ireland; and could anyone be surprised that foreigners made remarks upon such a state of things? Well, if 40,000 armed men were required at a time of profound peace in Ireland, what number would be required there should this country be engaged in a war? When the other night he listened to the burning words of the hon. and gallant Member for Renfrewshire (Colonel Mure) speaking of the attack on the Redan, he heard him describe the British soldiers who were led on to the attack as lying down five deep in the trenches with fear, and he was proud when he heard it was said that those men were not Irish soldiers. It was said that the recruiting for the British service was not going on well; and surely such legislation as that now proposed was not of a kind to induce the Irish to join the Army. Emigration was going on largely from Ireland to America, where the Irish had hosts of friends; and it would be wise in the Government of this country to so legislate for Ireland as to induce Irishmen to remain at home, and not leave the country for America in a discontented mind. The right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister said on a former occasion that he would rather govern Ireland on the principles of Charles I. than on those of Oliver Cromwell; and he wished the right hon. Gentleman would act upon those principles, and not be diverted from them by the reports of self-interested Irish magistrates. The people of Ireland came before the House as men, and asked to be treated as men, not as slaves. Parliament would find it to its interest to adopt that policy with respect to the Irish people, who, if properly treated, would loyally respond to every effort which was made to maintain the power and the prestige of the British nation. He therefore most heartily gave his support to the Amendment moved by the noble Lord the Member for Westmeath.

MR. KIRK said, he had heard no sufficient reason alleged for the continuance of exceptional and coercive legislation in a country whose condition, so far as the absence of crime was concerned, contrasted favourably with that of England. For several years past, and up to the present time, the Judges of Assize had spoken in terms of marked approbation of the state of the county of Louth—which he had the honour to represent—and yet in that county the Constitution was suspended. Mr. Justice Lawson, in 1873, found the calendar a blank, and spoke of Louth as taking the first rank as a model county; the Grand Jury at the Summer Assizes of 1874 were informed that there was not a single case to send before them; and in the spring of this year Mr. Baron Fitzgerald found a like gratifying state of things existing. Why was it, then, that such a peaceable country should be coerced and proclaimed. He held a large property there, and was one of the largest ratepayers in the county, and yet he could not carry a gun over his own grounds without running the risk of being taken up by a policeman. A friend of his had tried the experiment, and was arrested for doing so. He and several other large ratepayers waited upon the magistrates and asked to be favoured with a certificate to enable them to carry arms, but their request had been imperatively refused; and yet at the same sessions certificates were granted to several small occupiers and ratepayers, but they happened to be men of a certain religion and of a particular complexion of politics. Looking to the peaceful state of the country, these Coercion Laws were an insult to her people, who had not the slightest chance of justice and fair play being done to them. His hon. Colleague had last year told the House how a monkey was taken prisoner for firing his popgun in the streets of Belfast, that being a proclaimed district, and no doubt the poor monkey had to undergo the full penalty of the law. Some months ago a poor feeble beggar was sent to gaol in county Westmeath because he was found out after sunset and had no fixed habitation. Two men were lately apprehended in Kells, when each was sentenced to a month's imprisonment because one had some tools with him for the repair of a monument, and the other because a Prayer Book was found in his pocket. He mentioned these facts to illustrate to what extent the law was strained in Ireland. He wished that the right hon. Baronet the Chief Secretary for Ireland had taken the advice of the ministers of religion in Ireland and not of the magistrates as to the necessity for continuing and carrying out such a policy of legislation—because the bulk of the magistrates had no feeling in common with the people—they had always been antagonistic to them, in the past they had oppressed them, and they still wished to keep them in thralldom. Coercive measures were never known to effect a cure. The Roman Catholic priests of Louth had a short time since held a meeting and passed a resolution to the effect that it was their opinion that Ribbonism no longer existed in the country, and that opinion had been backed with the authority of the Bishop.

MR. FAY said, that hon. Gentlemen opposite had not risen to answer the arguments used against the Bill. They knew that these arguments were unanswerable, and therefore they observed a contemptuous silence. He was the first Catholic Member that had been returned from Ulster. He spoke in the name of 800,000 Catholics, and in their name he denounced this course of procedure on the part of the Government as reprehensible. These measures of repression were wholly uncalled for, especially in his part of Ireland—Cavan. Everywhere the feelings and habits of the Irish people were trifled with. There was no such thing as a British Constitution. For non-delivery of arms none were arrested; 59 strangers were arrested, none convicted; for carrying arms several were arrested, but none convicted. Many other arrests of a most annoying and frivolous character were made, but with results equally abortive. He could understand hon. Gentlemen supporting the Bill against all argument, for they seemed to have been returned to the House for no other purpose than to defame the character of Ireland. ["Oh, oh!"] He was ready to apologize if he had exceeded the privilege of debate; but he could not help speaking what he felt at his heart. The Irish people were entitled to equal rights with those of other portions of the country, and he could see no reason in withholding them from them. When taking up that day's paper, he saw eight murders in one day recorded there; while, in all his experience, he did not know when so many murders had taken place in Ireland in a whole year. He asked that Ireland might have a fair trial for only one year; and were that conceded by the Government they might find themselves rewarded by the consequences of liberty enjoyed by a contented people, and of which Englishmen showed themselves so tenacious and so proud. He hoped his words would not be without some effect on Her Majesty's Government, and that they would yet pause before they finally committed themselves to a policy that had not conducted to the peace or the welfare of Ireland.

MR. O'LEARY said, it had been observed by an hon. Member on the other side of the House, that Coercion Acts would become unnecessary in proportion as crime diminished; and in that case, he would ask whether it was possible for the Irish people to have Coercion Acts over them until they arrived at a condition of virgin purity? He had heard so many baseless arguments reiterated in favour of the Bill, that he regarded hon. Members with pity, and he would therefore move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion made, and Question proposed.
 "That the Debate be now adjourned."
 —(Mr. O'Leary.)

MR. DISRAELI said, if the hon. Member had intended, when he rose, to conclude with that Motion, he should have, at least, addressed the House till midnight, and there would then have been more reason for the Motion he had just made. He hoped, however, the hon. Gentleman would re-consider his Motion, as he must feel that he was scarcely justified in making it. There was every disposition on that side of the House that hon. Gentlemen opposite, especially those connected with Ireland, should have ample opportunity of expressing their opinions. Indeed, he had, as was his constant practice, throughout the evening been quite willing so to arrange the debate with hon. Gentlemen opposite as to meet their convenience in every way. If it was their wish that the debate should be adjourned at the proper time, when the subject had been sufficiently discussed that evening, he should be ready to meet their wishes. But if the hon. Member would withdraw his Motion, he would suggest to him that they might possibly conclude the debate that night at an hour rather later than usual—say, 2 o'clock. They would thus have the advantage of hearing several hon. and right hon. Members who had not yet spoken, and particularly right hon. Gentlemen on the front Bench on the other side, who always commanded attention at late hours. But wishing to give hon. Gentlemen opposite every opportunity for expressing their opinions on the subject of the Bill, he repeated that the Government were anxious to meet their convenience in every way. If it was felt to be for their convenience that the debate should be adjourned, the Government would not oppose their wish, though they could not accede to it at that comparatively early hour—20 minutes before 12. If, on the other hand, they wished the debate to be concluded that night, say before 2 o'clock, he should be happy to meet their views in that way, and as far as he could, secure a calm and dispassionate debate.

Mr. MUNDELLA said, he would admit it was rather an early hour to adjourn the debate; but he thought it was the fact, that hon. Members on the opposite side had been expecting to hear something from the Government Benches in reply to the damaging statements and arguments which had been made by the Irish Representatives. The Government appeared to wish to meet those statements by a conspiracy of silence, and if these tactics were continued, he should vote for the adjournment. He hoped the hon. Gentleman would withdraw the Motion, and that some Representative of the Government would assure the House that some of the statements which had been made were untrue, and that they had something to say in support of the Bill.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS - BEACH said, that though prepared to address the House at the proper time, he was of opinion that the speeches against the Bill had been satisfactorily answered by the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield (Mr. Roebuck) and the right hon. Member for Chester (Mr. Dodson). He was anxious to hear any further arguments which might be adduced by hon. Members below the Gangway on the other side, and when an opportunity was afforded him, he should be prepared to reply on behalf of the Government.

Mr. SULLIVAN said, he had yet to learn that the right hon. Gentleman could shift responsibility from his shoulders to that of hon. Gentlemen on the Opposition Benches in that way. Hon. Members on his side of the House were entitled to hear what case would be made out for the Bill by the right hon. Gentleman. They had waited with astonishment in the expectation of such a statement being offered them by the Government, and while Irish Members were ready to admit that the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government had manifested the most courteous spirit towards them, they did not admit that the debate had been conducted in a seemly manner towards the House by Her Majesty's Government. What he understood the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to mean was, that he would rise at the proper time and say that he considered that the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield and the right hon. Member for Chester had done his duty. He protested against the Government flinging a Bill of that atrocious and desperate character upon the Table of the House—a measure which was intended to destroy the liberties of his countrymen—and then sitting silent while Irish Members one by one rose to protest against it, without one word of justification or explanation. It was true the Bill might be carried by a majority—a large Government majority; but to sit silent while these remonstrances against destroying the liberties of Ireland were uttered, was like that of a benign cat watching the play of a mouse it intended to devour. The Irish Members were, however, determined that their country should not be subjected to a law which the Government would not dare to propose for England, Scotland, or Wales. They would not have their country dealt with in that way, and he asked his hon. Friend the Member for Drogheda to withdraw his Motion for the adjournment of the debate, in order that the right hon. Gentleman who was the father of the Bill might make out a case for his offspring.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS - BEACH said, he could assure the House and the hon. Member for Louth (Mr. Sullivan) that his only desire in remaining silent till now was to further the progress of the debate. It was his duty, he knew, to defend the provisions of the measure under notice, after it had received full discussion; and having carefully listened to the speeches which had been made, he must say that, excepting those of the hon. Members for Longford (Mr. O'Reilly) and Roscommon (The O'Connor Don), he had seldom heard a debate in that House which had travelled so very widely from the question before it. The noble Lord the Member for Westmeath (Lord Robert Montagu), who opened the debate, and other hon. Members who had spoken below the Gangway, had uttered lengthy tirades against coercion; but he had heard few references either to the existing laws in Ireland or to the provisions of the Bill before the House. The hon. Member for Louth, with that fervid eloquence for which he was distinguished, spoke of the Bill as a measure of an atrocious and desperate character, and as one that would take away the liberties of his country; but did the hon. Gentleman appreciate the fact that the laws which were now applicable and applied to a great part of Ireland were far more stringent than the provisions of this Bill? Did he appreciate the fact that this measure was proposed as a relaxation of the existing laws? He had supposed that from the hon. Member for Louth—if from no other

hon. Member—some acknowledgment would have been given that, thanks to the present condition of the country, the Government were able to propose a relaxation in the law with regard to the Irish Press. It might have been supposed that hon. Members coming from the counties now specially proclaimed, in which strangers were subject to arrest and committal, and what was known as the Curfew Law was in force, would have acknowledged the fact that neither of those provisions were re-enacted in the Government measure. He should also have supposed there would have been some acknowledgment on the part of the licensed victuallers of Ireland of the fact that it was not proposed to re-enact the law which enabled the Lord Lieutenant summarily to close public-houses in specially proclaimed districts. The Government were only too thankful and happy to make these relaxations, which were substantial and real, and he could not refrain from expressing his surprise that the hon. Member for Louth should speak of the measure which proposed these relaxations in the manner he had. He did not propose to dwell at any length upon the speeches of the hon. Members for Roscommon and Longford, because many of the points raised by them would be better dealt with in Committee; but he hastened to acknowledge the good sense and good feeling which pervaded those speeches. He ventured to say that if speeches upon Irish questions were always marked by equal moderation, it would be far easier to conduct the affairs of Ireland than it now was. But the reference to coercion made by many other Irish Members showed that they were ignorant not only of the existing law, but also of the provisions which the Government proposed to re-enact. How far were the latter provisions of a coercive character, and how far did they justify the extraordinary epithets just applied to them? The noble Lord the Member for Westmeath laid down the principle that if legislation were right for England, the contrary legislation must be wrong for Ireland, and he summoned the "intelligent foreigner," who was usually invoked on such occasions, to give his opinion. "If" said the noble Lord, "a superior person from Japan could be present at our deliberations, he would undoubtedly say that the proposed exceptional legislation was iniquitous." But this "superior person" would probably observe with justice that circumstances altered cases, and that it did not necessarily follow that legislation adapted to Ireland was equally adapted to England and vice versa. He had explained fully in the speech with which he introduced the measure what were the provisions they did not propose to re-enact, and why they might properly cease to exist, and also what it was proposed to re-enact; and he did not think this measure could fairly be called of a coercive character. What was the special legislation now proposed for Ireland? First, there were restrictions upon the free possession of arms. Hon. Members must not forget the statement of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Longford (Mr. O'Reilly) that the free possession of arms could not be considered a natural right. No such right existed in England or Scotland, because under an Act passed not many years ago, a licence duty must be paid before anyone could keep arms. It was thought essential that in Ireland there should be a further restriction, and that persons desiring to possess arms should obtain licences from a properly appointed authority. Surely that was not a provision of an exceptionally coercive or "atrocious" character. It had been said—Why do you apply to Ireland provisions and restrictions which do not apply to England and Scotland? The answer was obvious, and in introducing the Bill, as he had said, he thought he had given sufficient reasons why the free possession of arms would not be at the present moment advisable in Ireland. It must not be forgotten that this restriction had existed since 1847; that although the Government hoped and believed that the Fenian organization was no longer in a position to do mischief, no little disaffection still existed in many parts of Ireland; that many persons returning from America desired to carry and use revolvers; and, finally, that in party processions the carrying of arms was sometimes attended with dangerous incidents. An unfortunate example of the last class of cases occurred a few days ago in a county not proclaimed, because a party of Home Rule excursionists came out of another county into an otherwise peaceable county and brought arms. These reasons, he hoped, would induce the House to decide that some restriction upon the possession of arms was necessary in Ireland beyond the law which was necessary in England and Scotland. On that point he could appeal to an authority to which he did not always attach great importance, though he was sure it would be accepted by hon. Members opposite. A speech was made in that House in 1856 to the following effect—that—

"Their whole experience of Ireland demonstrated that they could not safely govern that country without some power on the part of the Government to put a check upon the possession of arms by the people. This necessity arose from the existence of secret societies. In 1846 the Government tried the experiment of leaving the Lord Lieutenant without such a power, and what was the result? The result was that public auctions of arms took place, and the state of Ireland the next year was marked with outrages of the most serious character."—[3 Hansard, cxlii. 1575-6.]

He quoted that passage from a speech of the hon. and learned Member for Limerick (Mr. Butt). He felt, however, that what he had said on that subject of arms was not applicable to the whole of Ireland, nor was the law at present applied to the whole of that country. He could assure the House that it was the intention of the Irish Government safely and gradually to relax the provisions of the law over a greater portion of Ireland than at present. He believed by degrees it would be perfectly possible that in the quieter parts of Ireland the possession of arms might be as free and unrestricted as in any portion of the United Kingdom. But he believed that that could not be done, except gradually; and by the policy which the Government up to that moment had pursued, they had given an earnest of their intention to proceed further in the same direction. For what had they done? In the proclaimed parts of Ireland it was the practice of the late Government to issue search warrants to remain in force for a period of three months. They proposed, under this Bill, to reduce those three months to the original period of 21 days. And more than that, when, last summer, the three months for which the search warrants had been issued by the late Government expired, and it became his duty to consider whether they should be again issued, he thought it unnecessary; that the great thing to be guarded against was the importation of arms, which might get into the hands of dangerous persons; and therefore he came to the conclusion that the search warrants should continue in force in those ports only where importation might be most expected. But with regard to other parts of Ireland, if it appeared necessary that arms should be searched for, that in every case special application should be made to him, and his authority obtained before the search warrants should be issued. He merely mentioned that as a proof that Government was determined safely and gradually to relax those restrictive provisions; and he would point to the Bill before the House on that particular subject to show that, not only in administration, but in legislation, they desired to pursue the same course. The noble Lord the Member for Westmeath referred to the statement which he (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) made with respect to the small amount of ordinary offences, and the diminution, satisfactory as far as it went, of agrarian crime in Ireland. He was thankful to see that small amount of ordinary crime and that diminution of agrarian offences in that country; but in considering the matter we must take into account something more than a mere catalogue of crime, and must look at the special circumstances of crime in Ireland. We must remember not only what crimes were perpetrated, but also whether the perpetrators were brought to justice and convicted. Now, he had before him a statement relating to certain agrarian murders which had been committed in Ireland in 1874. He would ask the House to consider, when he laid before it the circumstances of those cases, whether they were of opinion that the ordinary English law could deal with them. The noble Lord the Member for Westmeath had told the House that if crime existed in Ireland it was sure to be detected, and the perpetrators to be convicted. He wished he could say that was his experience with regard to agrarian crime. He found in the Papers to which he referred a statement of five cases of murder and one attempt to murder. In one case the persons arrested for the crime had not yet been tried, and in another the jury had disagreed; but in not a single one of the other cases had any one been brought to justice, much less had there been a conviction for the offence. But why had they not been brought to justice? Because evidence could not be obtained against the perpetrators of the crime. The first was the murder of John Stapleton in the county of Tipperary. He had no doubt that the perpetrators of this crime were well known by the neighbours; but the universal desire seemed to be to protect them, and not a single witness could be found to come forward and prove the case. The next was the murder of Johanna Hayes, likewise in the county of Tipperary, and which was the subject of some very strong remarks by Baron Dowse. In this case the sister-in-law of the murdered woman, who resided with her, when about to be sworn, began to cry, and refused to give evidence, saying that she did not want to be brought into it, and that she should be called an informer; and the account finished with this—"There is no likelihood of the murderer ever being brought to justice." Again, on the 13th September, a man named Stephen Scanlan was shot at his own door also in the county of Tipperary. Two men had just been tried for this crime, but sufficient evidence could not be procured, and the jury disagreed. There was another case—that of Stephen Church in Londonderry County; he was murdered on the 26th December, between 5 and 6 o'clock in the evening, while sitting in the house of a friend (Matthew Brown) by a shot fired from the outside of the window; and what was the fact? This told the story of Irish agrarian crime better than anything else. There were five young men sitting with him at the time, but not one of them attempted to go outside and look after the murderer. They said they were afraid. And only the other day, in King's County, a man who had returned from America to claim some property which had got into the possession of another person, instituted at the last Spring Assizes a suit of ejectment against that person. He won his suit, and in a few days the ejectment would have been carried out. The other day, while this man was attending a wake, he was shot dead at 2 o'clock in the morning, also through the window of the house; and although 20 young men were sitting there, only one of them, who was a dismissed sub-constable, dared to go out to try to find the murderer. In spite of all that was said by hon. Members opposite, who talked of the liberties of their country, he maintained these were facts which could not be dealt with by the ordinary law. The provisions of this Bill, which they proposed as calculated to deal with them, were not only restrictions on the possession of arms, but also provisions to which objection had been taken by the hon. Members for Roscommon and Longford. They proposed to re-enact those clauses of the existing law which enabled magistrates in Ireland, like coroners in England and procurators-fiscal in Scotland, to take evidence with regard to crime where no person was charged with the offence. They also proposed to re-enact the clauses which enabled search to be made for handwriting, upon sworn information, with regard to threatening letters, which were too often the precursors of crimes of murder; and, in addition, the provisions of the Crime and Outrage Act of 1847, by which a special police tax could be imposed upon districts where those crimes occurred, and of the Act of 1870, by which the Grand Jury of the county was enabled, subject to the fiat of the Judge of Assize, to give compensation to those who were injured by these crimes. It was all very well to say that these provisions with regard to compensation and the police-tax might be used unfairly and improperly. But he would tell the House what the Grand Juries throughout the whole of Ireland in 1874 had done. So far as the Returns obtained up to that time enabled him to judge, it appeared that they had presented the sum of £870 as compensation to those injured by crimes committed; and during the same year there was no more than £184 of special police-tax spread over three cases under the clause which they proposed to re-enact. He did not think any one could say that, so far as the last year was concerned, any unfair advantage had been taken of either of those provisions. But they were sensible that to a certain extent with regard to compensation by Grand Juries, the power was liable to be improperly used, and, therefore, they proposed in the measure now before the House certain provisions which would place it on a better basis. As regarded the principle of the special taxation, he felt that it was sound and right, for it was a tax on cowardice and indolence; and although it might not induce witnesses to come forward against the person who had committed a particular crime, yet it was certain to deter persons who had paid the tax from aiding and abetting any such crime in the future. He looked upon it as a useful deterrent in regard to crime of this nature. The continuance of the Westmeath Act was the only portion of the Bill which could be considered open to the objections raised on constitutional grounds. In introducing the Bill, he endeavoured to show that in 1871 no reasonable man doubted the existence of a terrible conspiracy, which practically over-rode the ordinary law, which interfered with every relation of life, and which tyrannized over peaceable and respectable people, in a very different way from the operation of this Act. In 1871 the House appointed a Committee, which unanimously reported the existence and the power of that conspiracy. Its history was a fact; and the question arose—What is probable in the present and in the future? The Government had these facts before them, and had consulted the magistrates of the county of Westmeath as to the present condition of their county. ["Hear, hear!"] The hon. Member for Louth cheered that statement. He was one of those who regarded the magistrates of Ireland as aliens in race and religion, and attached no importance to any opinion they expressed. For his own part, he (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) believed that the magistrates were in race at one with the people of that country—["Oh, oh!"]—and if anything would make him despair of the future of Ireland it was the importance which was attached by hon. Members opposite to the religion of a magistrate. Did they not believe that it was possible for a Protestant to do justice to a Catholic, and a Catholic to a Protestant? We had long since got beyond that point in England, and he looked forward with hope and confidence to the day when they would do so in Ireland. Why did the noble Lord the Member for Westmeath object to the magistrates of Westmeath as alien in race to the people of that country? He had never heard that the noble Lord was an Irishman; but he had heard that the noble Lord voted for the second reading of the Peace Preservation Bill in 1870. Yet, in spite of that, and the fact that the noble Lord was an Englishman, the electors of Westmeath elected him as their Representative. It was to be hoped that no more would be heard of those charges against the magistrates as aliens in race and religion. He attached as great importance to the statements they made to Government and in public as to the statements made by English magistrates; and the Irish magistrates, irrespective of race and religion, had expressed the opinion that the Westmeath Act should be continued. In addition, the Government had the opinions of two Judges of Assize at the Spring and Summer Assizes at Mullingar. With these statements before them, the Government would be wanting in their duty to the country if they declined to propose to the House the re-enactment of these provisions. More than this, the Ribbon Conspiracy—the existence of which, to his astonishment, had been denied by the hon. Member for Youghal (Sir Joseph M'Kenna)—had a history of nearly 100 years, and could it be supposed that it was to be extinguished by an Act which had only been in operation four years? The noble Lord the Member for Westmeath had quoted certain parts of his (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach's) speech and drawn incorrect deductions therefrom. He had never said that that conspiracy was extinct; but only that it was dormant, in consequence of the existence of this law. Those who had formerly been the leaders and perpetrators of these crimes were now kept in fear by that Act, and if Parliament repealed it, for aught they knew these crimes would commence again. He would again repeat that while it repressed crime, it did no harm to the loyal and peaceful inhabitants of Westmeath. It had been administered in a fair and cautious manner under the calm and deliberate advice of the late Law Advisers of the Crown; and if it were necessary to put its provisions in force, the present Government also would take the opinion of its Law Officers. As the present Attorney General for Ireland had been referred to, he would assert that no more conscientious and painstaking person had ever filled that office. The law, moreover, would be administered not on mere surmise, but upon satisfactory evidence that it ought to be put into operation. It had been administered with moderation, as was proved by the fact that 19 persons only had been included under the Act; and yet with sufficient severity to bring peace and order into a district that before the Act was passed was under the rule of Ribbon societies, and was, so to speak, frightened out of its senses by agrarian outrage. The House would not feel inclined readily to throw aside an instrument that had done such good work, but would, he hoped, entrust it to the Government for a further limited period, with the assurance that it would be dispensed with at the earliest moment consistent with the maintenance of law and order in that part of Ireland. He now came to the Unlawful Oaths Act. The noble Lord the Member for Westmeath had amused the House by imagining what might happen if the provisions of the Bill were put in force against the Lord Lieutenant or the Chief Secretary for Ireland. He begged to remind the noble Lord that the provisions in the existing Act had no application to any society working under the authority of the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, and as the present Lord Lieutenant was the Grand Master of Freemasons of Ireland, it might fairly be argued that he and the Freemasons were in no danger. With regard to himself, at any rate, the noble Lord might feel quite at ease; for it so happened that very much against his desire he had been unable to attend a meeting of any Freemasons Lodge in Ireland. The object of this legislation was to secure that if any person alleging himself to be a Freemason or a Christian Brother wished to escape the operation of the Act he should be properly registered, in order that some public notice should be given, so that it might be seen if he were what he pretended to be. If it were necessary to amend the Bill in Committee so as to ensure that the same publicity might be given without unnecessary trouble to the members of those societies, he should be ready to agree to such a proposal. He believed he had now touched upon the principal points raised in the debate, and he would, in conclusion, ask the House to remember that the Government were only asking for the continuance of existing laws, and not for the enacting of fresh ones. Having taken into its consideration the improved state of Ireland, the Government did not propose to re-enact these laws without great modifications. He would now appeal to hon. Members below the Gangway whether they could oppose such a policy. Let them turn their thoughts from vague denunciations of coercion laws to the actual provisions of this Bill and the intentions of the Government. He gave them full credit for an earnest belief in the statements they had made, and for good faith in the opinions they had expressed. On the other hand, they would, he hoped, give credit in turn to the Government for the same belief in the necessity of their proposals. Her Majesty's Government had endeavoured to obtain sure and reliable information on the point from those best qualified to give it, and, having afterwards sifted the information with great care, they proposed that measure to the House, believing it to be necessary for the peace and good government of Ireland. Hon. Members opposite said that coercive laws were no longer necessary in Ireland. Her Majesty's Government, on the other hand, maintained that a modified code such as was proposed in the Bill before the House was necessary for Ireland. The question then arose as to which opinion was the correct one. If hon. Members opposite were right in thinking that Ireland would be as peaceable and flourishing as at present if these laws were for ever removed from the Statute Book, and yet the House adopted the view of the Government and passed the present Bill; the position would be that the Coercion Laws would continue temporarily in a far less stringent form than at present, with the least possible inconvenience to peaceable and well-disposed persons. If, on the other hand, the House, declining to adopt the proposal of the Government, were to repeal all these Coercion Acts, the result would be that during next winter, as sure as he was addressing the House, there would be grave danger of a repetition of the acts which had heretofore disgraced Ireland. They might have renewed bloodshed, a fresh feeling of insecurity of life and property, which would drive away capital from the country, banish resident proprietors from Ireland, and drag the country back 10 years in the path of progress in which she had now gone so far. If hon. Members opposite would but put this argument fairly to themselves, they would see that in accepting the proposal of the Government they would be accepting the least of two evils. If the proposal was not accepted and the evils to which he had referred chanced to rise, the infallible consequence would be a re-enactment of measures far more coercive than any now proposed. In conclusion, he would say that the Government had proposed the measure in the desire to preserve peace in Ireland, to secure the position which that country had attained in material progress and advancement, and to provide that under the protection of the law, Irishmen should advance still further towards that goal of prosperity, in relation to which he feared they were still somewhat behind the rest of the United Kingdom. It was in this spirit that he recommended that Bill to the House, intending, as he had stated, to administer it with the care and caution which had characterized the Irish Government for some years past; and indulging in the confident hope that, by gradually and safely relaxing its provisions, the Government might be able to secure that, at a date earlier than that fixed in the Bill for the expiry of the various statutes enumerated in its clauses, there might be no longer any coercive laws in Ireland.

MR. CALLAN said, he should move the adjournment of the debate, and would suggest that the House should meet again at 2 o'clock and proceed with the Bill in a Morning Sitting.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That the Debate be now adjourned."
—(Mr. Callan.)

MR. SULLIVAN said, he must object to the proposal for a Morning Sitting, on the ground that he had on the Paper for to-morrow a Motion on the state of England in reference to a question somewhat similar to that which had been raised by the present Bill in relation to Ireland. In addition to that, there was another Motion, also concerning England, to be submitted by the hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire (Mr. Chaplin). From that, it could be seen that he made the objection in favour of England.

MR. DISRAELI: Speaking also in the interests of England, I think that is a measure which will keep, and it seems to me that any time before Whitsuntide would equally serve the purpose of my hon. Friend. I certainly should not support the proposal for a Morning Sitting on Tuesday, as both sides of the House are opposed to it. In case the hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire will not press his Motion, will the hon. Member for Louth withdraw his Motion and allow the debate to proceed to-morrow?

MR. SULLIVAN said, he had no objection to consult the convenience of the House, but he hoped that in return he should get a Government day for his Motion.

MR. BUTT thought that they should first adjourn the debate, and then fix a day for resuming it. He would remind the right hon. Gentleman that he had pushed forward the Coercion Bill at the expense of an important Irish measure which stood first on the Paper for Wednesday.

MR. DISRAELI wished to observe that there would have been no chance of the hon. and learned Member for Limerick bringing in his Bill to-morrow evening, even if this measure were not before the House. The hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire had a Motion which would occupy the whole night, and then came another to be proposed by the hon. Member for Louth, so that it was impossible for the hon. and learned Member for Limerick to proceed. With regard to the intimation that Coercion Bills were pressed forward in preference to other Business, he could only say that he knew of no foundation for the statement. It was agreed that this measure of the Government should proceed to-morrow, and we divide on it, and if the hon. and learned Member really wished to bring on his Bill, he (Mr. Disraeli) would depart from his original plan; but he thought that it would be for the convenience of the House that they should commence the holidays on Tuesday.

Motion agreed to.

Debate adjourned till To-morrow.

PARLIAMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. SULLIVAN said, that under the circumstances, he would postpone his Motion as to the state of England.

Mr. Disraeli

MR. CHAPLIN said, he was also willing to hold back his Motion for the convenience of the House, but he wished for some assurance from the Government that he should have an opportunity to proceed with it at some future time.

MR. DISRAELI: I must express on the part of the Government their great obligation to the hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire for his courteous conduct. I look on his Motion as one of national importance, and I shall feel it my duty, if possible—though I cannot bind myself—in the course of the Session to take care to have that question discussed. As to the hon. Member for Louth (Mr. Sullivan), I can only say at present that those who oblige are often obliged, and I should be very sorry to impede the interesting subject that he has announced. I wish further to say that it is our intention, with the sanction of the House, to come to a division on our measure to-morrow, and it will, therefore, be necessary to move that the debate should take precedence of the Orders of the Day. I move that.

Motion agreed to.

PASSENGERS ACT, 1855—INFLAMMABLE CARGOES.—QUESTION.

MR. D. JENKINS asked the President of the Board of Trade, If any steps have been taken to prohibit the shipment of oils, spirits, and other cargo of an inflammable nature in sailing vessels carrying large numbers of passengers under the Emigration Acts?

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY: Sir, the 29th section of the Passengers Act, 1855, gives power to the Board of Trade both to stop passenger ships if loaded with such shipments dangerous to the health or lives of the passengers or safety of the ship, or if the cargo is not stowed and secured to the satisfaction of the officers of the Board of Trade. It has since the case of the Cospatrick been under the consideration of the Board of Trade whether any general regulations on the subject can be made in the interests of safety compatible with the necessities of the trade.

STREET ACCIDENTS (METROPOLIS).

QUESTION.

SIR PATRICK O'BRIEN asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If his attention has been called to the employment, in the crowded streets of London, of covered vans, the construction of which does not admit of the driver seeing on either side of him; if he is aware that a large proportion of street accidents arise from the employment of such vehicles; and if he is prepared to prohibit the use of such vehicles in the public streets?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, there was no doubt that a great proportion of the accidents arose from the use of large vans, though to what extent covered vans contributed to that result he was unable to say. He had, however, ordered a careful observation and investigation to be made on the subject, with the view, if possible, of introducing regulations which tend to the prevention of accidents and the protection of life.

NEWFOUNDLAND FISHERIES.

QUESTION.

MR. A. M'ARTHUR asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether he will lay upon the Table any recent Correspondence relative to the French claims to exclusive rights of fishing on the coast of Newfoundland; and, whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to open negotiations with the French Government for the permanent settlement of those claims?

MR. J. LOWTHER: Sir, Her Majesty's Government is now engaged in negotiations with the French Government upon this subject, so that the production of Papers would, at the present moment, be attended with inconvenience.

JUDGES AND JURIES.—QUESTION.

MR. WHALLEY said, he had received a letter from his hon. Friend the Member for Stoke stating that he was compelled to be unavoidably absent from the House, and he therefore begged, on behalf of the hon. Member, to ask the Question No. 5 on the Paper. [Cries of "Read, read!"] Well, the Question was very lengthy, and he did not think it was necessary to read it. ["Read, read," and "No!"]

MR. SPEAKER: Does the hon. Member ask the Question?

MR. WHALLEY said, he thought the better course for him, under the circumstances, was to withdraw the Question.

SPAIN—REPORTED RECALL OF MR. LAYARD.—QUESTION.

MR. MOORE asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether it is true that Her Majesty's

Ambassador at Madrid is about to be recalled; whether Colonel Connolly, Military Attaché at Paris, is about to be despatched to the Coast of Spain to watch the operations of the Carlist War; and whether he could inform the House what is the object of the alleged mission of Colonel Connolly?

MR. BOURKE: Sir, in answer to the hon. Gentleman, I have to state that the rumours alluded to in his Question are unfounded. It is not the intention of Her Majesty's Government to recall the Minister from Madrid, whose duties have been performed to the entire satisfaction of Her Majesty's Government; and it is not the intention of Her Majesty's Government to despatch Colonel Connolly to the Court of Spain. Therefore, under these circumstances, the further explanation asked for is not required.

TURKEY—MOLDAU-WALLACHIA AND SERVIA.—QUESTION.

MR. ASHLEY asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether any proposal has been made for a Conference, like that of 1871, on the question now pending between Turkey and the three Powers of Austria, Germany, and Russia as to the right of the Principalities of Moldau-Wallachia and Servia to negotiate Treaties independently of the Ottoman Porte; and, if any such proposal is on foot, whether the Papers on the subject in dispute, promised by the Secretary of State, will be laid before Parliament at the earliest convenient date?

MR. BOURKE, in reply, said, that the idea of a Conference was at one time mooted by the Porte, but it led to no practical results. There was no such question at present before the Courts of Europe; and it was not desirable therefore for the present to lay any Papers on the subject on the Table.

EDUCATION CODE (SCOTLAND)—THE GAELIC LANGUAGE.

QUESTION.

MR. MACKINTOSH asked the Vice President of the Council, Whether, in deference to the general feeling which prevails throughout the Gaelic speaking districts of Scotland, he will amend the Scottish Education Code, now upon the Table, by providing that where School Boards may so resolve, the Gaelic language be recognized, treated, and dealt with as a special subject of instruction?

VISCOUNT SANDON: Sir, provision now exists under a former Code for testing the intelligence of children in districts of Scotland where Gaelic is spoken by requiring them to explain in Standards II. and III. the meaning of the passage read. A somewhat similar provision has been introduced into the Code respecting Welsh in Wales. Beyond this, the Government is not prepared to deal with Gaelic as a special subject of instruction, and, therefore, to give a special grant for it.

EDUCATION (SCOTLAND)—PUPIL TEACHERS.—QUESTION.

MR. LYON PLAYFAIR asked the Vice President of the Council, Whether he intends to add to the Scotch Code the same provisions for allowances to pupil teachers as those in the English Code?

VISCOUNT SANDON: Sir, it is our intention to give Scotland the benefit of the grants of 40s. and 60s. to pupil-teachers on passing satisfactory examinations, and it has always been the intention of the Lord President and myself that such should be the case as soon as certain other changes were made in the Scotch Code; but I must, at the same time, mention that, on extending this grant to Scotland, we shall think it necessary, in the interests of education, to introduce a provision in the Code similar to that we have placed this year in that for England, whereby a part of the grant for class examinations is made to depend on a certain percentage of children being presented in the upper standards. The time, however, of the introduction of this provision must, as my right hon. Friend will agree, be made to suit with the somewhat later period which we are about to assign for the commencement of the change of system in English schools.

INDIA—ROMAN CATHOLIC CHAPLAINS.

QUESTION.

MR. O'REILLY asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether the new regulations relative to the position and pay of Roman Catholic chaplains to troops in India, which were stated last year to be under consideration, have been decided on?

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: Sir, a despatch was received from the Government of India, dated August 18, 1874, in which we were informed that the Government of India were inquiring into the subject, and were prepared to modify the present system if upon inquiry they found it necessary to do so. Since then we have received no further communication, and I am afraid that I, therefore, can give no definite information as to whether or not the present regulations have been altered.

EDUCATION DEPARTMENT—THE NEW CODE (1875).—QUESTIONS.

SIR JOHN KENNAWAY asked the Vice President of the Council, Whether after consideration of the representations made to him in the Debate upon the New Education Code (1875), he is prepared to make any alterations; and, if so, whether he will state them to the House?

VISCOUNT SANDON: Sir, owing to the adjournment of the other branch of the Legislature, I am unable to lay upon the Table the alterations made by the Lord President and myself in the Education Code. I therefore think it may be for the convenience of hon. Members, some of whom have had much correspondence on this subject, if I state very shortly and succinctly the changes determined on in this Code. They have been so determined, after much consultation with gentlemen acquainted with the subject in all parts of the country, and I may say, on behalf of the Lord President and myself, that we are both surprised and gratified to find that the objections to the New Code resolve themselves into so small a number. Under these circumstances; the changes made in our proposed Code are not large and do not affect its principle. We have added a note under 19 A 3 by which the Inspector will be instructed not to interfere with any method of organization adopted in a Training College under inspection, if it is satisfactorily carried out in the school, and it is also explained in a note that under "Discipline" the managers and teachers will be expected to satisfy Her Majesty's Inspector that all reasonable care is taken in its ordinary management to provide for the general character and moral government of the school. In

19 B 3 a change is introduced to meet the case of the temporary severe pressure upon both voluntary and board schools both in town and country, by the large number of untrained children, who, many at a late age, are being brought into them by the operation of compulsory bye-laws and the various Labour Acts. These children being generally entirely untaught require more attention and labour than others; and to provide for this state of things, which I think we may consider temporary, it is arranged that till March 31, 1878, a grant will continue to be paid for a scholar who passes in only one subject for that one pass. This change becomes additionally necessary, as we have thought it desirable in the interest of the children to insist on the presentation for examination, as far as possible, of all who have made the requisite attendances. As to the Clause 19 C 6, respecting which many representations have been made to us, whereby a deduction of 2s. per head was proposed to be made from the grant of 4s. per head on the new class examination, unless 40 per cent of the scholars were presented under Standard IV. or upwards, we have felt bound to consider the expressions of opinion coming from hon. Members of experience on both sides of the House, from experienced Inspectors, as well as from voluntary schools and school boards, both rural and urban, that we had aimed too high in this particular. Considering also that this general opinion was confirmed and pressed upon me by my right hon. Friend (Mr. W. E. Forster), we have felt it right to lower somewhat our requirements, though we cannot consent to abandon the provision altogether, whereby a condition is attached to this grant which we believe will be a most valuable agent in promoting the better education of the children, and giving an incitement to the teacher to advance them properly from an early age. We propose, therefore, that the operation of this and of most of the other important changes in the Code, represented by Nos. 17 (d), 19, 21 (a), 22, 28, 29 (b), 108, and 109 should be deferred from August 31, 1875, to March 31, 1876, so as to give the teachers and managers ample time to prepare themselves and their scholars for the change of system. For the year after March 31, 1876, 20 per cent—instead of

40 per cent—will be expected to pass under this article; for the next year, 1877, 25 per cent; and for 1878, 30 per cent. As to the Standards we have, I hope, made several improvements. We have slightly diminished the number of lines to be learnt, and have made a change much desired by all the associations of teachers, whereby history and geography may be grouped in such a way as to enable the scholars under Standards IV., V., and VI. to be taught and examined as one class. With respect to article 19 D, whereby special grants of £10 or £15 were made to schools with populations under 300 and 200 souls, to meet the unequal pressure upon these small schools, whether voluntary or board, of the requirements of our improved education as regards teachers, &c., we have found our wording failed to meet the real cases of need. We have, therefore, substituted the following clause for that in the new Code:—

“D. The sum of £10 (or £15), subject to a favourable Report from the Inspector, if the population within two miles by road of the school is less than 300 (or 200) souls, and there is no other public elementary school with sufficient accommodation for such population within three miles of the school.”

Hitherto little provision has been made for the small schools of about 15 scholars in remote villages of less than 100 souls out of reach of any other school, and for which a regular certificated teacher is impossible, and a young girl pupil teacher unsuitable. To meet this want we propose to apply section 59 (a) to these little schools, so that women, approved by the Inspector as efficient teachers, may in these special cases be employed. To meet the various requirements of different localities as to evening schools, we propose that, instead of insisting upon 40 attendances, we should insist only on 40 hours' instruction; but, as I said before, the changes as to evening schools, which will come into force next autumn, we consider only tentative. I regret that in the present condition of night schools, and considering the various difficulties connected with inspection, we have not seen our way to introduce, as my right hon. Friend (Mr. W. E. Forster) suggested, the extra subjects into these schools. I am happy to say that we have been able to arrange that under the varied provisions of the Labour Acts, children must pass in the three subjects of the Standard, the passing of which entitles them to a certificate. A slight alteration has also been made in the subjects required from pupil teachers, and a slight diminution in the language requirements under extra subjects. The opportunity has been taken of making one or two other unimportant but useful working changes. Considering, then, the large alterations which we have thought it right this year to make, and our conviction that in the interest of education the Code should be altered as little as possible for some time to come, we have thought it right to welcome criticisms upon our new Code, and, after carefully weighing them, to make such changes as seemed desirable at once this year, in accordance with former precedent. These alterations have now been finally passed by the Committee of Council, and we have every reason to believe that, while we meet the views of many of the most valuable Inspectors, of leading members of school boards, of clergy of much educational experience in purely rural as well as in town districts, and also of the most qualified and thoughtful teachers of country and town schools, we shall attain the object we have kept steadily in view, of improving and giving fresh life to our system of elementary education.

MR. W. E. FORSTER asked when the alterations would be laid on the Table?

VISCOUNT SANDON said, the only reason for not laying them on the Table now was the adjournment of the other House; but directly after the Recess he hoped to present them.

MERCANTILE MARINE—COASTING VESSELS—BOATS AND RAFTS.

QUESTION.

DR. CAMERON asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether his attention has been directed to the serious loss of life occurring in cases of the shipwreck of coasting vessels through the inadequacy of their supply of boats; whether the Board of Trade have had brought before them any form of boat by the general adoption of which this loss of life might be reduced to a minimum; and, whether they purpose taking any steps to ensure its adoption in future?

Viscount Sandon

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY: Sir, the attention of the Board of Trade has been directed to the loss of life occurring in small coasting vessels which have foundered. The Board of Trade have had submitted to them a form of raft invented by Mr. Holmes, the adoption of which by small coasting sailing vessels they trust will conduce to saving life.

MERCHANT SHIPPING ACTS—OVERLOADING.—QUESTION.

MR. PLIMSOLL asked the President of the Board of Trade, What result followed the stoppage, at 3.30 a.m. on Saturday, the 13th, of the steam ship "International," loaded with telegraph cable, and which was stopped at his (Mr. Plimsoll's) instance; and, if he will say what was the result in each of the three other cases stopped at the same time at the instance of the Marine Secretary?

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY: Sir, the hon. Member brought to the Marine Assistant Secretary of the Board of Trade at 3 A.M. on the 13th—[Cheers—]—yes, it was very much to the hon. Member's credit—a telegram he had received from a seaman, dated 4.30 the evening before, reporting that the International was overloaded. A telegram to the same effect came from the insurers to the Board of Trade the same day. The first information was acted on immediately by telegram, and the ship was stopped and lightened by one foot on the freeboard after survey by two most competent surveyors. Three telegrams were received the same night, one about the Gazelle, but she had left the port of Shields before she could be detained. The second about the Nuphar, which was detained, lightened, and properly trimmed. The third, about the Elizabeth, which was detained.

THE BOARD OF TRADE—NIGHT ATTENDANCE.—QUESTION.

MR. PLIMSOLL said, he hoped that, under these circumstances, the right hon. Gentleman would be able to qualify in some degree the Answer he gave yesterday, and would therefore ask once more, Whether he will consider the advisability of keeping some officer in attendance at the Board of Trade Offices in Whitehall during the night, to act immediately upon such telegrams as may arrive from Board of Trade Surveyors at the Ports, asking for instructions in cases in which ships are apparently dangerously overloaded and which are about to go to sea in that condition?

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY: I am afraid, Sir, I can do no more than repeat my Answer of yesterday. The office-keeper and porter remain at the Board of Trade at night, and receive any night telegrams, and, as a general rule, forward them to the officer responsible for the subject of the telegram. It would be impossible for such responsible officers to be themselves every night at the Board of Trade to issue instructions to surveyors. Nor could a mere telegram, which did not contain the particulars, be generally acted on immediately to take so serious a step as the stopping of a ship. To stop a ship on a report of over-loading is a more difficult and delicate matter than the hon. Member seems to think. Nor could the Collectors of Customs be at hand all night for the purpose. But I may tell the House that appointments are being made of a superior class of Superintendents of Surveyors at the principal ports, who may be trusted in special cases to stop a ship without first referring to the Board of Trade.

LICENSING ACTS, 1872-1874 — PETERBOROUGH MAGISTRATES.—QUESTION.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON asked the Under Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether he is aware that at Peterborough the magistrates have granted to the keeper of an inn an extension of hours for the sale of drink on Good Friday; and, if so, whether there is any provision in any Licensing Act which warrants such magisterial action?

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON, in reply, said, that he had not been able to verify the statement embodied in the hon. Baronet's Question, and could not say whether the magistrates had granted the extension referred to or not; but if it was the case, he would point out that under the Licensing Act of 1874, Good Friday and Sunday were placed on the same footing. On the other hand, a section in the Act of 1872, under which occasional licences were granted, was expressed in general terms, and under that section the magistrates had absolute discretion to grant licences for all days. If, therefore, the licence mentioned by the hon. Baronet had been granted, it seemed to be in the discretion of the magistrates to do so; but he had heard of no similar case.

COMMITMENTS FOR CONTEMPT OF COURT.—QUESTION.

MR. WHALLEY asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, with reference to penalties inflicted by Judges of the Superior Courts for contempt of court under misapprehension, Whether he will cause inquiry to be made into the fines and imprisonment inflicted by the Judges in relation to the Tichborne trial for contempt of court, in accordance with the Petitions presented to this House from Peterborough and various other places?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: Sir, the hon. and learned Member for the Denbigh Burghs (Mr. Watkin Williams) is going to move for certain Returns relating to commitments for contempt of court; and the better course for the hon. Gentleman will be to make what Motion he thinks proper on the subject when those Returns are laid on the Table.

MERCHANT SHIPPING ACTS—THE "NUPHAR."—QUESTION.

MR. MACDONALD asked the President of the Board of Trade, If his attention has been called to the "Nuphar," which sailed from North Shields, laden with coal, with only 2 feet 3 inches of clear side (instead of at least 4 feet), and having 18 feet 2 inches depth of hold; and if any and what steps were taken to prevent her sailing in that state?

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY, in reply, said, the Nuphar was one of the three cases he had already mentioned. This vessel was detained and lightened.

IRELAND—ATTEMPTED MURDER AT MITCHELSTOWN.—QUESTION.

SIR EDWARD WATKIN asked the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether he has received any information with regard to a report in the "Pall Mall Gazette," that an attempt was made yesterday to assassinate Mr. Bryan, land steward to Mr. Nathaniel Buckley, formerly a Member of this House, at Mitchelstown, near Tipperary.

Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson

SIR MICHAEL HICKS - BEACH: Sir, I have received a telegram on the subject, and I regret to learn that the gentleman in question has been fired at and wounded.

ARMY—ADJUTANTS OF RESERVE FORCES.—QUESTION.

CAPTAIN MILNE HOME asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether it is true that Adjutants who, by the new system, were appointed to the Reserve Forces for five years received a lower rate of pay than those who served under the old regulations; also whether Adjutants in Volunteer corps could claim travelling expenses, whereas Adjutants in Militia regiments must defray their own; and whether he proposes taking steps to place all Adjutants of the Auxiliary forces on the same footing as to pay and allowances?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: Sir, the new Adjutants will not receive lower pay than the old ones. The question of allowances is under consideration, and, as I have only a few moments previously received the hon. Gentleman's Question, I had rather not go into the subject at present.

PEACE PRESERVATION (IRELAND) BILL.—[BILL 77.]

SECOND READING. ADJOURNED DEBATE.

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [22nd March], "That the Peace Preservation (Ireland) Bill be now read a second time;" and which Amendment was,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "this House disapproves of the imposition or maintenance of exceptional legislation, except in those cases where urgent grounds, proving the necessity of it, have been clearly shown; and that sufficient grounds for the maintenance of any exceptional legislation have not been proved to exist at present in Ireland,"—(Lord Robert Montagu)

—instead thereof.

MR. CALLAN rose to renew his opposition to such legislation for his country as was embodied in the Bill before the House. Some years ago, when a similar measure was proposed, he had the honour of seconding an Amendment moved by the late Mr. G. H. Moore. The circumstances then were very different, for at that time Ireland was in a state at least to cause alarm; whereas at present peace and quietness prevailed in the land. He thought it right now to renew the protest he had made on that occasion. It had been stated last night by the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland that no memorials had been presented to the Government for the liberation of "Captain Duffy." But he (Mr. Callan) could affirm without fear of contradiction that a memorial, whether it had been presented to the Lord Lieutenant or the Chief Secretary or not, had been signed with that object; what was more, it had been acted on, and the notorious "Captain Duffy" had been liberated. The hon. Member for West Gloucestershire (Mr. Plunkett) had declared that the ordinary laws were insufficient for the proper government of Ireland; but he had failed to adduce any facts in support of such a statement. No such facts, he (Mr. Callan) felt persuaded, could really be brought forward. On the contrary, it could be easily proved that the country was in a condition to be altogether freed from these restrictive measures. They bore with peculiar hardship often in places where they were least deserved. It had been stated by the right hon. Gentleman that licence to carry arms was granted at the discretion of the properly-constituted authority, the resident magistrate. But in the county of Louth, which had 2,400 registered electors, there were not 50 of the county farmers who had the right or licence to carry arms over their own land. So much for the discretion of the properly-constituted authorities. The Bill before the House was in every respect most vexatious, and consequently most objectionable, and could only be justified by the fact of Ireland being in a disturbed condition. That was not so, as he knew from his own experience. He had during the last month been on Circuit in Louth, Monaghan, Armagh, and two other counties, embracing a population of 700,000, and no serious case was tried at the Assizes, save one murder case arising out of a family dispute and totally unconnected with agrarian crime. Where, then, was the need of again imposing these restrictive laws? In every one of those five counties the Judges congratulated the Grand Jury on the absence of serious crime, yet the county of Louth was under special proclamation. It was penal to carry arms, and the peaceful inhabitants were liable to have their houses broken into by special warrant in a search for arms. That was surely not the proper way to govern Ireland! He would not have pressed his objection to the Bill had the Chief Secretary given an assurance that its provisions would not be applied to counties that were peaceful and orderly; but as it was he would have to give the measure his strong opposition.

MR. LESLIE said, the Gentlemen who sat on the Opposition side of the House claimed to represent the people of Ireland in opposing the Bill. He, too, claimed to speak the voice of a portion of the people of that country upon the subject, but it was not the voice of those who sat opposite. He granted that the hon. Member for Meath (Mr. John Martin) and his Colleagues represented the majority in this matter; but in dealing with such a question it was their duty to bear in mind who it was that formed the minority. The minority were the leaders of progress in Ireland. They were the principal promoters of the industry of that country. They were the chief creators of the material wealth of that country. They were, in fact, the leaders of the van of civilization in Ireland. He had listened to the calm, impartial, and conciliatory statement of the Chief Secretary with the highest satisfaction; and he thought there would have been a general approval of this measure among Irish Members, especially after the withdrawal of the Press clauses, in which, as it appeared to him, the right hon. Gentleman approached the utmost limit of prudence rather than give a shadow of excuse for the charge of oppression. The hon. Member for Youghal (Sir Joseph M'Kenna), when discussing the other night the incidence of taxation, asked how they could wonder that disaffection existed in Ireland when they overtaxed the people; but last night they heard the same hon. Gentleman declare he did not believe that disaffection existed at all in Ireland. In considering whether these Peace Preservation Acts were necessary they must ask themselves whether disaffection really existed in Ireland. Everyone knew very well that it did. But while he thought the Bill necessary, he thought it was a misfortune that it should be necessary to define any specified time at which the Acts should expire. It was impossible to define the exact time at which crime and disaffection would cease, and until they knew that how could they tell when the operation of the Acts should cease? He did not envy the noble Lord the Member for Westmeath (Lord Robert Montagu) the position he now occupied. Having, in 1870, voted in favour of the Peace Preservation Act, he now moved this Amendment. The noble Lord had paid too high a price for the distinction of representing the county of Westmeath; it was evident to him that an encroachment had been made on his mental and moral freedom. As for himself, he would cling to the party of order. He believed that the party of order in Ireland approved of the Bill, and he would, therefore, cheerfully vote for its second reading.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER was of opinion that the noble Lord the Member for Westmeath (Lord Robert Montagu), in adopting the course he had thought fit to adopt, and by moving his Amendment, had shown that even an Englishman, when he studied the subject with a mind free from national prejudices, could see that Ireland was not fairly treated by this country. He (Mr. O'Connor Power) believed also that discussions of this kind were productive of great good, because they enabled the House of Commons to investigate the position of the different classes which made up the Irish nation. The chief misfortunes of Ireland were due to the landowners and the magistrates, who were selected from the landocracy, and they were now in a minority because the people believed they could not be trusted with the destinies of Ireland, and because they had availed themselves of the Ballot to express their preference for men who had become eminent by their own industry and ability. Speaking in the House of Commons nearly 30 years ago, in 1847, at the time of the Famine, the hon.

Mr. Leslie

Member for Sheffield (Mr. Roebuck) produced what was described as a "sensational" by referring to the Irish landlords, for whom, he said, the British Parliament had been legislating for 300 years; and during that time, he continued—

"They had been legislated for, as a body, against the people of Ireland. They had wrought always for their own personal purpose, unmindful of the wants of the people of Ireland."—[3 Hansard, lxxxix. 111.]

And yet these were the men who according to the hon. Member for Monaghan (Mr. Leslie), represented Irish interests, and who declared that if Parliament would do what they wanted, Ireland would become a land flowing with milk and honey, and the Emerald Isle the brightest gem in the Crown of the British Empire. The people of Ireland had rejected their leadership, and they were now in a minority. At the time of the Famine, so far from making any attempt to remedy the grievances of the Irish people, the landocracy assembled together at a large meeting in Dublin and projected an elaborate scheme for the wholesale extermination of the Irish people, and they resisted an excellent measure brought forward by Lord George Bentinck, and intended to develop the resources of Ireland. He resented coercive legislation as a galling insult to his country, because it conveyed to Europe and America the notion that the people of Ireland were in a savage state, and that it was necessary to destroy the Constitution in order to preserve the public peace. Were they to allow legislation on such statements as were made by the Chief Secretary—statements which no witness cared publicly to substantiate, statements which were supplied by the police, and by magistrates many of whom had been properly described as being bankrupt in character as well as in fortune? What would be thought in England if the Government proposed to legislate on statements made by magistrates without reference to the opinion of the people's elected Representatives? Such a proposal would elicit protests from a thousand platforms, and would seal the fate of any Government by whom it should be submitted. Irish Members were elected that the Irish people might participate in the British Constitution, which was forced upon them by English bayonets, and now they were refused the exercise of their rights lest Ireland should attain to too great prosperity. The whole history of Irish legislation was based on suspicion and distrust; but peace, loyalty, and contentment might be purchased by the very same means and at the very same price that contentment had been purchased in other lands where good government had promoted the interests of the people. Give Ireland a land system such as that of France, Prussia, Holland, Belgium, and Switzerland—give the Irish peasantry fixity of tenure in the soil and undisturbed enjoyment of the fruits of their labour—and there would then be no necessity to propose these periodical coercion enactments. If we were determined to continue the rule of force, we must engage in a struggle against the laws of nature, for resistance to injustice was natural and inevitable. So long as Parliament was determined to prevent Irish Representatives from legislating for Ireland in their own country, upon Parliament would rest the responsibility of the disaffection of the Irish people. If Parliament would give tenant-right to the Irish peasantry and rescue them from the power of rack-rent, landlords and spendthrift absentees, it would relieve itself from the burden of the Irish difficulty as far as agrarian crime was concerned. He protested against these periodical enactments, and should therefore vote for the Amendment of the noble Lord.

SIR EARDLEY WILMOT said, he was desirous to set himself right in the opinion of the House in reference to a circumstance which occurred in the last Session. At the instance of the noble Lord the Member for King's Lynn (Lord C. J. Hamilton) the House was counted out at the end of last Session when he was about to bring forward a Motion in the interests of the naval and military services of the country. He was surprised that he should have been so dealt with by a Member of his own Party, and he was still more astonished when the noble Lord made public the statement, as a reason for counting out, that he (Sir Eardley Wilmot) was a Home Ruler, and therefore sitting behind the Government under false colours. He denied the charge, which had been made on the authority of Dod's Parliamentary Companion. When his hon. Friend the learned Member for Leeds called his attention to the fact that he was described as a Home Ruler in that usually correct publication, he did not think it worth while publicly to contradict it; but he wrote to the Editor, who told him it was a printer's error, and assured him that it should be rectified in the next edition of the Parliamentary Companion. This had since been done; but he desired to take this opportunity of setting himself right with the House and the country. He should not be ashamed of being a Home Ruler if he held the opinions of hon. Gentlemen opposite. He respected those hon. Members, believing that they were actuated by the same patriotism and feeling of duty to their country as himself; but he objected to be accused by Members on his own side of acting in an unworthy manner. If he were a Home Ruler, he should walk over to the other side of the House. No one, however, could take a deeper interest in Ireland than he did; and he was glad it had been found possible to relax some of the restrictions which had been imposed upon that country. Still, being convinced that it was necessary to continue for a time this coercive legislation, he should support the Bill before the House. Who was to blame for this coercion? They ought to have developed the great natural advantages and resources of Ireland; but instead of doing so the arterial wealth of that country had been drained to the extent of some £4,000,000 a-year and spent in England and elsewhere. England had governed Ireland by means of the venom of party. Party feelings and animosities prevailed in the Executive of that country, and it was not surprising that the example set by those at the top had been followed by those at the base. Much disadvantage had arisen from frequent changes of the Irish Government in recent years. From the years 1830 to 1875 there had been no less than 17 Lords Lieutenant of Ireland; whereas from 1400 to 1595 there were only 25, and from 1500 to 1630 only 8 Governors of Ireland. The Earl of Sussex, in Queen Elizabeth's time, held the government of Ireland for 30 years. By the modern policy of the Governments of this country towards Ireland the prophetic utterances of the great statesman, Grattan, that separate Government, with a separate Parliament was not identification but extinction, conquest, and dishonour had been realized. He called upon his right hon. Friend at the head of the Government not to lose the present opportunity of inaugurating a policy of conciliation. No great Constitutional question now agitated the country, and he appealed to the right hon. Gentleman to utilize his powerful majority in order to bring forward beneficent and conciliatory measures for Ireland. Ireland was a great, generous, and noble nation. The people had faults, but they were faults akin to great virtues, and by such a policy they might be quickened and fostered into heroic acts. He hoped his right hon. Friend the Prime Minister would take care that he approached the Irish people with measures of conciliation in one hand while obliged to carry coercion in the other, for in that case he would go down to posterity as one of the greatest statesmen of this country, and one of the greatest benefactors of Ireland. He trusted that they might still see that country happy, prosperous, and contented, with such a true union of the hearts of the people of both countries as might justify the language—

Invictæ gentes æterna in fœdera mittant.”

MR. REDMOND said, it appeared to him that the sentiment of the right hon. Gentleman in bringing forward this Bill was somewhat like that of the man who knocked another down, and by way of consolation told him that although the blow he had hit him was a strong one, he might have hit him a much harder blow. He certainly was ready to admit that the measure now proposed was in many respects not quite so severe as the coercion code which it was intended to replace; but then that code had never been intended to be a permanent code. On the contrary, it was a temporary law to which Parliament had assented on the condition that it should be in force for only two years, so that the people of Ireland had a right to look forward to its total remission and not to its re-enactment. Those two years had passed away, and the conduct of the country had been such as to fully entitle it to the fulfilment of the promise which had been made to it by the last Administration. His dread was that the House might become so habituated to exceptional legislation of this kind that it might, after some time, come to pass coercion meaasures as a matter of course. The danger which they had most to fear was that Parliament might be induced to make a too easy surrender of those rights and privileges which it was their duty as a great Representative Body to maintain and uphold. Yet when they concurred in a measure such as that before the House they practically said to the people of Ireland—“You must be faithful and obedient subjects of the Crown, you must loyally discharge all your duties to the State, and you must patiently endure all the fixed burdens it imposes upon you; but the privileges of the Constitution you must not expect to enjoy.” Was it reasonable, he would ask, to expect a friendly reply to language such as that? He was sure there was not an Englishman present who would not willingly consent to the curtailment of even some of the boasted liberties of this country if it could only be shown to him that there was a public necessity for it. That was just the case of the Irish Members; they did not hesitate to surrender their constitutional principles when it was shown that there was a necessity why they should do so; but that necessity no longer existed, and Her Majesty’s Government had not even a pretence of showing that it did exist. They had not shown the existence of any lawlessness nor any impending danger; and, as a matter of fact, the only abnormal organization existing in the country at the present moment was the Home Rule movement, the very essence of which was to win away the people from even the thought of violence. The argument of the Government was that they were responsible for the peace of the country, and they said they could not undertake to govern it unless some such extraordinary powers as those proposed in this Bill were conferred upon them; but, for his own part, he must demur to confiding such powers in the hands of any set of officials. Several hon. Gentlemen had spoken of the state of Ireland with great assumption of authority, although many of them had never seen the country; and he therefore asked if Gentlemen like himself, who resided in the country, and who were acquainted with the feelings of the people and their habits of thought, ought to be supposed to know nothing of the subject now under consideration? The county of Wexford, with which he was acquainted, had been

now for many years under the Coercion Act; but it was now entirely free from agrarian crime, and threatening letters had not been heard of for years past. The Judges at the Assizes had uniformly congratulated the Grand Juries on the county having an almost absolute immunity from crime. Therefore, so far from Wexford being placed under unequal and oppressive laws, it should enjoy all the privileges of the most favoured part of Her Majesty's dominions. The only reasons he could imagine for the present course of legislation in reference to Ireland were that the Government were misled by false information as to the state of the country, or that they were determined, no matter what the condition of Ireland might be, that the Irish people should not enjoy the same freedom which was allowed to their fellow-subjects in England and Scotland. The fact of the matter was, that the people of Ireland knew very well these Acts did not in any way assist in the government of the country. If he wished to foster a spirit of disaffection he would give a cordial support to the measure of the Government, because he felt that it would form an admirable argument for people in Ireland to say there was no use in coming to an English Parliament to obtain their rights; but, as he desired to see Ireland happy and loyal, he called upon the Government to cease placing reliance upon police officers and rascally informers, and to trust the people themselves. He believed that if such a course were adopted, and the evil traditions of English government in Ireland cast aside, the prosperity and the permanent pacification of the Irish people would be assured.

MR. GIBSON said, he had listened with considerable surprise to the speech of the hon. Member for Mayo (Mr. O'Connor Power), who spoke with his usual eloquence, but who, from the beginning to the end of his speech, had not fairly grappled with the question. The hon. Gentleman referred to the past history of the country. He (Mr. Gibson) did not think it necessary, from his point of view, to go into that retrospect. If it were necessary to go into it, he thought it would be found that there were a great many things which ought to be forgotten, and many things which were to be regretted on both sides. It was impossible to suppose that a hard-and-fast line was to be drawn, so that it might be said that all the good was on one side and all the bad on the other. He hoped hon. Gentlemen would not contend that there were not some mistakes on their side. Would it not be as well, with such a measure before the House, to try to forget those wretched animosities which the past had bequeathed to them, and to consider the present measure as a matter of business, although a very unfortunate business? There were two ways of meeting the question which had been introduced to their notice—one by fair and temperate argument, the other by indulging in allusions to the past which he thought could only be used—if he might say so without offence—on occasions of this kind for the purpose of eloquent declamation. The hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. Redmond) had referred to his own experience. He (Mr. Gibson) respected the powers of observation of the hon. Gentleman; but he was also a resident in Ireland, and his experience had been to say that they should not assume that this was a matter on which there was unanimity of opinion in that country. He should, indeed, be surprised if 50, or even half, of the Irish Representatives went into the Lobby against the Government; and, after all, the Division List of the House was the only means by which Irish opinion on the subject could be measured. In the face of the unanimous opinion of the English and Scotch people, and a very substantial body of public opinion in Ireland in favour of the Acts, a grave responsibility would rest upon the Government if they proposed to sweep these laws away at once and absolutely, and that merely in deference to suggestions which, so far as they had any foundation at all, were based on allusions to the past, which it was the duty of all parties to forget. No doubt the gradual abolition of this code was desirable, and in this direction the Bill made very great strides—strides as great as were consistent with prudence. What seemed to have most weight with the Irish Members who had spoken against the present very moderate Bill was the fact that it preserved certain regulations which did not exist in England, and it was said that this should operate on the minds of the Government. But if his hon. Friends appealed to history in support of their case, he could also appeal to history to show that between England and Ireland there was a great social and economic distinction. In England for over a century there had been nothing in the nature of civil war; whereas in Ireland within a period of 80 years there had been four revolutionary outbreaks—namely, in the years 1798, 1805, 1848, and 1864. These were sad circumstances to go into. He should have been glad to consider the Bill upon its merits; but when history was appealed to on the other side it was only reasonable to recall those dates, because they suggested very substantial arguments in his favour. With reference to the Act of 1870, at the time it was passed its necessity was absolutely proved. This was tested by a reference to the Division Lists, there having been 425 for it and 13 against it, which showed a majority of 412; and if the Division Lists were again appealed to, it would be found that when the Westmeath Act of 1871 was passed 163 voted for it, and only 7 against it. Surely these facts afforded proof that the great bulk of public opinion, not only in Great Britain, but in Ireland, [was favourable to the present legislation. The Bill now introduced by the Chief Secretary did not propose the continuance of that legislation at all. On the contrary, it suggested the continuance of one of the Acts for only five years, and another for two years; and it must be remembered that although the Bill proposed the continuance of those Acts for a certain period, there was contained in the Acts themselves a power of remission by gradually revoking the proclamations; and he believed it was the intention of the Government to watch their opportunities and to revoke the proclamations whenever a chance offered, and he hoped that, before the five years in the one case, and the two years in the other, had elapsed, these Acts would have practically ceased to be in operation in any part of Ireland. The House had heard a good deal about the government of Ireland in accordance with Irish ideas, and his hon. Friends below the Gangway on the opposite side were very glad to avail themselves of that view to obtain the passing of the Irish Church and Irish Land Acts. Was it unreasonable, then, to suggest to them that there might be differences between the state of Ireland and England which would render restrictive legislation properly applicable to the former, though not to the latter? The noble Lord the Member for Westmeath (Lord Robert Montagu), indeed, stated that while in 1870 the number of agrarian outrages in Ireland was 1,329, it had fallen in 1874 to 213. Well, that was a very good argument in favour of the relaxation of restrictive laws, but that relaxation was proposed by the Government in the Bill under discussion. The noble Lord appeared to forget that not a little of the diminution of agrarian offences of which he spoke was to be attributed to the operation of the Act of 1870, and that the fact that the diminution commenced immediately after the passing of that Act furnished a good ground for urging that a measure which had produced such results ought not to be at once abandoned. He could quite understand the feelings of hon. Members opposite when it was proposed to continue the Acts in the ordinary way, but it was a very different state of things this Session. Last year what was continued was the old code of 1870 and 1871; but in the Bill now introduced the Whiteboy code was entirely abandoned, and the power to issue search warrants was decidedly diminished. For the future no search warrant was to exist for more than 21 days, instead of for three months, and the right to arrest suspicious persons was entirely given up. Such arrests were in future to be made according to the ordinary operation of law. The power to arrest strangers at night and to close public-houses by the mere order of the Lord Lieutenant was given up, and the proceedings before magistrates were changed in essential particulars. A power of appeal was also given. Resident magistrates were also dropped out of the summary procedure clauses of this Bill, and it was left to the ordinary petty sessions bench to administer the jurisdiction. Moreover, the Act of 1870 enabled the Attorney General for Ireland ex officio himself to suggest a change of the venue, while under the present Bill it was left to the Court of Queen's Bench to make the change whenever it was satisfied that ought to be done. There was another relaxation which, in his opinion, ought to have great weight with his hon. Friends opposite, and that was the complete and absolute removal of all restrictions on the Press. What was chiefly complained of last year was the arbitrary power of arrest and the restraint upon the Press, but such objections could not be urged against the present Bill. After the passing of this measure no person could be arrested in Ireland except by the ordinary operation of law, whilst the Press would be as free in Ireland as it was in any other part of the Empire. In his opinion, everything had been given up that could by possibility be given up, and the very smallest amount of legislation had been retained that could be retained if they were to continue anything at all. What was it that had been retained in the present Bill? The Westmeath Act of 1871 could not in any proper sense be regarded as having any connection with the legislation to which his hon. Friends opposite so strongly objected, because that code was an exceptional police statute, rendered necessary by the Ribbon conspiracy—that dark, cowardly organization which had nothing in common with true patriotism. [“Hear, hear!”] He was glad his hon. Friends opposite acknowledged the justice of that statement, for he was sure that men whose private character was above suspicion would not pollute the name of patriotism by admitting that it had any connection with the hideous code which did not stop short of assassination. The Preamble of the Westmeath Act, he further contended, contained its own justification, for it recited the history of a society whose existence and whose crimes furnished its best justification. That society had carried on its operations for nearly a century, and the facts which had been revealed with respect to its action before an influential Committee in 1871 had been the foundation of the Act of which the noble Lord seemed to complain. Now, would it not, he would ask, be rash to assume that the vitality of a society which had existed so long, which had outlasted the Rebellions of 1798 and of 1848 and the events of 1864, which had not been overcome by the Famine and remained unrooted out by 10 years of emigration, had become all at once absolutely eradicated? The noble Lord said that this should be done because crime had diminished within the last three or four years; but it should be recollected that crime could be diminished either by reformation or by terror. The existing code was said to be one of terror; but surely the noble Lord, in making use of that argument, cut the ground from under his own feet! Surely it was more probable that crime had been rendered dormant during the last three and a-half years by terror rather than eradicated by reformation. In 1871 the noble Lord himself voted for that Act, which was then necessary to protect, not property alone, but life, in Westmeath; and now the noble Lord asked a Government responsible for the lives of people of those districts rashly to assume that all those terrible agencies of crime had been entirely extirpated. He now turned to the remainder of the Act. Section 13, which was retained, gave power wherever a felony or a misdemeanour had been committed of summoning persons to give evidence. That was only a reasonable improvement in the criminal law. It existed, he believed, in Scotland. Where a felony had been committed why should a man, if he knew about it, and there was no privilege to cover him, shrink from giving evidence before a constituted tribunal? Such a person ought to be liable to be summoned and to state all he knew of the facts. Then the 38th section was retained, and ought always to be retained, in the law of Ireland. It was this—that if a witness in a criminal case was about to abscond, there should be means taken to prevent him from absconding, and he thought that if this Act was allowed to expire, this section at least should be kept always in operation as part of the criminal law of the country. He had pointed out what was given up and what was retained, but he would not enter into minute particulars. Let them look at Section 39, which gave compensation to the relatives of those who had been the victims of agrarian murders. Was not that an admirable law? It embodied one of the oldest principles of the law of this country; but it could not be granted without all the elements of the cases being proved by legal evidence. Why should not the family of a victim have compensation? Agrarian murder implied concert and, to a certain extent, conspiracy; and where such elements existed—and their existence must be proved to the satisfaction of the Judge of a Superior Court—that section operated both to compensate the family of the victim and also as some little punishment of the locality, which, at all events, was honoured by the residence of the parties to the agrarian murder. The hon. Member for Roscommon (the O'Connor Don), and Longford (Mr. O'Reilly) spoke of that as an innovation; but it was one of the oldest and most familiar principles of our law, and went as far back as Anglo-Saxon times, when the system of frank-pledge prevailed. Moreover, at almost every Assize in Ireland compensation was given for malicious injuries and injuries caused by tumultuous assemblages; and if they compensated the loss of property and taxed the district for causing it, why should they not equally tax the district that was answerable for the murder of the head of a family? This Bill had been called a desperate and an atrocious one, and he dared to say it would be called so again. But what did it come to in the end? These clauses were certainly excusable and defensible. Then, as to the restriction upon an indiscriminate carriage of arms. Now, was there such a restriction as should cause those observations which the House had been obliged to listen to? In England it was not the absolute right of everyone to go without question into a gunmaker's shop and walk out with a gun. A person must get a licence, which implied a power of registering the names of those who had a licence, and that was to a certain extent a check on the indiscriminate purchase and use of arms in England. That, he admitted, was a different thing from the restrictions that existed in Ireland; but, apart from sentiment, he was not sure that it was now very necessary or desirable to have the power of carrying arms generally and indiscriminately extended to a people so excitable as the Irish, among whom faction fights had not utterly died out. At fairs and markets not unfrequently "rows" were got up, in which by the use of their "blackthorns" people were able to administer sufficient punishment to one another without having recourse to any more deadly weapons. There was not an Assize held in Tipperary at which dockfuls of fine young fellows were not sent to prison for getting into little encounters of that kind; and he had heard that in one of the largest baronies of that county there was not one entire skull. In objecting, therefore, to do away all at once with the present restrictions on the use of arms he was not at all disparaging his own country, which in respect to ordinary crime would compare favourably with England. Indeed, if in Ireland they sometimes wanted a proclamation against arms, in England there might advantageously be an occasional proclamation against boots. The only restriction in the Bill was really one against carrying arms; it was to continue only for five years, and long before then it would be taken off if possible. He should be glad to have this legislation carried out without any attempt to set class against class; and he had been sorry to hear the noble Lord the Member for Westmeath appealing as he had done to the past and speaking of an alien magistracy. Those magistrates lived among the people, their fathers had lived among them, and their children had been born among them. Although many of them were not of the same religion as most of the people, this could not be regarded as a justification of the harsh terms which had been used. It would be well, instead of dwelling so much upon the past, to think a little more of the living present. It had gratified him to read in The Times of that morning the following generous and noble words:—

"When Irishmen consent to let the past become indeed history, not party politics, and begin to learn from it the lessons of mutual respect and tolerance, instead of endless bitterness and enmity; then, at last, this distracted land shall see the dawn of hope and peace; and begin to renew her youth and rear her head amongst the proudest of nations."

These were the words of John Mitchel—De mortuis nil nisi bonum. He ventured to think that the "dawn of hope and peace," of which Mr. Mitchel had spoken, had now begun; and, although not of a very sanguine disposition, he looked forward to the day, and believed it was not far distant, when the fulfilment of those generous hopes would be witnessed.

Mr. SULLIVAN said, he thought the House must have listened with pleasure to the first speech of the hon. and learned Member for Dublin University (Mr. Gibson), and, though they might belong to opposite sides of the House, he could assure him that in no section of that Assembly had it been listened to with greater pleasure—apart from the arguments it contained—than it had been by the hon. Members around him.

He was sorry that the evening's debate should have been preceded by a dramatic display—he hoped, not arranged between the Irish Secretary and the hon. Baronet (Sir Edward Watkin), who rose behind them to impart a lurid hue to their discussion of the Bill, by asking, amid murmurs and sensation, whether it was true, as stated in The Pall Mall Gazette, that there had been an attempt of agrarian murder in Ireland yesterday or to-day. They knew what would be the effect of that melodramatic procedure, and though many of his Friends around him (Mr. Sullivan) could have given a very effective counter-thrust, they thought they might let the matter pass. They might, for instance, have asked the hon. Baronet, who rose to put the Question, whether he did not resemble the man who could not see the beam in his own eye, though he could denounce the mote in his neighbour's, seeing that—as they might also have asked the Home Secretary—four murders in England were reported on Monday alone.

SIR EDWARD WATKIN explained that he had spoken to the Irish Secretary but once in his life, and that was at a dinner-party about a month ago. He had had no communication whatever with him about the Question to which reference had just been made. The fact was, simply, that the good landlord and generous man whose agent had in a dastardly way been shot was a friend of his, and the circumstances of the case had in consequence come to his knowledge.

MR. SULLIVAN said, he had not stated that the Chief Secretary and the hon. Baronet had arranged the Question together; but it was fair for him to presume that what was usual in such circumstances had been done. ["Oh."] Well, it was usual to give a Minister at least private Notice of a Question that was to be put to him; and if the hon. Baronet was so eager to thump down Ireland that he could not follow that usage, he must be content to take the consequences of his presumption. The Home Secretary might be asked whether it was true, as reported in The Times, that a man in England had cut from ear to ear the throat of the woman whom he had vowed at the altar to love and cherish; and whether it was also true, as reported in the same journal, that another man had murdered his father and mother? Such acts did not seem to impress hon. Members deeply; but when a land agent was killed or wounded it was thought to be something extremely wicked. Really, that little prelude of the debate was unworthy of the occasion, and induced them to ask whether they could not have a debate on a Coercion Bill, without having such elements introduced into it? He did not think Her Majesty's Ministers, however, altogether welcomed this imputation, and he must frankly admit the supporters of the Bill on the part of the Government had abstained from indulging in that class of argument. He was sure the Government would rather have done without that Coercion Bill; but they found it on the Statute Book, and a party needed a great deal of education before they could be made to take the necessary course in an era of coercion for Ireland. It was quite true that the code which it was now proposed to enact was less severe in some respects than the one which in a few months would expire; but he maintained that they were now discussing the enactment of a new law, and not the modification of an existing one. The Bill ought to be judged by what it contained within its four corners, and not by comparison with Acts which would be dead in a few months. There was just one answer to opponents of the Bill that ought to have been made, if it could have been made, but which had not been made because it could not. If it was true, as it was asserted by hon. Gentlemen who defended the Bill, that it would only affect the guilty and the criminal, and not the innocent and law-abiding citizen, why not adopt the policy of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and deal alike for the three parts of the Kingdom with the same classes of offences, wherever they were found? Why not make the crime of murder alike for the three parts of the Kingdom, and let the district which had most murders suffer the most? If it was so harmless and so useful, why hesitate to pass it for England? And that was the place to explain the too tender susceptibility of Irish Members. It had been asked why could they not discuss the Bill as calmly as the Artizans Dwellings Bill? Their answer was this—that so long as a single statute existed that branded their country as needing more repression than England or Scotland, so long would they regard conciliation as an object of scorn, and indignation as a virtue. But there was, besides, in that legislation a wound to Ireland as well as a positive insult. Let them lay on their country the same repressive enactments as they provided for the rest of the country, and they would hear no mere objections to their laws. Let them lay on the rest of the Kingdom the same restrictions on the possession of arms, or on being out after Curfew, and let the murderer take the same chance wherever he was found in the three parts of the Kingdom, and they would hear from Ireland no word of complaint. But so long as, by a single Act or a single clause, they attempted to hold forth to the world that they were a nation so given to murder, crime, and infamy, and that their much-vaunted British Constitution was insufficient to cope with them, so long, he hoped, would Members be found to rise on those benches to tell them that it was an insult to ask them to discuss such a proposition. The hon. Member for Sheffield (Mr. Mundella) asked him, "How about Sheffield?" Well, he would ask the hon. Member to study the calendar for Louth for the last 10 years, and to look at the Sheffield cases at the last Assizes. One crime tried at those Assizes he could not mention; another was a case of wounding, another crime must be nameless, and there were crimes of embezzlement, forgery, burglary, manslaughter, robbery with violence, abuse of a girl, robbery with violence again, and so on. He contrasted that with the county of Louth, which was proclaimed by this Coercion Bill. He was far from wishing, however, that the Coercion Acts should be applied to Sheffield or to any other part of the Empire; because the British Constitution ought to be the scorn of the world if it were unable to deal with these ebullitions of crime, which were worse in some parts of England than they were in Ireland. He would ask on what grounds the exceptional powers of these Acts could be continued in Ireland, and to the exclusion of England? The Lord Lieutenant of Ireland was still to have the power of sending extra constables into the proclaimed districts, and they would presently see how that worked; persons might be arrested for carrying arms without a licence, and were liable to six months' imprisonment with hard labour; and the Lord Lieutenant could issue a warrant authorizing the police to break into a man's house and search every part of it, day or night, and even female modesty might be outraged, as it had been before under colour of this exercise of power. He wondered how English Members would like to see such a law enacted for England. He knew that it would be said that there was a benevolent despot at Dublin Castle who would prevent these statutes from being abused; but would Englishmen feel satisfied if their liberties and the sanctity of their homes were subject to the caprice of any Minister, however benevolent and well-meaning he might be? What was the excuse put forward for renewing these statutes against Ireland? They were told that secret crime was waiting to burst forth in that country, but where or how was not stated. The Chief Secretary, who had failed to lay before the House any evidence upon the subject, had treated them to a dark-lantern scene, in which he had described the dreadful things that were going on behind the white sheet, and had asserted that there was murder in the land waiting to start forward the instant that these Coercion Acts were repealed. The right hon. Gentleman had said that, if these laws were repealed, murder, assassination, crime, and outrage would rage in Ireland during the coming winter as sure as he stood in the House. Who had taught the right hon. Gentleman that? Where was his authority for making such an assertion? Why did he not produce the documents supplied to him by the magistrates? And who were his authorities? The police and some of the magistrates. To show the efficiency of the police in some districts, the hon. Member related the story of a young Englishman who came to pay him a visit some years ago, and who brought his photographic apparatus with him. They were at Kells, about to photograph a very interesting old cross, and the young man had the cloth over his head, when a policeman came up and the crowd fled in terror. The policeman said—"Come, come, sir; we allow no peep-shows here!" As to the police in Ireland, if they waited to mitigate coercion law until 184 B and his captains became defenders of Constitutional liberty, he feared they would have to wait a long time. The rural policemen believed that they knew how to govern Ireland much better than the right hon. Gentleman himself did. Those ignorant men sent up their reports to the magistrates, and through the latter they actually influenced the mind of the right hon. Gentleman. Then, as to the magistrates, had they not asked for the Bill? There had been a great deal of avoidance on that point. He knew that in King's County a Protestant resident gentleman met one of the favoured few magistrates who were invited to consider whether the Coercion Act should be renewed, and he asked him whether he had stated that there had been no crime in their county? He replied that he had; but that as the Act had not been applied, and that it had therefore done no harm, it ought to be renewed. His friend rejoined that he thought that just the reason why it ought not to be renewed. "Ah!" replied the magistrate, "but don't you know that since the Coercion Bill was passed the game was never so well preserved in the county. We have had splendid shooting ever since." The Bill had, in fact, been asked for by the gentry, as the whole police of the country had been converted into watchers for their game, and their game could not be much disturbed if there were no guns. The unhappy alienation of a portion of the Irish magistrates from their fellow-countrymen was, perhaps, as much their misfortune as it was their fault, seeing that for a long time past they had been taught to regard themselves as being a class apart from the people and a garrison planted in the midst of a hostile population, and living in the country, but not being of it. He did not so much blame the magistrates for following the instructions they had received for more than a century; but he warned the Government that neither they nor the police were to be depended upon as advisers on the question whether or not the state of Ireland required an extension of these Coercion Bills. Why had not the right hon. Gentleman referred to the opinions expressed by the Judges of Assize? True it was that at the last Assize at Antrim the Judge had stated that a certain class of crime had increased in the district; but he had, at the same time, pointed out that that increase was in such crime only as resulted from intoxication. In Armagh the Judge said there was a slight increase in ordinary crime, but it was traceable to intoxication. At Carrikerfergus the Grand Jury were congratulated upon the peaceable and satisfactory condition of the county. Mr. Justice Keogh, who was never given to taking a too roseate view of popular affairs, stated in the city of Cork that the number of cases for trial was eight only, and that these were of a trivial character; while the Grand Jury of the county of Cork were told by Mr. Justice Lawson that the number of criminal cases was very small indeed. The Lord Chief Justice of Ireland said he rejoiced to be able to inform the Grand Jury of Carlow that their duties would be very light, adding that it might become a question with some enthusiastic reformer whether a portion of the County Court House and gaol might not be turned into an industrial school. At Drogheda, the Lord Chief Baron remarked upon the fact that there were only five cases to be sent before the Grand Jury. In the county Down the calendar also contained but a few cases. At Fermanagh, Baron Deasy congratulated the Grand Jury on the satisfactory condition of the county. There was a slight increase of ordinary crime in the county of Galway; but in the city the Judge spoke of the peaceable state of things which prevailed. In the county of Kilkenny there were three criminal cases only for trial, and for that coercion was to be imposed upon the country by English votes. In Kildare there was a rather heavy calendar of ordinary crimes, "arising from the vicinity of the Curragh Camp and from the public-houses." In the King's County, with a special proclamation against it, the Lord Chief Justice found that "the cases were not numerous, but they included two cases of homicide." Louth—his own county—was as stainless as any in the Empire. There were but four cases for trial, and not one of them was of a serious nature. All these were hard facts, upon which, and not upon mere rhetoric, the arguments of the Irish Members rested. At Limerick the number of cases was large; but it included no fewer than 1,652 cases of intoxication—a fact which he hoped would be remembered when next the House was asked to pass a Sunday Closing Bill for Ireland. With respect to Limerick County the learned Judge found six or seven cases only for trial, "none of them calling for observation." At London-derry Mr. Justice Morris said that—

"With the exception of one case of murder, which furnished no indication of anything like conspiracy, the district was remarkably free from crime."

In Mayo the Judge said that it had been the good fortune of himself and his learned Colleague to be able to congratulate the Grand Juries on a peculiar absence of crime. There had been cases of personal violence, largely owing to the effects of intoxication. Of Meath, which had been described as the home of murder and of lawlessness, the Lord Chief Justice said—

"The cases for trial are 10 in number; but I am not aware that there is anything particular in them to which it is necessary to call your attention."

In Queen's County, Roscommon, and Sligo the Grand Juries were congratulated by the learned Judges on the peaceable and satisfactory condition of the respective counties. In North Tipperary the only heavy Assize was held, the calendar containing five charges of murder—

"But," said the learned Judge (Mr. Baron Dowse), "I do not find that there is anything to show that there was an organized conspiracy in the county against the lives of Her Majesty's subjects, arising as the crimes did from bad feelings between the parties."

In the county of Tyrone there were only four bills for the Grand Jury, none of a grave nature; the South Riding of Tipperary had a heavier calendar than before, but there were not more than 16 or 17 criminals; at Waterford City the Judge expressed his pleasure at having so little to do; at Waterford County the number of bills was small; at Wexford the Judge congratulated the Grand Jury; in Cavan the Judge was presented with white gloves for the third time within the year; and at Tullaghmore white gloves were also given to the Judge. These facts coming from Her Majesty's Judges were, he submitted, more important contributions to the debate than were the bugaboo stories of policemen, and in the face of the utterances of the Irish Judges he challenged the House to pass, by English votes, a Coercion Bill for Ireland. Let them contrast the charges of the Judges in Ireland with those of the Judges in England, and he said without fear of contradiction that bad as the record was in England, and clear as it was in Ireland, no Minister of the Crown would dare to propose a suspension of the Constitution for this country on that ground. He was but expressing freely the opinions that were surging in the breasts of the Irish people when he said that they felt with respect to the proposed legislation, not so much its severity—although that was much—as the indignity, the humiliation, the wrong, the outrage, that would be inflicted on them; while for England no such measure could be proposed, although her calendars were so deeply blood-stained with crime. By passing this Bill the House would tell a highly susceptible race that a peace almost unequalled throughout Europe availed nothing to save their country from the shackles and chains which an English majority could impose on them.

SIR EDWARD WATKIN said, that as the hon. Member for Louth (Mr. Sullivan) had thought fit at the beginning of his speech to make a sensational point by alluding personally to him, he thought it his duty to say a few words in justification of the vote which he intended to give. Although he had heard many speeches like that of the hon. Member, outside that House, greeted with immense applause, he thought the hon. Member must have gathered, as he went on, that the style of oratory in which he had indulged was not that which would convince the calm judgment of that Assembly. He (Sir Edward Watkin) appealed to Gentlemen on either side of the House whether the hon. Member had grappled or attempted to grapple with any one of the close and logical arguments used by the hon. and learned Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Gibson), who showed conclusively that there was no ground for such declamation as that in which the hon. Member for Louth had indulged. He (Sir Edward Watkin) believed there was nothing contained in the Bill with the exception of the clauses relating to the possession of arms which might not properly be extended to England, and which, if it were proposed to extend in that direction, he should feel bound to support. He believed, with the hon. and learned Member for Dublin, that these provisions were proper and wise amendments of the criminal law; and, if so, why should they not be applied to Ireland, or to England, or to any other part of the Empire? As to the question of arms, we in England had the gun tax and the license for shooting, and why were these particular clauses to be applied to Ireland? Because, with all their faults, Englishmen had no Ribbonism amongst them—[An hon. MEMBER: You have worse]—because they had not taken the money of the people of the United States in order to raise up conspiracy and treason against the Queen, and because they had endeavoured to submit to the laws, believing that good laws, however severe, must bring about contentment, peace, and happiness; and although we might not like the rod, we were satisfied with the consequences of its infliction. Therefore, when the hon. Member spoke of that House having inflicted on Ireland all its wrongs, it was only fair to tell him that that House contained men whose lives, like his (Sir Edward Watkin's), had been marked by work and not by talk; and that a great part of the evils inflicted upon Ireland came from men like the hon. Member himself and those of his class, who, instead of devoting themselves to the honourable pursuit of promoting peace and harmony around them, of increasing industry, of augmenting prosperity, and of endeavouring to set an example in those things which most adorned a man, made it their highest ambition to get upon the stump, and, if they could get the Queen and Parliament to dissect, would hesitate at no kind of language, and no volume of abuse, in order to elicit a temporary cheer, upon which it appeared the necessary excitement of their lives depended. Who were the friends of Ireland? If those who employed Irishmen, then he (Sir Edward Watkin) had been one; if those who had always supported justice to Ireland, then he claimed that he had supported every measure which he thought was in the direction of establishing equality between the two countries, as those connected with him had done in days gone by when it was dangerous to speak of justice to Ireland. The English Members of that House were not to be taunted with having brought all the evils upon Ireland of which the hon. Gentleman had complained. What was the cause of the greatness of England? Hard work, industry, and obedience to the law. He had tried in his humble way to follow the example of many others in that direction, an example which in England had produced such good fruits, and which he respectfully and with all deference recommended to the hon. Member, and to those who sympathized with him in the sort of oratory in which he had indulged.

MR. RONAYNE, as one of those adventurers and agitators, to whom the hon. Gentleman had just alluded, asserted that he had worked as hard as the hon. Gentleman for the practical prosperity of Ireland, and had for 30 years employed people in every part of the country, and he thought he knew the people, their wants, and their character, much better than the hon. Member did—he knew they would resent an insult even when it was given by an English railway magnate. Why had his hon. Friend been taunted with seeking for a cheer? Was he likely to get it from that Assembly? He quoted the hard facts as stated by the Judges of Assize, using no rhetoric or oratorical effect, in order to show that Ireland was more free from crime than any country in Europe during recent years. Previous to the passing of this Act in 1870 he (Mr. Ronayne) took a note of the charges of the Judges of Assize in the county and city of Cork. On the 7th of March, 1870, Justice Fitzgerald said that although seven months had elapsed since the previous Assize there had been no crime of any unusual or extraordinary character in the interval, and the instances of undetected crime had been very rare. In the same county of Cork, Justice O'Brien said that the number and the ordinary character of the crimes spoke well for the good character and peaceable conduct of the inhabitants. Mr. Kane, Q.C., at Middleton, said the application of the Coercion Act to that district would be unnecessary. Mr. Hamil, Q.C., was presented with a pair of white gloves in the West Riding of Cork; and Mr. Leahy, at Limerick. In spite of those facts, the Act was extended to that county. This Bill was merely a specimen of the manner in which Englishmen had ruled Ireland for centuries, and one consequence had been that the people of that country had been taught from their earliest youth that their first duty to God and to their country was to resist the law, because it was tyrannical and oppressive. In fact, the Lord Lieutenant and the Chief Secretary were not constitutional rulers—they were despots. The Lord Lieutenant, though called a Viceroy, could order arrests and act in an arbitrary and despotic manner, such as the Queen, whose delegate he was supposed to be, could not exercise in this country. The right hon. Gentleman opposite held the office of Secretary for Ireland with all its powers simply because he was a political partizan. He did not doubt his anxiety to do the best he could for Ireland, but he had no experience of the country, and was forced to have recourse to the Jenkinsons and Robinsons of whom Fox wrote nearly 100 years ago—

“The Lord Lieutenant not having any regular Ministry to apply to, is driven, or, at least, led to consult Lees, and such sort of superior people, and by that means the whole power is, as it were, centered in the Jenkinsons and Robinsons, etc., of that country. Nobody is responsible but the Lord Lieutenant and the Secretary; they know they are to go away, and, consequently, all the mischief arises that belongs to a Government without responsibility.”

The Jenkinsons and the Robinsons were the party in Ireland for whom the country had been governed, for whom England had risked her power and influence in that country, and by them the magistrates of Ireland were selected and appointed. He contended that before the rights of the country were taken away the facts ought to be given upon which it was proposed to take them away. The Chief Secretary for Ireland declared the other evening that the communications made to the Irish Executive were of a confidential nature, and that if he disclosed the names of those on whose information the Government acted they would not again communicate with him. Fortunate would be the day if such a result came to pass, for Ireland must then be better governed. The right hon. Gentleman said the majority of the magistrates were of the religion of the people, but could any statement prove more clearly than this did his complete ignorance of Irish affairs? As a matter of fact, there were 390 magistrates in the county of Cork, and of these only 60 professed the religion of the people, for there were in that county 550,000 Catholics as compared with 49,000 Protestants. It should be borne in mind, too, that the Protestant aristocracy occupied a peculiar position in Ireland. Irishmen reposed no confidence in them, because they were English, and not Irish, in sympathies and sentiments; while the English despised them because they were Irishmen. With reference to the robbery of arms by the Militia in the county of Cork, he pointed out that in two out of the four regiments there was not a single Catholic officer; in one there were two Catholic officers, and in another three. Under such circumstances, one could hardly expect to find such sympathy as ought to exist between officers and men. The question between England and Ireland was not a religious question, but a national question; and he, for one, would use every effort in his power to pull down that ascendancy of Protestants, as exclusively the governing class, which those who govern at the present day so strenuously promote.

MR. BIGGAR said, that although there were not 40 Members present he should like to make a few observations on the Bill before the House. He contended that it was a very injudicious thing on the part of the Government, even from a military point of view, to maintain these coercive measures with respect to Ireland, which being chiefly an agricultural country, was one of the best fields we had for recruits, whether for the Army or the Navy. Another result was that Irishmen who emigrated to the United States increased the Fenian element in that country. Some day England would be at war, and with a view to such an event it was desirable to govern Ireland in such a manner as to induce her people to make common cause with England in the hour of need. The Government would act most wisely if they withdrew the Bill, instead of pressing it forward. He had listened attentively to the two speeches of the Chief Secretary, and he had not been able to find a single argument in them which would show that this Bill ought to pass. The right hon. Gentleman had led the House to believe that he had in his possession private information which would justify him in asking the House to consent to this measure; but he had not given the least hint what that information was. That was not sufficient. The right hon. Gentleman relied upon what was told him by magistrates who were untrustworthy, or by policemen, who, with a view to preferment, would lead him astray; but the Irish Members, the town commissioners of Ireland, and the tenant-farmers, who were most of all liable to suffer from agrarian outrage were all opposed to measures of coercion; and that was the general opinion of the people of Ireland so far as there had been any opportunity of ascertaining it. He had been refused a licence to carry arms when he lived in Ireland; but since he had been a Member of the House he had been allowed to carry a revolver. His object in carrying arms was to defend himself from rowdies. Englishmen knew nothing whatever about the affairs of Ireland, and the Chief Secretary therefore could only act on statements made by the police or the stipendiary magistrates, most of whom were broken-down gentlemen. It was said that Ribbonism existed in Ireland; but that was altogether denied by those who knew Ireland better than police-constables, from whom the Government derived their information. If this Bill passed, the Orange Society, which was bound by a secret oath, would be perfectly illegal. He had no personal grudge against any of its members; he believed many of them were very good fellows; but the people of Ireland would expect to see even-handed justice administered to all secret societies. It was generally supposed that an Act of Parliament was capable of being understood; but this Bill was more like a Chinese puzzle than an Act of Parliament. It was perfectly incomprehensible. He particularly objected to that clause under which compensation was to be given by Grand Juries, who were not elected by the people and who often gave their decision in such cases from favouritism. It was exceedingly unfair in some cases to permit a Grand Jury to award compensation for injury to property. There was reason to suppose that the proprietors of flax-mills neglected to insure them against fire, because they could obtain compensation when they were burnt down, and there were owners whose mills had been repeatedly on fire, and who always claimed and obtained compensation as for malicious injury. He complained that the Attorney General for Ireland had no practice at the Bar and was not a good lawyer, and it yet was necessary, when a Bill like this was passed, that the law Officers of the Crown in Ireland should be competent to give an opinion on any point that might be called in question.

MR. STACPOOLE complained that the Government maintained an unnecessary and invidious distinction between the stipendiary and other magistrates. He hoped the Government would give the magistrates their proper position. He should vote in favour of the Amendment.

MR. O'BYRNE desired to supplement the speech of the hon. Member for Louth (Mr. Sullivan) by quoting the Charge of the Judge to the Grand Jury at the Wicklow Assizes on the preceding day.

CAPTAIN NOLAN pointed out that the front Opposition Bench was deserted, and complained that, while he and his Friends had been eager to discuss the Bill from their point of view, the Irish Members who would give the Government their votes had not been equally eager to support the Bill by arguments, and only four of them, including the hon. and learned Member for Dublin University (Mr. Gibson), had taken part in the debate. The Secretary for Ireland took credit for this Bill because it relaxed the provisions of the existing Coercion Laws; but he regarded it as the worst measure for Ireland during the last six or seven years, because its duration was to be five instead of two years; and it was likely to be much more debauching to public opinion. The right hon. Gentleman also defended the Bill because there were murders in Ireland. No doubt there was always a remarkable murder before a Coercion Bill, and the Irish Secretary had produced one. He would admit that there were 40 murders in Ireland every year, or nearly one a week, and it was easy to convert them into remarkable murders by a few newspaper articles. But then, comparing the population of the two countries, there were exactly three murders in England for every two in Ireland; and the House was therefore, on this reasoning, bound to pass a more severe Coercion Bill for England than for Ireland. Then the right hon. Gentleman said that, as firearms were dangerous weapons, it was rather a good thing than otherwise that there were restrictions upon their possession in Ireland, as it lessened the number of casualties. Well, there were, perhaps, less than a dozen people killed in Ireland by the incautious use of firearms; but there were 400 people who hanged themselves in England, and 200 who cut their throats. So that the argument, if good for anything, would go to prohibit the use of ropes and razors, and would stop the use of some of the first luxuries of life. The Chief Secretary for Ireland said that a tax of 10s. was paid upon every gun in England, so that it was only a question of degree if arms were prohibited in Ireland. It might as well be argued that if a tax was levied upon tea in England, there would be no hardship in prohibiting it altogether in Ireland. When three or four Members of Parliament had told the House that the possession of arms had been refused to them, the House might judge what chance the ordinary farmer had of obtaining permission. In England the number of gun licences taken out in 1873 was 109,863. Comparing the area of the two countries there ought to be 54,000 in Ireland, or if they compared population, there ought to be 26,000, while the actual number of gun licences taken out in Ireland was only 3,460. There were a large number of farmers and others in Ireland who would, as a matter of business, keep arms but for the prohibition; and, in addition to this number, there were many more who regarded the prohibition as a grievance, although in all probability they would not exercise the right to keep arms even if they possessed it. The Bill would not only inflict a grievance upon Irish farmers, but it would place Members representing Irish constituencies in a very awkward position also. The Bill was to remain in force during five years, and no one could doubt that before that period had expired, there would be an outbreak of war in Europe. Whether England was or was not engaged in such war, there would arise a necessity for arming, and therefore for an increased supply of money to the Government of the day. When a Government came to Parliament to ask for these supplies, the Irish Members would be under the necessity of offending their constituencies by voting for the supplies without urging the grievances of their country, or of laying themselves open to a charge of want of patriotism by delaying the process of arming for possible defence at a critical period. The hon. and learned Member for Sheffield (Mr. Roebuck), on the previous evening, stated that the grievances of which the Irish people complained as being likely to arise from the operation of this Bill would be removed if they would cease from demanding Home Rule. This was equivalent to saying that they were only to be permitted to call for the repeal of an unconstitutional law on condition that they ceased to strive after a constitutional object by constitutional means. The hon. Member for Hythe (Sir Edward Watkin) had, in the course of the debate, made an undeserved attack upon the hon. Member for Louth (Mr. Sullivan), on the ground that he was not a working man. This might be the opinion of the hon. Member; but the House would scarcely agree with him in denying the title to be considered a working man to a man whose literary ability was universally admitted by the country generally. The hon. and learned Member opposite (Mr. Gibson) had spoken of his constituents being in favour of the continuance of these laws of coercion; but the farmers in his (Captain Nolan's) part of the country were altogether against their continuance. Many references had been made to the magistrates of Ireland, some saying that they were good, and others that they were bad. How was the position of the magistrates affected by this Bill? The Government were making the magistrates and police officers the judges as to whether this was a good or a bad Bill. They were relied upon, and they alone were exempted from the action of the Bill in regard to carrying arms. It was from the magistrates that the Government had drawn all their information which was the basis of this Bill. Now, the love of sporting and shooting was as great in Ireland as in England, and the fewer guns that were allowed to be used in Ireland, the more game would there be for the privileged few to shoot at. That was, in a sense, holding out a bribe to the magistrates not to grant licences to carry arms. In conclusion, the hon. Member complained that the period just before Easter was a very awkward one for Irish Members to attend in Parliament, and called upon the House to reject a Bill which was opposed by two-thirds of the Representatives of the people who would be affected by it.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. PLUNKET) remarked that it had been alleged that hon. Members on that side of the House refrained too much from taking part in the debate. He could assure hon. Members opposite that this had not been done from any want of respect for them or their arguments. They had been actuated solely by a desire that an ample opportunity should be afforded for a full criticism of the Bill; and certainly he did not regret that this course had been taken; because the further the discussion had gone the more he had been struck with the change which had come over the views of hon. Members since the introduction of the Bill. The more the measure had been explained and studied the more difficult it had been for hon. Members opposite to find good reasons for treating it in the spirit of unmitigated resistance and stern denunciation with which it was first received. The speeches made had been able, as speeches by the hon. Members for Louth (Mr. Sullivan) and Mayo (Mr. O'Connor Power) must always be. But it was worthy of remark to how small an extent they had really touched upon the subject under debate. The hon. Member for Mayo, impelled doubtless by oratorical motives, raked up the old history of oppression and of distinctions between religions, using language which certainly was not calculated to create good feeling between landlords and tenants.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER explained that he was not aware that he had used such language, and said that, perhaps, the hon. and learned Gentleman was referring to the remarks made by the hon. Member for Cork or for Louth.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. PLUNKET): No; the hon. Member for Mayo had told the House of landlords in Ireland having agreed upon "the wholesale extermination of the Irish people." Did the hon. Gentleman suppose the House would accept that as an argument in support of his view of the case? He ventured to tell the hon. Member for Mayo that he would not advance his cause or bring credit upon his party by making such wild and unfounded accusations. But no doubt he had found himself in the position of having no better argument to employ. The hon. Member for Louth (Mr. Sullivan) had done little more than call attention to the amount of ordinary crime which existed in England. But that, again, was not the question; for it was admitted on all hands that Ireland was singularly free from crime of the ordinary kind. What they were debating that night was the propriety of having exceptional legislation to meet exceptional crime; and it was therefore quite beside the point to draw pictures of wife-beating and burglary at Sheffield and elsewhere. The special circumstances which called for coercive legislation in Ireland were altogether absent in England; but he was quite sure that if they believed it necessary, the English Members would not hesitate to apply the present Bill to their country. He was sure they would be willing to sacrifice for a time their most cherished liberties; nor rest content until they had stamped out from among them that class of exceptional crime which still prevailed in his unhappy country, though not to so great an extent as formerly, and which reflected disgrace not on individuals alone, but on the people at large. The hon. Member for Louth, arguing on this subject, had referred to the Charges of the Assize Judges, which no doubt presented a very satisfactory picture of the state of ordinary crime in Ireland. But there were two recent Charges to which reference had not been made, but which had a very important bearing on the question under debate. Referring to the county of Westmeath, Mr. Justice Fitzgerald, who was no partizan of the present Government, and could not be considered an alien in race or religion from the Irish people, said he was "Happy to observe that the Peace Preservation Act had been so mildly and fairly administered that not a single person was in custody under its special provisions, while its effect had clearly been to suppress outrages, to expel bad characters from the districts where it was in force, and to protect people who were peaceable and well-conducted."

This view corresponded with that expressed in the same county at the last Summer Assizes by the Chief Baron of the Exchequer, who remarked—he quoted the words from memory—that

"not until they had perfect immunity from exceptional crime could they afford to dispense with exceptional legislation."

That was his contention now; not that there was so much ordinary crime, or crime arising from conflicts between persons of different religion; but that the elements which within the last few years had produced crimes of an exceptional and atrocious character had not yet been eradicated. The Government knew they were still there, and asked the House for such powers as would enable them to tide over to the time until the partial immunity from these crimes should have become complete. When that period arrived none would rejoice more than hon. Members sitting on that side of the House, the charter of whose policy it was to lean on the common law and to trust the people. He thought he need not go through the various clauses of the Bill, as they were fully explained last night by his right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary for Ireland, and also that evening by his hon. and learned Colleague (Mr. Gibson), whom he congratulated on his very able, clear, and effective speech. But he would refer to the part assigned to the stipendiary and ordinary magistrates in Ireland. The former had to perform the duty of granting licences under the Act, and it had been said that they were not reliable persons; and a general onslaught was made upon the latter by the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Ronayne), who had told the House anecdotes of his familiar conversations with these justices; but it seemed to him that the hon. Member made an attack upon his own personal and intimate friends. He (the Solicitor General for Ireland) believed that both those classes of magistrates were most intelligent and reliable men. He might mention that for the appointments of resident magistrates a very large number of candidates always presented themselves, and there was not one of those gentlemen whose recommendations and qualifications for the office were not carefully and attentively examined. Whatever might have been the case in former times, the selection of candidates for the magistracy was now made on no other ground than that of fitness; and he believed the present Lord Lieutenant and the Chief Secretary took care to have a personal interview with candidates before they were appointed. He himself, in the course of his own professional experience and ordinary life in Ireland, had come into contact with a large number of the resident magistrates, probably more than half of them, and he could confidently say that a more intelligent, trustworthy, and energetic body of officials did not exist. It was therefore they entrusted those powers to the resident magistrates,

The Solicitor General for Ireland

and why did they entrust them? Because they were responsible to the Government for their conduct. If any hon. Member thought there was just reason to complain of the conduct of any one of those gentlemen, all he could say was that if they took the trouble to bring those complaints before the notice of the authorities, they would be attended to in the proper spirit. There was no proof whatever of the alleged misconduct, and it was rather hard upon the resident magistrates to make a general accusation against them in that House. Hon. Gentlemen should not take advantage of their position as Members to bring forward charges of that kind. If there was a solid accusation against them, let it be brought forward at half-past 4, when Questions were put, and the process of interviewing Ministers had become almost a science. What was desired was to regulate the power of carrying arms, and proper opportunity should be given for trying the question when it was found needful. Then as regarded the ordinary magistrates, they had heard certain complaints brought against them too; but an hon. Gentleman opposite rose and indignantly defended the conduct of his magisterial brethren. All the power the ordinary magistrates had under the Bill was, that when a man was accused, they had the opportunity of trying his case at petty sessions. That had been objected to as a harsh administration of the law; but it was not administered in any such spirit, and it was better that the man should be tried at once than held over until he could appear before another tribunal. The investigation was just the same as that which took place in the case of a man accused of ordinary crime, and he had the opportunity of calling in counsel to conduct his defence. It was absurd, then, to turn this into a complaint. He had now to ask the House to consider what was the present state of things in Ireland on which they grounded this exceptional legislation. He was not there to contend that the state of Ireland at the present day was as bad as it had been in 1870—far from it; but what he was there to contend for was, that there still remained in the country a sufficient amount of agrarian outrage to show that beneath the surface there still lurked all the elements of greater crimes. The Bill was meant, therefore, not only to punish crimes now committed as to prevent the renewal of offences which had unhappily been, a very short time since, so frequent. There were three different kinds of damages to be considered. The first were the crimes connected with Fenianism, and that branch of the case was, he thought, at the present moment, of the three, that which was of the least importance. In that view he was rejoiced to be able to agree with his right hon. Friend near him (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach), and the noble Lord the late Chief Secretary for Ireland (the Marquess of Hartington). But he also concurred with them in thinking that Fenianism, though scotched, was not killed. Now, the power of promiscuously carrying arms was the life blood of that conspiracy, and the knowledge that there were stores of arms in the country which they might obtain was a circumstance which gave to the conspirators their chief importance, enabling them, as it did, to spread their infamous trade far and wide. When it was believed a large quantity of arms were ready, the ringleaders, who misled the lower orders, urged them on until some unsuccessful project was attempted, and though, of course, he apprehended no danger to the Imperial authority from such miserable attempts—the day had gone by when they could be regarded otherwise than as ridiculous—yet they were sufficient to bring the most wretched classes of the people into conflict with the law. Then it became necessary to ask for fresh Coercion Acts. Then special Commissions had to be appointed. Witnesses had to be brought up, the sympathy of the common people was evoked, jurymen were unwilling or unable to return verdicts, and if convictions did take place sentences had to be pronounced, political prisoners had to be dealt with severely. And so there re-appeared once more the dreary procession which had so often crossed the stage of Irish History—crime and outrage—prosecution and punishment—exceptional legislation and smouldering vengeance against the English Government. Was it not, under these circumstances, he would appeal to his hon. Friends opposite, better to take things in time and to remove from the people of Ireland temptations to which it had been shown on more than one occasion they were unhappily so open, by not giving them the opportunity of readily obtaining arms until the miserable attempts at mischievous conspiracy to which he was referring had been finally extinguished? He now came to the next ground on which the proposed legislation of the Government was founded. There were, unfortunately, in Ireland sectarian differences and jealousies which had prevailed for a long time. He rejoiced—and he was sure that hon. Gentlemen opposite would give him credit for sincerity—in the belief that these conflicts were fast dying out. They were, however, not dead, for they had heard the hon. Member for Belfast describe the riots which took place in that city two years ago, and which would have disgraced the capital of a barbarous country. Those riots took place in 1873. One policeman was killed, 73 were injured, 170 other persons were also injured, and 37 of them so seriously that they had to be taken to the hospital; 883 families had been compelled to leave their homes, and 247 houses were injured and wrecked. All that occurred only two years and a-half ago, and clearly showed, he maintained, the existence in the district in question of a state of feeling which was exceptional. Orangemen and Home Rulers went out and came in conflict with one another, and their first object was to prepare for the meeting by obtaining firearms to let off in the air, if they made no other use of them. Did it not appear inevitable, he would ask, that scenes of bloodshed and violence would again occur if the unrestricted use of arms were to be all at once permitted, or could it be called oppression to keep arms out of the hands of such people? Was it not, on the contrary, a merciful law which placed obstacles in the way of a return to all their worst traditions? He, for one, appealed to the House with confidence to give the Government of Ireland the power—he hoped it would be needed only for a very few years—to keep out of the hands of such men arms which they would be likely to use only for the purposes of mischief. Then came agrarian crimes, and he heartily rejoiced to have observed that there had been a wonderful decrease in that class of offences since the passing of the Act of 1870. He wished to call the attention of the House to some figures. In 1870 there were no fewer than 1,329 outrages of an agrarian kind reported in Ireland. The Act of 1870 then came into force, and the Government prosecuted in every part of the country the most vigorous search for arms, which resulted in a large quantity of dangerous weapons being taken from the most disloyal and criminal classes. That was the first effect, and what followed? The House would hardly believe that in one twelvemonth the number of agrarian outrages fell from 1,329 to 373. Last year they amounted only to 213. Still, he put it to the House whether, in the face of the exceptional crime yet in existence, they would be justified in giving up the more limited provisions of that Bill, which they hoped would be enough to prevent the relapse of the country into that fearful state which brought down upon it that stringent code to which he had referred from a Government whose watchword was to consider to the utmost possible extent the feelings and even the prejudices of the Irish people. It was only fair and right that the House should have full information on all these points. For himself, he could truly say that a more painful task he had never performed than that of recommending any exceptional and repressive legislation for his country. But it was useless shutting their eyes to the facts, and if there existed elements of danger, and they had the means of preventing that danger, even though those means involved exceptional legislation, to say that they would not avail themselves of them because, as Irishmen, they felt it to be an insult to their manhood to do so, was, if that language was seriously intended, very childish sentiment. But let them look a little further back than 1870, because the peculiarity of that class of crime in Ireland was that it suddenly subsided and, unfortunately, as suddenly increased again. The agrarian offences, which in 1870 culminated in 1,329, two years before that were only 160, or fewer than the number last year; and in 1866 they were half as many as in 1874. Therefore, in a country where the people were so excitable, so sensitive to the influences he had described, it was impossible to count upon the experience of a single year. They had still to deal with the same generation of Irishmen who in

1866 were so peaceable, who in 1870 were roused into a fearful state of agrarian disorder, and who were now settling down again, he would fain hope, into a lasting condition of order and tranquillity. They had to deal with the same generation of men who in those years sympathized to some extent with those offences—who were then, and still were, reluctant witnesses and reluctant jurymen, and who then sheltered, and still sheltered, the felon who was flying from the punishment of the law. The subject had been so thoroughly exhausted that he would not refer to some other topics to which he had hoped to call the attention of the House; and he would only say this, that the Executive Government had taken every pains in its power to inform itself fully on the subject, not partially or in any partizan sense, not with any desire to press Coercion Bills upon the country, but with the most earnest longing to be enabled, as soon as possible, to return to an absolutely unexceptional state of legislation in Ireland; and they had come to the conclusion, with great satisfaction, that they might safely try the experiment of abandoning the most coercive parts of those Acts and the clauses most inconvenient to the law-abiding subjects of the Queen. On the other hand, they had come with equal certainty, though not with equal satisfaction, to the conclusion that they would be failing in their duty to the Empire, and also to his own countrymen, if, to catch any breeze of passing popularity or from any sentimental feeling they were suddenly to relax provisions which had been found to work so usefully, and which they believed must still be used for the purpose of preventing the recurrence of those terrible events that but a few years ago disgraced Ireland and unhinged society in that country. He did not complain of the spirit in which they had generally been met by hon. Gentlemen opposite. He knew that their position upon this subject was a difficult one; but he must take this opportunity of thanking the hon. Member for Roscommon (the O'Connor Don) for the truly patriotic way in which he spoke upon this measure. He would venture to urge further the advice which that hon. Member gave to other hon. Members for Ireland who sat around him, praying them to represent this measure candidly and fairly to those over whom they had such influence, and he would say such just influence. He saw opposite to him many of his Friends who had the glorious gifts of the brilliant pen and the eloquent tongue, and who had acquired great power among their countrymen. He appealed to them, now that that measure was to become law, to give the Government at least credit for the effort they had made in the direction of restoring to Ireland a state of things that was not exceptional, and not to exasperate the feelings of the people against those clauses which they were obliged to retain. At least he could honestly say for himself, and he believed also for every Member of the House who would vote for the second reading of the Bill, that they regarded its necessity with as much regret and as great pain as any hon. Gentleman who would go into the lobby against it.

Mr. BUTT said, the impression that had been left upon his mind by the speech of the hon. and learned Member was to deepen the conviction which he entertained, that the real question for the House to consider was whether they were to persevere perpetually in a system of coercion for Ireland, or whether they were, once and for all, to make a stand and say it should be continued no longer. Every argument that had been used in advocating that as a measure of precaution, founded on the peculiar circumstances of Ireland, on the antagonism of creeds or races, on the divisions between classes of society, would be just as available five years hence as they were that day. There were many clauses of the Bill which might be better dealt with in Committee; and he would therefore speak upon what he believed to be the real question before the House—namely, whether Parliament was prepared to deal with crime in Ireland by the principles of British law and the British Constitution; by a firm but impartial administration of the Common Law, or by making coercion a chronic and permanent instrument. The Bill dealt with three perfectly distinct classes of enactments—with what were called the Peace Preservation Acts, with the Acts for the Protection of Life and Property in certain Parts of Ireland, and also with the Act against Societies administering Unlawful Oaths. The Westmeath Act nobody would abstractedly defend. It gave to the Lord Lieutenant power to imprison at his discretion and without trial any man he pleased, and also to the police power to arrest any man who was out of his house after dark. It was idle to say that Act had not been abused. When they came to discuss the Westmeath Act—a separate part of the Bill—that would be the proper time to adduce proofs of how the power of arresting men out after sunset had been exercised. The Arms Act—first passed under the name of the Crime and Outrage Act—took its origin in 1847, and was brought in for two years, and until the end of the next Session of Parliament. It was renewed in 1850, 1852, 1854, 1855, 1856, 1858, 1860, 1862, 1865, 1867, 1868, 1869, 1870, and 1871, when it was continued by another Act until now; and in all these renewals no Government had yet asked the House to renew the Act for the period of five years which was now proposed. He asked if any Member of the House really believed that there was any greater chance of the Act being allowed to drop at the end of those five years than there had been at any period of its existence? The Act gave the Lord Lieutenant power to disarm the whole people. This might be right; but it gave also to the police the right of domiciliary visit at any hour of the day or night, and the absolute power of searching a man's person. Was a provision of this kind not inconsistent with any constitutional or rational liberty? By the Act as it was passed in 1856—and, indeed, by the original Act—it was provided that the search for arms must be made between sunrise and sunset; but this restriction was afterwards removed, and under the Bill at present before the House the search might be made at any hour whatever. The Lord Lieutenant issued a warrant, but it was not addressed to any particular person. It was directed to the inspector of police—not by name—and to every subordinate constable in the county, and the effect of this was that an ordinary constable had the power in every proclaimed district—and there were 31 counties proclaimed—to enter the house of any man and search for arms, without any special warrant or any information to search for arms, without even the sanction of a magistrate or even any superior officer of his to control him. This monstrous power of domiciliary visit was to be preserved. But it must not be imagined that the powers given by this Act were used only for the purpose of discovering arms. He had been engaged not long ago in an action brought against a clergyman on account of a malicious prosecution, and the disclosures in that case would serve to illustrate the uses to which the Act was put. There had been a dispute about pews, and tar had been placed on them; and, for the purpose of getting evidence on the subject, the sub-inspector of police—a friend of the clergyman—had caused a search to be made by four policemen in a number of houses, under the powers of this very Act, in order to find garments marked with tar. The sub-inspector was examined at the trial and acknowledged that this had occurred, apparently without the slightest consciousness that he had done anything wrong. What guarantee was there, under these circumstances, that the powers given by the Act would be used only for the purpose which the Legislature had had in view? But, even if its legitimate object was observed, was it necessary that in every county in Ireland which the Lord Lieutenant chose to proclaim there should be vested in the police an absolute right of domiciliary visit at any hour of the day or night? This was an Act which placed the whole of the country under disability, in order that some people might be prevented from committing crime. It pressed upon the innocent just as much as upon the guilty. It was all very well to say that it would be temperately administered by the Lord Lieutenant; but it so happened that it was in the police the real power resided. And could it be said that it was temperately administered at present, when it was in force in no less than 31 counties, in some, at all events, of which there was not the slightest pretence of excuse for retaining it? What was the next provision of the Bill? The Lord Lieutenant's provision was to prevent persons carrying arms; and if it stopped there, there might be a great deal to be said for it; but it did not stop at preventing persons from carrying arms outside their houses. There was issued a notice calling upon them to come in and deposit their arms, and if they did not do so their houses might be searched; and, moreover, any policeman might go and search any person on the road to see whether he was concealing any arms about him. Was that freedom? He contended that the Common Law of England did not at all need to be supplemented in Ireland by such odious, he would not say atrocious, provisions as those under which that right of domiciliary visit was exercised. The Chief Secretary for Ireland had quoted a speech of his (Mr. Butt's) delivered 20 years ago, in which he expressed his opinion that some restriction should be put on the possession of arms; but was the right of domiciliary visits and the searching of the person necessary to carry out such restriction? He was very proud of having so diligent a student of his speeches as the right hon. Gentleman. It was not the first time the right hon. Gentleman had quoted them. He hoped the study would be continued, and that it would extend beyond the speeches of his early days to those of later years. It was true he had said there ought to be some restriction on the possession of arms; but did it follow that there ought to be such provisions as those of which he was now complaining? The question really was whether they would try to deal with the evils which he admitted existed in Ireland, by means of a vigorous administration of the powers of the Common Law? English Members had said that England was a country in which such coercive legislation was not needed; but the fact was that England had gone through the same or worse experiences. And how had England been dealt with under those circumstances? How were such crises got over in England? Not by coercion, but by enfranchisement. Not long ago a speech was delivered by the Prime Minister in which the proud boast was made that the English artisan's home was freer and more safe from intrusion than the castles of noblemen in other lands, and in which a reference was made to the effectual operation of constitutional principles at a time when the proclamation of a Republic among a neighbouring people seemed the signal for sedition throughout the whole of this country. In only one instance had an Arms Act been passed for England, and that was in the year 1819. And what was the nature of that Act? It enabled two justices to issue their warrant for the search of any house for arms in certain specified districts upon receiving information that arms were concealed in it for seditious and treasonable purposes. Under that Act, however, the individual whose house was searched had an appeal to the Court of Quarter Sessions, and the Act itself was only in force for two years. When that Act was passed by the House of Lords, a Protest against it was signed by several of the Peers. He had heard it stated that British subjects had no right to carry arms; but he had a distinct recollection that it was declared by the Bill of Rights that it was the inalienable right of every Englishman to carry arms, and he had a not very indistinct recollection that under the Act of Settlement, by virtue of which Her Majesty held her Throne, that right to carry arms was also recognized. The Protest of the Lords against the English Arms Act, after referring to the Bill of Rights in proof of the right of all British subjects to carry arms, went on to show that the effect of such a law in Ireland had merely been to irritate the people and to provoke revenge owing to the abuses which had occurred under it. That Protest was signed by Lord Grey, Lord Erskine, Lord Holland, Lord Fitzwilliam, and the Duke of Sussex. What would those noble Lords have said if in place of the very moderate measure which they protested against they had had to deal with a Bill like the present? But what was the condition of England at the time those noble Lords were protesting against the passing of the Act—was there then no excuse for asking Parliament to pass it? At the time the Cato Street conspirators were brought to trial and executed for conspiring to surprise the Bank of England and to carry out other treasonable practices this Act was in force; but so strong was the feeling of Englishmen against its principle that it was not put into force. That was the one solitary Arms Act for England. The Habeas Corpus Act had been suspended, and the spy system had been enforced, but the way in which a better state of things was brought about was by passing measures which had the effect of tranquillizing the people. The Prince Regent was fired at in coming to open Parliament, and a Message was sent to the House, and a Secret Committee was appointed, which reported that all the Northern parts of England were in a state of sedition, and that a conspiracy had been formed to divide the land of the landowners amongst the people. There were depôts of arms in different parts of the country. Measures had to be taken to have the cannon in the hands of merchants spiked lest they should be turned against the Government. Were there not men now living who recollected that William IV. dared not go to the City to dine with the Lord Mayor because of the conspiracy that existed to shoot him on the way? But in that state of things in England, did Parliament give the King himself the powers which were given to the Viceroy now with respect to Ireland? The Habeas Corpus Act was suspended, but the Reform Bill was the first thing that brought peace; the household franchise was what completed the work of conciliation, and gave contentment to the English people. There had been nothing in Ireland to equal the discontent which prevailed in England in 1819, and yet with respect to England no such measures were attempted as those which were in force with respect to Ireland. Try, then, for Ireland under less difficult circumstances what you tried for England. Act upon the principle of Burke—that if concessions had not produced peace more must be given. Give the people of Ireland the rights of the British Constitution, and let the star of liberty shine for once over Ireland, and he ventured to say that peace and prosperity would follow in its train. He would appeal to English Members to say whether the Irish Members of that House were unreasonable in objecting to the passing of this measure. He unhesitatingly joined in giving credit to the right hon. Baronet the Chief Secretary for endeavouring in some degree to relax the rigours of these statutes under the present Bill; but, at the same time, he scarcely thought the right hon. Gentleman would have ventured to propose an extension of those statutes in all their harshness. But did the present measure bring them any nearer to getting rid of this class of legislation? The fact was that this Bill proposed to re-enact laws which were far more harsh than that of 1869. He asked the House not to judge of the effect of those measures by the speech of the right hon. Baronet, but by the terms of those measures themselves. The right hon. Baronet had by his speech almost persuaded him that the times of coercion had come to an end;

but when he came to look at the terms of the statutes about to be continued, he found that although "the voice was the voice of Jacob the hand was the hand of Esau," and that there was a very stern reality in the very rough hands of Esau—as discovered by these Acts. Were they prepared to re-enact or to destroy the law and the Constitution, which were sufficient to meet every case that might arise? The worst of these Coercion Acts was that the Government knew they could at any time resort to them; that they taught the Government to put the Common Law in abeyance, to gain a false popularity by being remiss in the execution of the law, and then to make up for their own weakness by a Coercion Act. Let him read to the House an extract from the late Lord Brougham's Political Philosophy. He said—

"There is no more powerful argument against ever granting exceptional powers than the tendency of such grants to be perpetuated, and the tendency of the powers themselves to become part of the Constitution. The people become accustomed to them, the rulers become fond of them, and believe that the affairs of the State cannot be administered without them."

So said Lord Brougham, and an illustration of the truth of what he said was supplied in the successive renewals of this Act. It was time to make a stand against its further renewal, and to say boldly that there should not be a lease perpetually renewable of coercive legislation for Ireland. He had no particular distrust of the present Government; but he had heard with amazement the argument put forward that because they trusted a Government they were to give them any power they asked for. That was not the language of an Englishman; it was not the language of the English Constitution. It was based upon distrust and jealousy of the Executive Power. The question was, whether they were prepared to continue a system of coercion in Ireland? The Government acted upon the testimony of magistrates. The right hon. Baronet had heard of outrages. Might he venture to ask his attention to a despatch of one of his Predecessors in the office of Chief Secretary to the Military Commander at Limerick? The Chief Secretary in question said it frequently happened that disturbances existed only in a very small degree, and probably only partially, yet that the Civil Government were called upon, as if there were a general rising, to call out the Militia to repel disturbances represented as being more serious than the occasion warranted; that letter after letter was written to the Government on the subject, and that the result of inquiry generally was to show that the outrage was by no means of the extent complained of. The obvious remedy, it was added, was that the representations should be upon oath. The writer of that despatch was Arthur Wellesley, and it referred to outrages greater than those which, on the reports of policemen, had frightened the Chief Secretary from his propriety. As he had said, he would not then discuss the provisions of the Bill, many of which were very objectionable. He would content himself with calling attention to one—namely, the power of entering a house for the purpose of searching for handwriting to compare with a threatening letter. He did not wish to at all lessen the guilt of writing threatening letters. It might constitute a greater or a lesser crime, and he believed he had himself received as many as had ever been addressed to any magistrate in any county of Ireland, but he had paid no attention to them. What did the Bill do? It gave power to any magistrate, upon information that any person was suspected of having written a threatening letter, to issue a warrant under which a common policeman could enter the suspected man's house, break open all his drawers and desks, examine all his private documents, and carry off such of them as he thought fit. But everyone acquainted with Courts of Justice knew that of all evidence liable to mistrust, it was that of experts founded upon a comparison of handwriting; and yet with the hope of obtaining such evidence, an outrage was to be committed upon every principle of law. One case had occurred in which, upon a warrant of two magistrates, a man's house was entered and his daughter's desk broken open by a policeman, and letters carried off which were read and discussed in the police barracks. He would not mention the young lady's name, as he did not know whether she was yet married, and as the letters were of a tender nature and had been written to her by a young gentleman. It turned out that the proceeding was dictated by personal spite; an action was brought against the magistrates, and damages to the extent of £500 were recovered.

He endeavoured to find out last year how the fact was; but, though he failed to do so, he had every reason to believe that the costs and damages were paid at Dublin Castle. Let English gentlemen make the case their own. Would they tolerate their houses being entered, the desks of their daughters to be broken open, and their letters to become the subject of the jeers of policemen? Why, then, should they be parties to the granting of such powers in respect of Ireland? Was this system of coercion to be stopped? It was not a system to punish crime, or to make the detection of guilt easy. Could not Her Majesty's Government keep the peace without disarming a whole nation? Could they not do so without giving to policemen the power of making domiciliary visits, and of breaking open private desks? Was that really the power of the British Government? Oh, but he had heard yesterday that four men had done all the mischief in Meath, and that British law could not cope with those four men unless power was given to arrest every man who was abroad after dark. Why, this was a mere burlesque upon government. Let them retrace their steps. Let them try the power of the ordinary law, the power of making Irishmen content with the law. The difficulty was that, under the present system, the inferior classes in Ireland regarded the law as their enemy. Coercion embittered them against the law, and led to well-founded discontent. Murat tried such means of putting down brigandage in the Neapolitan States, and brigandage existed there to this day. If they did not try the effect of the law according to the British Constitution, they would brand their whole system of government in Ireland with itself contributing to a conspiracy of the few against the many, and provoke and almost justify a conspiracy of the many against the few. He had always, whenever he had the opportunity, impressed upon the people that their best redress and protection was not to resort to violence, but to the laws of England. They were now thwarting him. They talked of men who aroused the passions of the people; but the Government of England put weapons in those men's hands. The next time he met his countrymen and told them to look to that House for redress, in many a heart there would arise the sad and bitter response—"We remember your appeal to that House, and the Coercion Act which, by English votes, it adopted."

MR. DISRAELI: Sir, this is a measure of necessity framed in a spirit of conciliation. [Major O'GORMAN: No, no!] If that is to be taken for a reply, I must say that according to the Orders of the House the hon. and gallant Gentleman will not be able to take any further part in this debate.

MAJOR O'GORMAN: I beg to say I have not spoken one word.

MR. DISRAELI: I repeat what I said before, and what I am prepared to prove, that the measure which we now ask you to read a second time is a measure of necessity, framed in a spirit of conciliation. It is a measure to preserve peace, and therefore is unjustly represented by its opponents as a measure to create coercion. "What is in a name?" I think a moral may be drawn on that question in this night's debate, for it is only by representing this measure to preserve peace as one to create and enforce coercion that the arguments of hon. Gentlemen opposite have found any substance or foundation. Now, Sir, I would remark, in the first place, in considering this Bill, that when it was first introduced some Sessions ago it contained many clauses which were principal subjects of invective and opposing arguments by those who now maintain similar opinions with regard to this Bill, and yet all these clauses have been omitted. The chief points which were brought under the consideration of the House, and which were held up to its indignation as violations of the liberty of the subject, and as proposals contrary to the traditional freedom of this country, find no place in the Bill now under consideration. These points were: Restrictions on a free Press, the establishment of what was then described and denounced as Curfew; and the power given to magistrates of summarily closing houses. These are the three things which in former discussions were particularly inveighed against as violations of the liberties and rights of Her Majesty's subjects. None of those matters are treated of in this Bill; and yet only by a side-wind have hon. Gentlemen opposite during this discussion of two nights had the candour to admit that those main features of odium, according to their view of the case, are entirely omitted from this Bill. Well, then, there are no doubt points which we think it our duty to insist on, and which I trust this House, by a commanding majority, will prove that we have not been mistaken in recommending to the House. The points which we insist on are—restrictions on the possession of arms. When the hon. and learned Gentleman who has just addressed the House, and worked much on that subject, touched on the clauses of the Bill, he omitted to remember that the restrictions on arms were much modified in this Bill, as compared with past Bills. The hon. and learned Gentleman has said much upon domiciliary visits, and that any policeman at his own pleasure could make a domiciliary visit to seize arms. It never was in the power of a policeman, at his own pleasure, to make a domiciliary visit. I believe such a power was not given in any one of the Acts to which the hon. and learned Gentleman has referred, and certainly it is not given in the Bill before the House. In former days—indeed, I believe within the last two or three years—there were general warrants entrusted to the police for a term of three months, which they might use. I will not say that was an abuse. It might have been at the time a necessary arrangement by our Predecessors, but it is one which we have terminated, and there are only two places in Ireland where a general power of that kind prevails.

MR. BUTT: The warrant remains exactly as before. It is a general warrant directed to every sub-constable, and this Act authorizes him to execute it whenever he thinks fit.

MR. DISRAELI: If a constable makes a search for arms he is obliged to apply for a warrant to the Government.

MR. BUTT: No, no. The right hon. Gentleman will pardon me if I state what the fact is. A general warrant is one directed to a county inspector or to a sub-constable of the county, and this Bill expressly authorizes any warrant so directed to be executed at any hour of the day or night.

MR. DISRAELI: My right hon. Friend the Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant remarks that formerly it was so, but that as a matter of administration it is not the practice. ["Oh!"] It is not likely I should make that statement if I did not believe it to be true. [Major O'GORMAN: I am perfectly sure of that.] It is fortunate that this House is used to every combination of human nature. Well, then, the hon. and learned Gentleman said, "What is the prospect for Ireland if you are to proceed with this sort of legislation? It is very true you may modify and mitigate your Bills; it is very true you have omitted some odious clauses, but the result is coercion, it has always been coercion; and what security have we that again in five years we shall not have a new Bill similar to this?" The hon. and learned Gentleman continued—"This is not the way you have dealt with England. England was just as disturbed as Ireland; there was as much sedition in England at the earlier part of this century—and, indeed, for the first quarter of this century—as in Ireland, and yet you have not carried any Coercion Bills for England. You carried no Coercion Bills to meet the Corresponding Society or any of the seditious combinations." But does the hon. and learned Gentleman mean to say that the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act, which was then, unfortunately, too frequently resorted to, was not an act of coercion? The hon. and learned Gentleman particularly alludes to the year of 1819—when he says the state of England was more dangerous and more menacing than that of Ireland—when there was as much sedition, as many secret societies, and as much danger to the State impending, and yet we did not have recourse to a policy of restriction and coercion. What does he say about the six Acts which were introduced by Lord Sidmouth and Lord Castlereagh? Look at the names of those Acts. The first of those Acts passed for England was an Act against the training of people to the use of arms—that was an Act of restriction. The second Act authorized justices of the peace to seize arms that might be used for purposes dangerous to the public peace; what does the hon. and learned Gentleman say to that? The third was an Act to prevent seditious meetings and assemblies. The fourth was an Act against blasphemous and seditious publications. The fifth was an Act containing severe restrictions against the Press. And the sixth was an Act to prevent delay in the administration of justice in the cases of certain misdemeanours. Certainly no coercive legislation for Ireland has exceeded the scheme which was devised and carried into execution by these celebrated and odious Acts. And that is an answer to the hon. and learned Gentleman's argument about the hopelessness of this system of legislation and the folly of supposing that Ireland will ever be tranquil; because, if the state of England was then the same as the state of Ireland now—if that state was altered and checked by coercive legislation—why should not Ireland, in due season, be as tranquil, as prosperous, and as contented as England without the unhappy influence of exceptional legislation? Mr. Speaker, there is one point to which the hon. and learned Gentleman adverted with regard to myself, on which, with the permission of the House, I will say a few words. It is always disagreeable to enter into personal explanations; but I hope the House will allow that I rarely trespass on them in this way. The hon. and learned Gentleman quoted a passage from a speech which I made not in this House, but which at the time attracted some public notice. I said then, as I say now, that the working classes of England inherit personal privileges which the nobility of other nations do not enjoy. That is my opinion. By that opinion I stand; and I shall always be prepared, when an opportunity offers, to prove it. Well, a stupid, some think a malignant interpretation was given to those words, and a ridiculous story went about that in consequence of using those words a representation was made to Her Majesty's Government, and that I made an apology to a Minister who believed that he was referred to. I have never gone out of my way to contradict this story; but I think that as an hon. Gentleman has talked to-night about Her Majesty's Government truckling to Prince Bismarck, the House will, perhaps, allow me to make one remark. There is not the slightest truth of any kind in the statement that was made that any allusion or remonstrance—direct or indirect, public or private, by male or female—was ever made to me, or to any Member of Her Majesty's Government, upon that subject. When the erroneous charge was made that I had alluded to the conduct of Prince Bismarck—of whom I was thinking then as little as I was thinking of Rory O'More—I thought it idle to answer the remarks in the newspapers, for I never grudge them their sport with public men; but when, after a few days had passed, I found that one or two journals were gravely announcing that the peace of Europe was endangered by such remarks, I thought the matter had become ridiculously grave, and I asked a friend of mine to put in a paragraph in the papers, for which I have never been even thanked either by Prince Bismarck or by anybody else. While I make these remarks on the observations of the hon. and learned Gentleman with regard to the first point in our Bill upon which we felt it our duty to insist—namely, the restrictions on the use and the possession of arms—I may say that both in this Bill and in the practice of the Administration great modifications have been introduced and arrangements which tend, in my opinion, to produce very beneficial results; such as the inquiry by an officer who fulfils the duties of a coroner in England after a murder, or the tax upon a district in which an outrage or murder has been committed. I heard with regret the hon. Member for Roscommon (the O'Connor Don), who, upon all subjects connected with his country, addresses us with an authority which is most due to him, criticize this proposal not entirely with the excellent sense which usually distinguishes his remarks. However, whether the hon. Gentleman be right or wrong, that is clearly a question which we must discuss in detail in Committee when the proper time arrives. But I must, upon the second reading of the Bill, protest against an arrangement of this kind being treated as one of an exceptional character, and differing in every respect from the general spirit of our administration for the United Kingdom. Surely, one of the most ancient customs of the country—a custom introduced into our ancient common law—is the redress which an injured inhabitant of a hundred has upon those who dwell in the same district. This is merely an application of the same principle, founded, as I think, upon justice and convenience; and therefore I trust the House will not consent to its being repealed. The other points we have insisted upon are with regard to the taking of unlawful oaths and the sending of threatening letters.

These are the points on which we have insisted in this Bill, which I maintain is to preserve peace, but which is described as a measure to inflict coercion. Who could be injured—who ever has been injured—by any of the arrangements contained in these clauses? Who are the persons who send threatening letters in Ireland? Many of those letters are of a most mischievous and disastrous character, and are often characterized by a bloody truth which a very short time after a letter has been received is confirmed by the fact of assassination. Who is in favour of extending mercy toward such men, or who can be opposed to legislation against such practices? It is idle to tell us a story about the apprentice of a butcher or somebody who sent a threatening letter to his master, in order to get his wages increased. Of course, in such a case there is no question of human life; and there is no proposal which could not be made to appear ridiculous if it were illustrated by some extreme case of that kind. But we who know the state of Ireland—the House of Commons—who know that Ireland has suffered from the tyranny of threatening letters, will not be misled, I am sure, by remarks of that sort. These, then, are the points upon which we ask the House to support us in carrying this Bill. We do not attempt—we do not ask you, we do not wish you to interfere with the freedom of the Press. We do not ask you to re-establish the Curfew which some years ago you denounced with so much eloquence. We do not ask you to give to magistrates the power of summarily closing public-houses? But we do ask you to agree to restrictions upon arms, much milder than those which were proposed and carried by our Predecessors—restrictions which more or less prevail in almost every country, and which, as all agree, have been exercised in Ireland, whatever party has filled the counsels of Her Majesty, with temperateness and moderation. We ask you at the same time to assist us in preventing the taking of unlawful oaths and the transmission of threatening letters. We ask you again, what possible injury such legislation can inflict on any innocent being? and to remember what support, encouragement, and spirit it must give to the loyal subjects of Her Majesty. And now I come to the graver part of this matter, as treated by the hon. and learned Gentleman—namely, the consideration of the Westmeath Act. That has been viewed in a very different manner by the various speakers who have addressed us from the other side of the House below the gangway. Hon. Members ought to be tolerably fresh in their recollections with regard to the origin of the present Westmeath Act. It is not a long period ago, though it was in another Parliament, that the foundation of this Act was laid. It is well, however, that the House of Commons should recollect the circumstances which attended its introduction and its passing. The state of Ireland in the county of Westmeath, and in some contiguous districts, was such as to create a considerable impression upon public opinion in this country. Crimes which had rarely been equalled in the most terrible period of agrarian outrage were frequent. Members came down to this House day after day to hear from authority that some outrage, some act of violence, had been committed, which seemed to show that that part of the country was in a state almost of dissolving civilization. What, then, was the course pursued? The Minister for Ireland at that time was the noble Lord who at present is Leader of the Opposition; and in a speech which I well remember—and of which I will say, even in his presence, that it was an admirable speech, both from its command of the facts which the House required and from the dignified and moderate tone in which his policy was recommended, though it was one of the most energetic character—the noble Lord proposed that a secret Committee should be appointed to inquire into the state of the disturbed districts. For myself, sitting on the bench opposite to the one I now fill, I did not approve a secret Committee, because the facts were so patent, all that was occurring was so well known, the remedies required were so urgent, that I thought a Government—and a powerful Government, such as the Government of the day was—ought to have acted on its own responsibility, and introduced a Bill into the House. I mention these circumstances, not because I expect the House to agree with my opinion, but to show the animus with which I, at the request of the noble Lord, became a Member of the Committee. The Committee sat, and the noble Lord was our Chairman. I know not whether all the evidence which came before us was printed. If I remember rightly, some of the documentary evidence was not made known. The Committee was powerful from the influence and ability of its Members, consisting, as it did, of men who represented all the great parties in the House and possessed their confidence; and, upon the evidence produced, we arrived at the unanimous conclusion that the measures which the noble Lord afterwards introduced, and which have been so frequently adverted to in the course of this debate, the greater part of them—the whole of them I may say—being still the law, should be adopted. Accordingly, they passed through the House of Commons unanimously. This legislation, then, with respect to the county of Westmeath, and the general policy then adopted for suppressing agrarian outrages there, was not merely the policy of a Minister, but was the policy of the House of Commons. All parties, represented by their chief men, were persuaded, on the grounds brought forward by a Minister well entitled to the confidence of the country, that there was in Westmeath and in the adjoining districts a dark conspiracy and sanguine confederation which had more or less existed for a century. We knew, before those discussions were finished, before those investigations terminated, who the very assassins were who were hired. We knew, I may say, who was the king of the assassins, the individual who exercised an irresistible power in that county over a panic-stricken people. Well, then, I say that policy was adopted by the House of Commons. It was their own policy, founded on the proposition of a secret Committee—at least a Committee of great reserve, because we sat with closed doors. The House of Commons was persuaded of the facts I have stated. They were not the transient incidents of a Session or a year. The evidence before us was that this was an ancient institution of murder, spoliation, and anarchy; and we knew we were dealing with that which the greatest energy and the greatest wisdom could not tame or subdue in the course of a few years. I say, then, it is idle for the hon. and learned Gentleman, and for other Members who have spoken in the same spirit, to pretend that we have no evidence to justify us in again bringing forward and continuing what is called the Westmeath Act. The Westmeath Act must be continued from the conviction of the House of Commons of its necessity—a conviction founded upon the information obtained by the Committee, and from the deliberate, mature, and defined opinion of Parliament generally that this system of outrage must be put down. Well, Sir, I am surprised, remembering those days, remembering the deep interest in that Committee, remembering that when the House met every Member of the Committee was surrounded by his friends and companions who wished to obtain some information of the startling and terrible revelations that we had heard, remembering all that, was it not astounding—for it was only five years ago that that occurred—to hear hon. Gentlemen opposite—men, too, filling the great position of county Members, deeply and intimately connected with that part of the country, getting up in their places doubting, and more than doubting, the existence of the conspiracy; for one hon. Member told us he believed Ribbonism did not exist at all, and that there was nothing like a system of terrorism in Ireland—that the whole thing was an invention, or something to that effect. I think that was astounding. There was once a Member of this House, one of its greatest ornaments, who sat opposite this box, or an identical one, and, indeed, occupied the place which I now unworthily fill. That was Mr. Canning. In his time, besides the discovery of a new world, dry champagne was invented. Hearing everybody talk of dry champagne, Mr. Canning had a great desire to taste it, and Charles Ellis, afterwards Lord Seaford, got up a little dinner for him, care, of course, being taken that there should be some dry champagne. Mr. Canning took a glass, and, after drinking it, and thinking for a moment, exclaimed—"The man who says he likes dry champagne will say anything." Now, I do not want to enter into rude controversy with any of my hon. Friends opposite who doubt the existence of Ribbonism; but this I will say, that the man who maintains that Ribbonism does not exist is a man who—ought to drink dry champagne. Having touched upon a few points in this debate, and gathered some few ears in a well-threshed field, I wish the House, before it votes, clearly to understand the issue before us. Hon. Gentlemen opposite can hardly suppose that it is very agreeable to our feelings to introduce Bills which they look upon as Coercion Bills. It is not agreeable nor is it flattering to the people of England that there should be a necessity for such Bills now in the Government of Ireland. If we declined to continue this legislation, for which, as Ministers, we are not responsible, I dare say that the Session would be calmer; and though I cannot doubt that, even if there were no Coercion Bills, the fervid imagination of Irish Gentlemen would not fail in introducing a sufficient number of agreeable grievances to relieve the dulness of our Parliamentary life, still I think they will acknowledge that had we not brought forward this measure our business would have been easier, at least for the Session. But hon. Gentlemen opposite argue as if it was the interest of an English Government to bring in Coercion Bills for Ireland. They argue as if the people of England were watching with eagerness the passing of this measure. On the contrary, they only, like us, regret the sad necessity for such proposals. But what in the present case I wish to impress upon hon. Gentlemen opposite is this—that we do watch these proposals with some satisfaction from the conviction that the spirit which animates them, instead of being a fierce and suspicious spirit, such as has often, I fear, in old days animated and inspired our legislation for Ireland, affords evidence of our desire to extend to that country the same friendship which we entertain for Her Majesty's subjects in England. But we cannot shrink from making proposals which we deem necessary for the preservation of order in Ireland. Hon. Gentlemen opposite can hardly hope that they can ultimately prevent this Bill being passed. They have given a fair opposition to it—I entirely acknowledge that. Nor do I myself for a moment wish that they should be debarred from an adequate opportunity of expressing their opinions. But if, when this measure is passed, they will in their counties assist us by conveying to the people there the assurance that these Acts are but a mitigated continuation of that unhappy policy which was inevitable under the circumstances; if they will impress upon their constituents the conviction—which when impressed upon them by their leaders they will entertain—that there is in the Parliament at Westminster, and in this House of Commons, a bond fide wish to act well with our Irish brother Representatives, and to assist them in all their proposals which we believe are really for the advantage of their country—that this legislation which we are now proposing, and which the great majority of both sides of this House say with us is inevitable, is a solemn, though sad, duty, which we have inherited, and which, filling these places, our duty to the Queen requires that we should bring forward—if they will look upon it in that light, and acknowledge the necessity for passing it, they will find, I am sure, on both sides of the House a true sympathy with their sincere efforts for the advancement of Ireland in those many measures of which they have given Notice, some of which affect the rights and some the material interests of their country. They will find, I say, in the Parliament of England a sympathizing body who will feel proud when they confess that a true experience of the House in which they sit has proved to them that it is capable of representing the United Kingdom.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH said, he would put the Bill down for Committee on the 5th of April, with the view of then fixing the day.

MR. BUTT hoped that it would not be taken for a few days after that date.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH said, the Committee would certainly be taken on that day.

Bill committed for Monday 5th April.

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (IRELAND)

BILL.—[BILL 41.]

(Mr. Ronayne, Mr. Butt, Mr. Bryan.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. BUTT, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, explained it was in the same form in which it left the Select Committee last Session, when it met with the approval of the Government. The object was to confer upon Municipal Corporations in Ireland some of the privileges possessed by the English Corporations.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Butt.)

MR. VANCE believed there had been an understanding that the second reading of the Bill would not be taken that night. The hour was late, and he moved that the debate be adjourned.

Motion made, and Question put, "That the Debate be now adjourned."—(Mr. Vance.)

The House divided:—Ayes 144; Noes 96: Majority 48.

ELEMENTARY EDUCATION PROVISIONAL ORDERS CONFIRMATION (CAISTER, &c.) BILL.—(Lords).—[BILL 88.]

(Viscount Sandon.)

Order for Third Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read the third time."—(Viscount Sandon.)

CAPTAIN NOLAN moved the adjournment of the House, in consequence of the course which the Government had taken with reference to the Bill of the hon. and learned Member for Limerick (Mr. Butt.)

MR. MELDON seconded the Motion, observing that the conduct of the Government merited the strongest condemnation.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House do now adjourn."—(Captain Nolan.)

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH said, he was prepared to state the views of the Government on the Municipal Corporations (Ireland) Bill if the adjournment of the debate had not been proposed and carried. He intended shortly after the Easter holidays to move a Resolution with respect to the Bill.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, the Government ought to have endeavoured to prevent the Motion for the adjournment of the debate being carried.

MR. VANCE said, he moved the adjournment of the debate because there was not time to discuss the measure.

MR. BUTT said, he hoped that the Motion for adjournment would not be pressed. At the same time, he fully thought that the Government would have accepted the Bill.

MR. DISRAELI said, that when the House met again, the Chief Secretary would make a statement which might possibly be satisfactory to the House.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read the third time, and passed.

ARMY—LANDGUARD FORT.

QUESTION.

MR. BENTINCK asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether the information laid by the Attorney General against the lord of the adjacent manor, for severing a new pipe which conveyed water to Landguard Fort, has been proceeded with successfully; and, if he can state to the House when the War Office hopes to supply that Fort with water, and when it will be occupied by troops?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY, in reply, said, that the case against the lord of the manor was now in the hands of the Attorney General, and quite out of his control. It was before the Court of Chancery. Meanwhile the fort was not yet finished, or occupied with troops; and of course, while this dispute was pending, no steps had been taken to supply the fort with water from any other source.

COUNTY COURTS BILL—LEGISLATION.

QUESTION.

SIR EARDLEY WILMOT asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If it is his intention to introduce, during the present Session, the County Courts Bill of last Session?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, it was the intention of the Lord Chancellor to introduce in the House of Lords, very shortly, a Bill which was substantially the same as that of last Session with respect to the subject referred to by the hon. Member.

“HANSARD'S DEBATES.”

QUESTION.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU asked the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether Mr. Thomas Hansard receives any annual subvention out of any of the Votes for the publication of the Debates, or whether a number of copies are paid for out of public money; and, if so, how many copies are paid for, what sum is paid for them, and out of what Vote is the payment made; also what is done with the copies so paid for?

MR. W. H. SMITH: No annual subvention is paid to Mr. Thomas Hansard out of the Votes for the purpose mentioned by the noble Lord; but the Stationery Office purchases 120 copies a-year, which are paid for out of the Vote for that Department, at the rate of £5 5s. a set. These copies are furnished to the various Public Offices and to the Colonies.

Afterwards the noble Lord placed the following Notice on the Notice Book:—

“On Civil Service Estimates, Vote 25, Stationery and Printing, to move to reduce the Vote by £630, the amount paid annually to Mr. T. Hansard for 120 copies of the Debates.”

ARMY—

ARTILLERY OFFICERS IN INDIA.

OBSERVATIONS.

COLONEL JERVIS, in rising to call attention to the position of British Officers ordered to proceed to India on Service, said, that about two and a-half years ago a Royal Warrant had been issued, by which captains of Artillery in command of batteries were promoted to the rank of major. It was distinctly stated at the time that this step was taken from motives of expediency, meaning, of course, that it was taken, not for the personal advantage of the officers, but in the interests of the Service. It was further ordered that they should receive pay equivalent to that of major of Infantry. To the surprise of the officers holding this position, however, when the Warrant was proclaimed in India, they were informed that while on the one hand they were to receive permission to hold the rank of major, they were only to receive the pay they had as captains. Frequent complaints had been made by them on the subject, and letters at various times had been addressed to the home authorities, but no answer whatever had been returned. He, therefore, wished to know who was responsible for seeing that British officers, ordered from this country to India, were duly protected in their rights and privileges? What he complained of had not occurred originally under the present Government. Since they had come into office the matter had been re-considered, and for the future these officers would find themselves in the position, and in the receipt of the pay to which they were entitled. He contended, however, that that concession was not sufficient, for there was a certain etiquette which prevailed in all the branches of a profession. A man who had become Q.C. would not like to be employed as a junior counsel, nor the Secretary of State to receive the salary of his chief clerk. It had been stated that these men were in the receipt of certain contract allowances; but the matter had never been gone into by the authorities at the War Office or at the India Office. It was true that there were certain allowances attached to the field batteries and Horse Artillery in India, by means of which they had to carry out a considerable expenditure for the Government. But it was idle for any one to pretend, with the careful supervision of expenditure which there was in India, that if these men were pocketing what they were bound to spend on the public service, it would not have been found out years ago, and that the matter would not have been taken out of their hands altogether. There were about 54 horse and field batteries in India, and 26 garrison batteries. The garrison batteries had got no contingent allowances of any description; the majors simply retained their pay as captains. He maintained that the remedy ought to be made retrospective in its action, and that from the day the Royal Warrant came out, and these men were gazetted, they were as fully entitled when quartered in India to the pay of their majorities as any men in this country. If that were not so, what security had officers who might be sent out to any part of the world that they would receive the pay of the rank which they held? He thought, moreover, that it would be well if the authority responsible for such matters were more clearly defined, inasmuch as at present these men did not know what their rights were, or to whom to apply for redress when their rights were invaded. They looked now to the Secretary of State for War for protection, and he trusted the right hon. Gentleman would submit to the Law Officers of the Crown the question, whether the men for whom he spoke were not entitled to their full pay from the day when they were gazetted? There was an idea in the War Office that the Secretary of State for India was a sort of Shah, whose orders must be carried out whether right or wrong. But he (Colonel Jervis) had always looked upon all Secretaries of State as equal, that they had simply to carry out their duties as Members of the same Government, and that the Government was responsible. He trusted that at length there would be an end to the differences which had existed for 18 years between the Government of India and the officers in that country, and which had caused an infinity of harm. Lord Salisbury, since he had come into office, had done his best to heal some very deep wounds; but what he (Colonel Jervis) wanted to know was this, what were the rules and regulations which applied to these officers, and who were the authorities to whom they were to look in this matter—the Commander-in-Chief at home, the Commander-in-Chief in India, the Secretary of State for India, or the Secretary of State for War?

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR said, that he most cordially supported the Motion of the hon. and gallant Member for Harwich and urged that it would be a wise course on the part of the Indian Government to do away with all these petty differences of which these officers complained. No doubt, a better system might have been adopted by the War Office than that of promoting all captains who commanded batteries to the rank of major, whereby India was at once exposed to liabilities for augmentations of pay equal to nearly 50 per cent of the amount then drawn, and entailing a considerable charge on the Indian finances; but he agreed with the hon. and gallant Gentleman who had just spoken, that having given increased rank to these officers, it was only wise and prudent to give in India the pay and allowances of that rank. But that change involved a very much larger question as to how far it was right in principle to make great changes in the organization of the Army whereby the finances of India were obliged to bear burdens which need never have been imposed, if India had been allowed to retain its own Army; but now that the change had been enforced, he trusted that the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War would see whether the change which had been made could not be carried out without the great additional expense now created. It was not by petty savings, such as the one under consideration, that we could effect any real economy in the expenditure of India, for if money was to be saved, the Government would have to adopt some sensible scheme of re-organization. For instance he would point out that we had now 28 very weak garrison companies of Artillery in India formed into four brigades, which burdened India with an inordinate number of superior officers. He thought that by a slight change in the Garrison Artillery formation, the right hon. Gentleman could do away with half of the garrison batteries by amalgamating the 28 batteries into 14, and then forming these into two brigades, and in that way relieve India from a vast expenditure. The important point to be borne in mind was, that whatever changes were deemed advisable in the organization of the Army, it was in every way most essential to prevent those changes from causing either officers or men to be dissatisfied.

COLONEL NORTH said, he agreed with some of the observations of the hon. and gallant Gentleman who had just sat down. He did not think anything was to be gained by withholding from officers the pay to which they were justly entitled. Such policy merely bred disaffection, and was productive of bad consequences, without contributing in any way to real economy.

MR. STEPHEN CAVE said, that this was a question which had been brought last year before the Committee of which he was Chairman. His hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Harwich (Colonel Jervis) would gather from what had fallen from the hon. and gallant General opposite (Sir George Balfour) that, a very much larger question than the pay of majors was involved. The hon. and gallant General had frequently brought the subject before the Committee, but it involved questions too wide to be discussed even then. In that Committee, however, this had been laid down very distinctly—namely, that we in this country ought not to trench on the finances of India without consultation with the Government of India itself. This case of Artillery majors was one which, as his hon. and gallant Friend probably knew, had been the subject of discussion between the War Office and the India Office, and the Secretary for War could not settle it by a stroke of the pen, as it was not a question of English pay, but of pay coming out of the Indian Exchequer. However much inclined they might be, the thing if done at all could only be done after consultation with the Government of India. It was impossible to say more at the present moment on the subject.

ARMY—ARTILLERY—THE WOOLWICH SYSTEM OF RIFLING.—QUESTIONS.

CAPTAIN G. E. PRICE said, he had given Notice of his intention to ask Questions of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War with reference to the manufacture of 81-ton guns and the application of the "Woolwich system" of rifling and projectiles to the 35-ton gun. He did not mean to enter into the scientific bearings of the question, but the system of rifling called the "Woolwich system," which was in reality French, had met with great opposition from very many able artilleryists. They were not satisfied that it was the right system. Experiments had been tried to test this in 1865 and 1866 with some large 7-inch guns, and as the result of experience it had been abandoned with all those guns which entered into the competition. But for all the larger guns, in which there was no competition whatever, this vicious system was retained. He therefore wished to know whether it was the intention of the Government to carry out the trials between the larger guns rifled on the present system. It was the fact that many of the larger guns had not proved at all satisfactory, and several of them had been returned as unserviceable. He wanted to know not only that the guns were to be rifled on a plan which was safe, but also that the shot fired from them should be made in such a manner that they would not break up in the gun. At present, the gunner never knew whether the inner tube of the gun would or would not crack, or whether the projectile would leave the gun in one piece or several. He begged to ask the Secretary of State for War, Whether it is proposed to manufacture any more 81-ton Guns; whether any 35-ton Gun had been tested to destruction, or what experiments of an exhaustive nature have been carried out with such a result as to satisfy the War Department with the application of the "Woolwich system" of rifling and projectiles to this size of Gun; whether the work done by the present 35-ton Gun is so superior to that done by the 25-ton Gun as to warrant the advisability of building still larger Guns on the same principle; and, whether the Ordnance Department are now prepared to supply the Naval Service with shell calculated to withstand with safety the battering charges of the 18-ton and heavier Guns? The subject was one of great importance, and he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would be able to give a satisfactory answer.

CAPTAIN NOLAN, in rising to call attention to the present exceptional position of the country as regarded the manufacture of muzzle-loading ordnance, a system abandoned by the Continental Powers of Europe, said, in his opinion, they had displayed extraordinary courage, or rather hardihood, in thus defying the general opinion of those Powers. As a financial question, it was a matter of some importance, for it was proposed that year to expend £200,000 in the manufacture of guns, and the estimate for projectiles was £100,000. A large sum would be spent on the carriages of those guns, and also in adapting the fortifications to them. The latter could no doubt be adapted for breech-loading guns; but if we changed the system, the former amounts, in a great degree, would have been wasted. It was 14 years since we commenced the manufacture of rifled cannon, and our fortresses were not yet entirely armed with rifled pieces. If, therefore, we introduced breech-loading instead of muzzle-loading guns, it would take 14 years to replace the present guns with new and more advanced pieces of ordnance; and, in the end, probably £4,000,000 or £5,000,000 would be found to have been thrown away. But apart from financial considerations, we should incur great danger should we go to war with inferior guns, and find ourselves at as great a disadvantage as the French were in relation to the Prussians in the late war. There was an immense preponderance of opinion against us on this subject. Russia had devoted herself entirely to the adoption of breech-loaders. Having tried muzzle-loading guns on their own plan, and pronounced them a failure, the Russians, since 1866, had adopted the breech-loading principle. Since 1864 the Prussian Artillery had been partially armed with breech-loading guns; but at first muzzle-loading, smooth-bore guns were retained for one-third of the force. Immediately after Sadowa, however, it was reported that

muzzle-loading, smooth-bore guns were useless, and that they were an encumbrance which was not compensated for by their power in action; and since then the Prussians had used breech-loading guns exclusively. Austria had, until lately, used both kinds of guns in her navy and for coast defence, with, however, a preponderance of breech-loaders, and now it had determined to exclude muzzle-loaders, and last year, in a panic, it experimented on a field-gun made by Krupp, which was a little better than the Prussian gun. The results of the practice were extraordinary, for it was found that the gun of which Austria hitherto had been proud, made only one-seventh of the number of hits at a target which were made by the new gun at 5,000 paces; one-eighth at 3,000 paces, and one-fourth at 2,000 paces; and the conclusion was arrived at that Austria would be helpless if it were opposed to Prussian breech-loading artillery. Turkey was influenced in her adherence to muzzle-loading guns by her extensive relations with England, and it had been said by a Turkish Pacha that he would not be persuaded even by an angel to take anything that was not manufactured according to Woolwich fashions; but since then the mother of the Sultan had presented the Army with Krupp guns, and breech-loaders had been exclusively adopted for their field artillery. Sweden adhered as long as possible to muzzle-loading guns, as best suited to her cast-iron manufacture, but she had now adopted breech-loaders. Belgium had been in favour of the breech-loading system for a long time. France had had breech-loading heavy guns for some time; but she went into the last war with her field artillery armed with muzzle-loading guns; and the return of the war showed that 10 per cent of wounded Prussians and 25 per cent of wounded Frenchmen were wounded by artillery fire, so that the Prussian guns were twice and a-half as effective as the French guns. That was the material effect, and, of course, the moral effect would be great among men who knew they were losing 50 men for every 20 they disabled. Italy had oscillated, but he believed now had adopted breech-loaders. Spain followed the example of France until the last war, when both sides, Carlists and Alfonsists, found muzzle-loading guns useless, and adopted breech-loaders. Whatever arm they might adhere to in time of peace, each of these countries, when it entered into war, or found danger imminent, changed to the breech-loading system. Some people might say that such a subject would be better dealt with by a Scientific Committee. He (Captain Nolan) was not of that opinion, because the House of Commons had always displayed great power in comparing opinions; he thought, therefore, that they were fully qualified to deal with this subject. Scientific reports, moreover, had already been made in the case of other European nations, and it was on the strength of those reports that the system of breech-loaders had been generally adopted. It might be said that Holland still had some muzzle-loaders, but her principal gun for coast defence was a breech-loader. The United States was practically without an artillery system, and during the Civil War both sides used chiefly smooth-bore guns; but its Government had lately directed Captain Simpson, a naval officer, to inquire into the different systems of Europe; he had carefully studied the English method, devoting one of the two large volumes of his report to English Artillery; and he had reported strongly and decisively in favour of breech-loading. China, Japan, and Brazil followed our example, because they bought their guns in England without making independent experiments. Practically, we stood alone, in face of the military opinion of Europe, and also in face of the opinion of our own civil engineers, as expressed a few weeks ago at a meeting of their Institute, when all the speakers expressed a decided preference for the breech-loading principle, and the President stated further that Sir Joseph Whitworth and Sir William Armstrong were both in favour of it. As to our military authorities, unfortunately they made experiments and Reports while the question was in process of solution, and while Europe was divided in opinion, and if there were further reference to these authorities, it would be hard for them to go back on their previously-expressed opinions. For all these reasons, and because the question was so important, it was one for the decision of the Cabinet, who would not be free from responsibility if we suffered from an adherence to the muzzle-loading system after all other countries had decided against it. Before entering upon the question of the relative superiority of the breech-loader and the muzzle-loader, it was necessary to clear the subject from extraneous considerations, such as the proper material of a gun and the nature of the projectile employed. When rifle guns were first introduced, each country had its own views as to the best metal. Prussia was in favour of steel guns. Sweden and the United States preferred their cast iron, which was better than that made elsewhere; while Great Britain, which was more celebrated for its wrought iron, tried to manufacture its guns from that material. It was then found that wrought-iron guns were not to be relied upon, and, eventually, only two metals were used—steel, or a mixture, as in this country, of wrought-iron with a certain proportion of steel. The performances of the projectiles employed, such as the number of men they might kill or the depth of iron plates they went through, were equally extraneous to the point at issue, because either breech or muzzle-loading guns might be made to show very destructive effects. The only superiority which he now claimed for breech-loading guns in regard to projectiles was in the absence of windage. The great superiority of breech-loading guns was in the diminished exposure of the men. He might illustrate that by referring to what happened when a sportsman had to fire at wild game from behind a bank. If after firing once, he wanted to try for another shot, he would have great difficulty in hiding himself from the game when he had to use a long and clumsy ramrod. So, in an engagement, three or four men had to stand in front of a muzzle-loader to load, ram down the shot, &c., and while they were thus serving the gun more men would always be shot than in serving a breech-loader. Perhaps in an engagement between two ships or two batteries not more than 30 or 40 additional men would thus be shot, and that might not be thought a large number; but the moral effect of losing the most skilled and the bravest men by exposure to fire would be great and of a cumulative nature, and, in the long run, men would not do their work so well when they were exposed as when they served under the cover of a breech-loading gun.

Captain Nolan

A muzzle-loader was loaded in one position and fired in another, and the same amount of cover could not be secured for both, except by adopting Major Moncrieff's invention, which no doubt made it as safe during loading as in firing. The fact, therefore, that the men were more exposed to destruction in serving muzzle-loading guns was the main reason why Continental nations had adopted the breech-loader. The question then arose as to which gun lasted the longest. The life of a gun must be measured by the number of charges it would fire, and these must not be what were called ordinary or full charges, but battering charges, which alone could be effective in active service, so far as armour-piercing guns were concerned. In reference to the point a Committee had reported that the difference of recoil, when two descriptions of charge were alternately employed, caused serious delay in loading, and they directed the use of the battering charge only in actual war. Then came the question, what number of battering charges could be safely allowed, and in regard to that point, the latest order which had been issued was, that guns over 10-inch were not to fire more than 100 battery charges without being sent to be re-examined. That appeared to him to be a small number of rounds, and in the case of a vessel sent abroad the limit would soon be reached. This great wear and tear of the muzzle-loader was caused by the erosion, and because the projectile could not exactly fit the gun. Now, foreign Governments had taken a great deal of trouble to ascertain the relative endurance of the two systems of guns, and there were some important experiments made at Tesel, in 1868, bearing upon this subject. The Prussians sent over for a 9-inch gun, and tried a 9½-inch gun against it. The first result was that the English gun beat the Prussian gun. The Prussians then altered the projectile and the powder charge of their piece, then the armour-piercing performances of both guns became practically equal—the Germans claiming a slight superiority. But what was the real result of this experiment? This fact was established, that the German gun possessed far the greater endurance. This question of endurance was one of great importance. The English muzzle-loader fired 200 or 250 rounds, then becoming unserviceable, while the Prussian gun fired 600 rounds, so that the Prussian gun lasted three times as long. Austria had also made a similar experiment expressly to check the last-mentioned result, by which it appeared that the English muzzle-loader at the 111th round became unserviceable, but the Austrian gun remained good. With reference to the Navy, he could not undertake to speak authoritatively, in the presence of so many naval officers. Here the question of relative speed became specially important, and he would not on this much debated point claim now a superiority for the breech-loader, although his own opinion was even here in its favour, but as with keepers in cover shooting, great skill and practice were necessary to load muzzle-loaders fast, while fair proficiency with the breech-loader was more easily attained. With the want of protection, however, to which he had already referred, the skilled men might very soon fall in action, and then the superiority so claimed would cease to exist. Captain Simpson, in speaking of the reasons for the adoption of the muzzle-loading gun by this country, said, that the Armstrong breech-loader having been found to fail, it was given up, and then arose a prejudiced belief that as we had failed in a solution of the problem, the problem must be necessarily incapable of solution. No efforts were made to adopt the system prevailing abroad, although the English mind was ready to embark in the breech-loading system. The Government, he added, committed itself entirely to the muzzle-loading system; the plant at Woolwich was adapted to the sole manufacture of that system of gun, and it would now require an immense superiority in the breech-loader to induce them to adopt that system. He (Captain Nolan) believed that other causes operated to bring about the present state of things. As people believed that the fact that the muzzle-loader had been adopted was in itself a proof of its being a better gun, he would point out that there were four causes which had induced England to adopt the system of muzzle-loading. In the first place, England had been accustomed for a short time, some four or five years ago, to use a very strong description of powder, thereby committing a mistake, as was now admitted. The consequence was that we had short guns, and by that had lost some of the benefits we might otherwise have obtained. A different powder was now used, and we could employ long guns which obviously demanded a breech-loading arrangement much more than the shorter pieces. Again, the kind of breech-loader first adopted was one where the breech piece had to be lifted every time out of the gun before the ammunition could be introduced; and as our guns got heavier it became very awkward to lift the breech piece, and consequently it was found that for large guns this breech-loading system would not answer; but that reason did not act in any other country, because they had only to displace horizontally the breech-block. A further reason arose from our Indian position. In India the simplicity of muzzle-loading guns gave some undoubted advantages, and as muzzle-loading guns and ammunition could alone be manufactured in that country its Government had favoured muzzle-loaders, and it was directly through a Committee on Indian guns that we had first definitely pronounced for muzzle-loading. Another reason might be found in the Feathers decision that the Crown might adopt warlike inventions without compensating the inventors, which had prevented foreigners to a very great extent from introducing their inventions to this country. Prussia acted in very much the same manner with reference to foreign military inventions; but, on the other hand, she had been careful to try the systems in vogue in England. He would press a last reason of the greatest importance on the House. It ought to be borne in mind that, while we had adopted a system as regarded ordnance totally different from that of any other civilized Power, the science of artillery was continually progressing; and it was hard to say what country in Europe did not every year contribute to its advancement. It was therefore of great importance that the Government should consider every improvement, and exercise the greatest vigilance in order that the best system might be adopted, for while it was extremely difficult to introduce into the muzzle-loader the improvements effected from time to time in the breech-loader, other countries would probably be able to adapt to their breech-loaders improvements originally devised for other breech-loaders. England in this matter had taken up an isolated position and was not able to adopt the improvements of other countries. In fact, we declared ourselves wiser than our neighbours without carefully testing those parts of their systems which we pronounced inferior. At the same time he believed, it was acknowledged that it was a mere question of time as to when we were to take up breech-loading, and therefore in adhering to our present system we were only postponing the evil day and putting off a change, which, when it did come, would, he feared, be a costly one.

LORD EUSTACE CECIL hoped that as the hon. and gallant Member for Devonport (Captain Price) had not favoured the House with a lengthy speech upon the subject he would excuse categorical answers to his Questions and that the answers would be satisfactory. To the first Question the Answer was, that it was proposed to manufacture more 81-ton guns, and he (Lord Eustace Cecil) believed one of the reasons was, that the Navy would very shortly require these very large guns. To the second Question, the Answer was, that no 35-ton gun had been actually tested to destruction, because it was not deemed necessary to do so; but long exhaustive experiments had been carried on with 35-ton guns, which combined with their experience had satisfied those most competent to judge of the matter that the "Woolwich system" was applicable to that sized gun. To the third Question the Answer was, that the work done by a 35-ton gun was so superior to that done by a 25-ton gun in the opinion of those who presided over the matter, that it was deemed advisable to build still larger guns on the same principle. To the fourth Question the Answer was, that the Ordnance Department had supplied the naval service with shell calculated to withstand 18-ton and heavier guns. As to the subject which the hon. and gallant Member for Galway (Captain Nolan) had brought forward with his usual knowledge and ability on these matters, he thought he might remind the hon. and gallant Gentleman that it was hardly ripe for discussion in the House of Commons. Opinion was very much divided, as the hon. and gallant Gentleman himself had admitted, upon these matters, though no doubt there was a certain amount of foreign scientific opinion in favour of his view. He (Lord Eustace Cecil) was talking now of English scientific opinion. He must remind the hon. and gallant Member that that was not the first time that we as a nation had embarked in a breech-loading system. We adopted in, he believed, 1858, the Armstrong breech-loading system. That system was very carefully tested, and after a considerable amount of trial it was gradually abandoned both by the Artillery and the Navy, and no breech-loading guns were manufactured after 1868. He need not enter into the defects of the Armstrong principle. It would take too long to enter into very minute detail with that subject; but he might say it was very carefully considered by a number of scientific Committees. The hon. and gallant Gentleman, who was a member of a scientific corps, would not throw any doubt on the value of the Reports of those Committees, because the officers who sat on them were of the highest experience and ability, and were as competent to give an opinion as any gentleman, whether of civil or military experience, in the country. The first Committee, which reported in 1864, was the Ordnance Select Committee, and their Report led to the adoption of the present Woolwich system. Then there was the Armstrong and Whitworth Committee, before whom both these inventions had a very fair trial, but the Report of the Committee was not in their favour. Then there was the Committee of 13 superior officers of the Royal Artillery, in 1866, and they were unanimous in recommending muzzle-loading field guns. Next there was the Dartmoor Committee of 1869, and they also reported in favour of muzzle-loading guns.

CAPTAIN NOLAN said, that that Committee was appointed exclusively to consider the question of shells, and had nothing to do with muzzle-loading and breech-loading.

LORD EUSTACE CECIL wished to pay due deference to the superior scientific knowledge of the hon. and gallant Member upon the subject; but still he must observe that, though the Committee did not directly report upon the question now under discussion, yet indirectly they did, and in a manner that was unfavourable to the breech-loading system. Further, there was the India Committee upon field-artillery equipment, in 1870, who were in favour of the muzzle-loading gun. He believed the hon. and gallant Member stated, in the course of his remarks, that one of the reasons why we introduced the muzzle-loading guns was that India introduced them, and that we were obliged to follow suit. That might be so; but it was quite new to him (Lord Eustace Cecil), and he had never heard that it was one of the reasons which weighed with the authorities at the time. Then we came to the Committee of 1871 on muzzle and breech-loading guns, consisting of 11 officers, who with one dissentient only, stated that the muzzle-loading gun was superior in range and accuracy, in point of simplicity, facility of repair, easy working, rapidity of fire, and original cost. That Committee sat in full view of the affairs that had occurred on the Continent, and they were able to judge from practical experience of the merits of the two systems. The hon. and gallant Member would probably say that he was placing rather an official value upon these Reports, and that he might feel himself bound to support those who had reported to the Secretary of State for War, and therefore he would refer the House to the opinion of a gentleman who did not come within this range. The late Director of Naval Ordnance, Captain Hood, in his Report to the Admiralty, made some remarks of importance upon this question. He summed up a very able Report upon the two systems, and said that the points of the greatest importance in connection with these rival guns were strength, endurance, accuracy, and liability to accidents. As to strength and endurance, he stated that breech-loading weakened the breech; as to accuracy of firing, that the muzzle-loading gun was very satisfactory, and that the power of penetration was good, and had been greatly increased by the adoption of pebble powder. The operation of loading also was very much simpler in the muzzle-loader, and accidents with that weapon were far less likely to occur in action. No doubt it might be said—"How does this bear upon the fact that so many foreign countries had taken up this breech-loading system as against the muzzle-loading system?" To that question he would say that there was nothing so successful as success. Man was an imitative animal. They all knew that Prussia was fortunate in the last war; she used breech-loading guns, therefore almost everybody jumped to the conclusion that breech-loading guns were the things with which to conquer their enemies. But upon a matter of this kind it was most essential that the Government should proceed with caution and care. They found that the Austrians, and even the Germans, were not quite confident about the success of the Krupp guns. It was certain that an extraordinary number of accidents, with loss of life, had year after year taken place in the German service, arising from the guns; and at Woolwich one of the Krupp guns burst upon the second loading. Whatever the future of Artillery manufacture might be, it was quite certain that the Krupp type of gun had not yet reached perfection. No doubt the hon. and gallant Member (Captain Nolan) had made some very strong observations in favour of the breech-loading gun, and had quoted the opinions of several distinguished officers bearing upon the same point, and had also said the Institute of Civil Engineers, as a body, had decided in the same direction; but in 1873 there was the report of a foreign officer, who said that, although the immediate future was for breech-loading, it was still perfectly certain that they should not adopt the gun loading by the breech, unless they could find one that was superior to all known guns that were loaded by the muzzle. The French Government also, in 1873, after a most exhaustive trial, said that the Woolwich service gun gave results which were not inferior to any other field gun in service in Europe. He (Lord Eustace Cecil) did not say that these opinions settled the question absolutely; but they did show that there was very great difference of opinion among the most competent judges, and would it not be wise under these circumstances—the question being of such very great importance, and there being the Reports of six Committees within the last nine or ten years, which were almost unanimously in favour of our present system—would it not be wise at the present moment to consider what might be the effect of some future invention in reference to the Krupp gun, before we remodelled the whole of our

Artillery system? He could not but think that if they took steps at once, they would raise the whole corps of inventors about their ears, and perhaps, after they had gone through many trials and incurred enormous expenditure, they would come back to the point where they were now. He did not think that at this moment the House, or, indeed, anybody else, was competent to arrive at a definite conclusion upon the matter. This, however, he would say, that the matter was one which was being constantly watched. He believed that the Artillery opinion of Woolwich was quiet upon the subject at this moment; and he did not believe that there was any very strong opinion one way or the other. He recollected, indeed, having a conversation with the late Colonel Milward, who was a great supporter of breech-loaders, but he did not think that there was any very strong feeling about the question at Woolwich. As he had said before, scientific opinion generally was divided concerning it, and he therefore thought it would be best on the whole to let the question rest for the present; but this he was sure of, that his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for War always took into consideration any evidence that was brought forward, and which would be really useful in enabling anyone to form a conclusion upon the question. He was quite certain that whatever foreign countries did would be known in this country; but the trials abroad were not always quite fair in reference to our guns as regarded the charges used, and the results indicated. That being so, hon. Members should not lay too much stress upon trials of guns abroad, unless they were perfectly certain that the conditions were perfectly equal in all respects. He felt certain that the hon. and gallant Member (Captain Nolan) would take into his consideration the difficulties of the subject; and, indeed, he had some hope that they might convert him to the opinion that the time for action in this matter had not yet arrived.

LORD ELCHO said, he thought the hon. and gallant Member for Galway (Captain Nolan) had done good service in calling attention to the subject, as both on board ship and in the field there was under the muzzle-loading system a needless exposure of life. That exposure should, he thought, be made an important point when discussing the comparative merits of breech and muzzle-loaders. The chief point with which at present they had to deal, however, was the erosion of the gun. With regard to that point, he (Lord Elcho) was at the meeting of the Civil Service Engineers which had been referred to, and at that meeting there was a paper read upon the subject by Mr. Lancaster. The result arrived at was the fact that English-made breech-loading guns suffered greatly from the erosion caused by the generation of gases in the act of firing the guns. There was nothing better in the world than the external manufacture of Woolwich guns; but it was found that owing to the escape of gas between the projectile and the body of the gun there was such a rush of gas that the gun was destroyed in a comparatively few rounds. No doubt, great good would be done by calling attention to the question of guns; but the main point for consideration was the erosion of the gun. The Civil Service Engineers were of opinion that there was something radically wrong in our system of boring and constructing guns, because the life of Tube A—that was the inner tube—in the British gun was only about 375 rounds; whereas the life of the same tube in the Krupp gun had been proved to be 800 rounds. Manifestly there must be some defect in a system of rifling which produced results such as that, and he hoped attention would be paid to the subject. On the general question of muzzle-loading versus breech-loading, he ventured to think that as a vast amount of money had already been expended in carrying out the present system, it would be well, before adopting an entirely new plan, involving vastly-increased expenditure, to endeavour, either by an improvement in the system of rifling or some other means, to utilize the existing arms.

CAPTAIN G. E. PRICE gave Notice that, as the noble Lord the Surveyor General of Ordnance (Lord Eustace Cecil) had not answered his Questions in reference to ordnance and projectiles, he should repeat them on another occasion.

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN said, he agreed that the hon. and gallant Member for Galway (Captain Nolan) had done good service in directing attention to the subject, because, although he (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) did not agree in his conclusions, it was unquestionably one of the most important questions connected with our military affairs. This country laboured under a disadvantage as compared with other countries with regard to the number of men, but we ought to be in a much better position than they were with regard to the matériel of war. The muzzle-loading system had not been adopted from any prejudice on the part of our naval and military authorities. When the question was first raised the breech-loading system was in favour, and it was only after a searching investigation by a series of Committees that the muzzle-loading system was adopted. If he remembered rightly, the principal Committee was all but unanimous in its recommendation on that point, only one Member doubting its expediency, and he did so on the ground that, in the case of siege guns worked in entrenchments, muzzle-loaders were more exposed in the act of loading than breech-loaders. They had, however, other than siege guns to provide, and in consequence of the scare in the Navy from the accidents that happened from breech-loaders, muzzle-loaders had to be supplied for that service, in place of the breech-loaders which had been manufactured for it at an enormous expense, and in consequence there were numbers of the latter lying useless at Woolwich at the present time. It was obviously advisable to adopt a system suitable for both services. As regarded field guns, there were one or two advantages which muzzle-loading field guns possessed, and which must be obvious even to hon. Members who, like himself, could pretend to no technical knowledge of the subject. He might point out that it was essential that field guns should be as simple in construction as possible. There should be nothing about them which was easily lost in a rapid movement, or which might require a skilled workman to repair; and there could be no doubt that the muzzle-loader possessed great advantages over the breech-loader in this respect. He did not see how there was more danger in loading one than the other; muzzle-loading might be a longer process than the other, but the risk to a man standing before a gun was not much greater than to a man behind it. All these facts were taken into consideration at the time by the War Office, with their eyes open to what was going on abroad. There was great force in what the noble Lord the Surveyor General of the Ordnance had suggested, that because the Prussians were successful in the war of 1870, other nations jumped to the conclusion that by adopting the same system they also must be successful. He had no doubt that the War Office would be alive to any improvements that were being made, and they would not go on with the muzzle-loading system if they did not believe it furnished the country with the most efficient guns that could be had. The hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for Galway (Captain Nolan) was, as he was informed, under a mistake with regard to India. It was not the fact that the muzzle-loading system had been adopted in this country out of respect to the Indian Government. An attempt was made to construct guns in India of brass; but it proved a failure, and the muzzle-loading guns now used in India were all made in this country.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, he had also to express the obligation of the House to the hon. and gallant Member for Galway (Captain Nolan) for having brought a subject of such importance before them. But he declined to follow the hon. and gallant Gentleman to his conclusions, for he found that the opinion of a series of Committees from 1864 down to the present time had been almost entirely in favour of muzzle-loading guns. In the case of field guns, there was an idea that it was safer to serve breech-loaders than muzzle-loaders; but that was open to question, for men behind guns were peculiarly subject to be killed by splinters in consequence of shot striking the gun or its carriage. As regarded durability, he found that there was a very general opinion in favour of muzzle-loaders. Guns of that description certainly possessed the advantage of simplicity, for in the case of breech-loaders accidents constantly happened from the breech being carelessly or hastily closed. As the amount annually spent by this country in the construction of guns was very large indeed—the total amount to be expended up to 1876 being £4,220,000—he deprecated any hasty re-opening of the question of the comparative merits of breech-loaders and muzzle-loaders. Captain Hood in his Report spoke specially of the safety of muzzle-loaders both in ships and gar-risons, where—in the latter—now they could be drawn within the mantlets and not exposed at the embrasures. In conclusion, he (Mr. Gathorne Hardy) would assure the hon. and gallant Gentleman that the matter had occupied the serious attention of the Government. Looking at what was going on in foreign countries, they were determined to keep their eyes wide open and not to shrink from any expenditure that might be incurred when they were certain of being in the right track.

Main Question, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," put, and agreed to.

SUPPLY—ARMY ESTIMATES.

(4.) £51,100, Divine Service.

COLONEL ALEXANDER said, he would take advantage of that occasion to say that when the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War announced the retirement of the present Chaplain General to the Forces, on whose distinguished services he had passed a high eulogium, he had not informed the House who was to be his successor. It had, however, been naturally inferred, and he (Colonel Alexander) ventured to point out, that gentlemen with the necessary qualifications for the post were to be found among the existing chaplains of the Army of the first class. He did not wish to draw invidious distinctions, but taking the names of the first six gentlemen in that class—the Ven. Archdeacon Wright, who had served 21 years, including service in the Crimea; the Rev. J. E. Sabin, who served in the East in 1854; the Rev. C. Green, who had been in the service since 1846; the Rev. H. Huleatt, who had served in 1854 in the Crimea, and in China from 1857 to 1859, when he was dangerously wounded; the Rev. C. J. Hort, the Rev. E. J. Rogers, and the Rev. R. Halpin, chaplain to the Forces in London—he found they had served for long periods in the most meritorious manner. He considered, therefore, they had been very unfairly treated in being passed over in favour of a gentleman who, however distinguished, had no connection whatever with the Army. Notwithstanding their gallant, distinguished, and meritorious services, it appeared that they were considered totally incompetent to perform the duties of Chaplain General to the Forces; at least, as much might be inferred from the circumstance that a civilian had been selected for the appointment, for a retired colonial Bishop had been appointed, who had, he believed, written a very interesting treatise on the Thirty-nine Articles, and also some letters to Lord Derby on the subject of Convocation. The six chaplains to whom he had referred were, under the circumstances, he could not help thinking, entitled to say "Other men laboured, and ye are entered into their labours." Sic vos non vobis nidificatis aves. A slur had, he was afraid, been cast upon them which would tend to humiliate them in the eyes of the Army.

COLONEL NORTH said, he felt bound to state that the new appointment was one which had given the greatest pain to the Army, although he felt confident his right hon. Friend at the head of the War Office never contemplated that it would have had any such result. In the case of Archdeacon Wright, especially, it had been regarded as a slur. He had always regretted that when the Army returned from Ashantee, when others were receiving rewards, nothing was done for the chaplains who accompanied the troops. He hoped the subject would yet be considered by those who had the means of rewarding merit by promotion in the Church.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, the observations which had just been made on the subject had taken him quite by surprise, and he must disclaim the slightest intention of casting any slur on the chaplains of the Army. In selecting the person who had been chosen, he had acted solely from a desire to do that which would best promote the interests of the chaplains themselves, for it was pressed upon him that difficulties had constantly arisen when Episcopal authority was desirable, and, indeed, the Chaplain General had to exercise, to a certain extent, quasi-episcopal functions on many occasions; and he was advised that it was desirable, in consequence, that a person possessing the requisite authority in that respect should be selected for the office. Those were his sole reasons for making the selection to which objection was taken, for he was quite as much alive as his hon. and gallant Friends to the services which had been rendered to the country by the chaplains of the Army both at home and abroad.

GENERAL SHUTE expressed a hope that the eminent services of Archdeacon Wright, who was at the head of the list, would receive some recognition.

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK said, no body of men deserved better of the Army or of the country than the Army chaplains, and, whilst giving the right hon. Gentleman credit for his good intentions, he could not help thinking that the selection of a gentleman altogether outside the Army would be regarded by many of them as most painful and invividious. The late Chaplain General's great value to the Army arose from the long knowledge of soldiers which he acquired during the Peninsular War; and amongst the military chaplains now superseded there were many who had established strong claims in the same manner.

Vote agreed to.

(5.) £26,700, Martial Law.

COLONEL ALEXANDER suggested the expediency of increasing the salaries of the officials of military prisons, and especially the salaries of the governors and the chief warders, who had duties thrown on them requiring great prudence, tact, and moderation, combined with firmness, for their due performance. Notwithstanding the great rise in the price of provisions, their salaries had not been raised for 25 years. He hoped that next year the Government would be able to see their way to raising the salaries of the governors from a maximum of £350 to one of £400, and those of the chief warders from 5*s.* 8*d.* to 6*s.* 6*d.* per day.

Vote agreed to.

(6.) £248,700, Medical Establishments and Services.

MR. DUNBAR appealed to the Secretary of State for War to give some assurance that the grievances of the medical officers of the Army, which he understood were now under the right hon. Gentleman's consideration, would be redressed as speedily as possible, whether by the issue of a new Warrant or otherwise.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, the case of the medical men had been constantly under his consideration, but there was so much difference among those gentlemen themselves as to what their grievances were, and also as to how they ought to be met, that it was difficult to arrive at a clear judgment on the question. He found himself deluged with pamphlets, in which the most opposite views were urged, and these were all of them written by men of eminence in their profession. There were, however, some points in reference to which he should be able to grant some advantages, and he hoped to be able to do that in the course of the present year.

Vote agreed to.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, he proposed to postpone the Vote for the Militia, in consequence of the absence at quarter sessions of some hon. Members who would have taken part in the discussion of it. He would give Notice of the day on which it should come on.

Vote postponed.

(7.) £78,900, Yeomanry Cavalry.

COLONEL ALEXANDER said, that the horse tax, from which the Yeomanry Cavalry used to be exempt, having been abolished, that Force had now no special encouragement offered to it. He would like to know whether the right hon. Gentleman was prepared to give some further encouragement to men to come forward to serve in the Force?

MR. F. STANLEY said, his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for War had under his consideration various schemes for the amelioration of the Yeomanry Cavalry, and it was his intention very shortly to appoint a Committee, consisting partly of officers of the Yeomanry, partly of Members of both Houses of Parliament, and partly of officers of the Army, which would meet at the end of that week, or shortly afterwards, to inquire into the various points that were necessary for bringing the Yeomanry into harmony with the other defensive Forces of the country. It was probable that among the various matters brought before them, there would be that of the difference made in the position of the Yeomanry by the abolition of the horse tax.

MR. GOURLEY believed that under the present system the money voted for the Yeomanry was entirely thrown away. They were brought out only seven days in the course of the year, and their actual drill did not exceed four and a-half days, which was quite insufficient to make the Force what it ought to be. He would suggest that it should be trained in conjunction with some of the other Forces of the country.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR asked the Secretary for War if he would add in future in the Appendix to the Army Estimates a statement of the Forces of Volunteers, Yeomanry, and Militia, so as to show the establishments by ranks and numbers of the Militia Artillery and Militia Infantry regiments; also of the Volunteer battalions and Yeomanry, classifying them each under the counties to which belonging, or in which raised, with the number of companies, batteries, and troops? He believed that this information would be of advantage by showing the extent of Forces available in the several localities, and facilitate the labours of those who might wish to show how easy it was to increase these Forces.

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK hoped the Committee which was about to sit would be directed to take into special consideration the position of Adjutant in the Yeomanry.

GENERAL SHUTE said, he could not agree with the belief that had been stated by the hon. Member for Sunderland (Mr. Gourley). He was of opinion that the Yeomanry had within it the elements of rare usefulness. He had made many notes respecting several corps; but as a Committee was to be appointed, it would be needlessly taking up time to enter into the subject now.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, that the Committee which would inquire into the matters which seemed to prejudice the usefulness of the Yeomanry would be an informal body, composed of gentlemen connected with that service and of Members of both Houses. To a remark of the hon. and gallant General opposite (Sir George Balfour) he replied that, as the prospective strength of the Yeomanry was given in the general annual Return of the British Army, there was no need to give it in the Vote.

LORD ELCHO said, he would suggest that it might be advantageous to have the Yeomanry drilled on the same principle as Colonel Bowyer's Hampshire Horse. An officer had declared, after inspecting the latter, that—although it might be heresy on his part—he was bound to say that with a considerable force of men so trained, it would be impossible for an enemy's artillery to traverse the country.

Vote agreed to.

(8.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £437,200, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge for Volunteer Corps, which will come in course of payment from the 1st day of April 1875 to the 31st day of March 1876, inclusive."

LIEUT. - COLONEL NAGHTEN said, that the uniform of a Volunteer Artillery officer was exactly the same as that of an officer of the Militia Artillery. He would suggest there ought to be some distinction; for as one of the latter, he had been taken for an officer in the Volunteers. The state of the uniform of some of the corps ought to be taken into consideration and improved. In some instances it was very bad.

SIR ANDREW LUSK held that the Volunteers ought to receive a little more encouragement than they did. They formed a public force of 160,000 men ready to serve in defence of the country, and gave a great deal of time and labour to qualify themselves for military duty. Government, in fact, had treated them very hardly, for it required them to be efficient—to be equal, in truth, in some respects, to men of the Line—but nothing was said about a little more allowance to pay expenses. He feared conscription would yet become necessary in this country, and, perhaps, the evil day might be averted by being a little less stingy to the Volunteers. He had no present proposal to make; but he thought the amount of the Vote might be profitably increased.

MR. GOURLEY thought the efficiency of the Volunteers would be increased if they were required to bind themselves for six months instead of, as at present, for only 14 days, and if they were drilled for seven days annually with the men of the Line and of the Militia. There was an item of £2,800 for "payments to clerks of lieutenantancy," and, as the duties formerly performed by these officers of issuing commissions was now done through the War Office, and not through them, he would move that the Vote be reduced by that sum. These gentlemen were receiving £75 a-year in Militia regiments, and £55 a-year in Volunteer regiments, for which they literally did nothing.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That the Item of £2,800, for the payments to Clerks of Lieutenantancy, be omitted from the proposed Vote."—(Mr. Courley.)

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR supported the Amendment, and most sincerely hoped that the hated and vile Continental system of conscription would not be resorted to in this country, except in the case of absolute necessity, and, in order to guard against any pressure, he trusted that the Government would avail themselves of an efficient organization, equal to that which the Foreign Governments have been obliged to establish over the country for the purpose of conscripting the young men, so as to secure the services of volunteers as far as possible instead of waiting till forced to resort to that most objectionable expedient. Such a course would be unnecessary if encouragement was given to the raising of local Volunteers and Yeomanry, and sufficient publicity given as to the places in which they were located. With that view, he should be glad if the Government would consent to furnish Returns of the number of the battalions, batteries, and corps of Militia, Yeomanry, and Volunteer regiments and of the districts in which they were raised, together with the number of males of the Militia age within these various areas, in order that the nation might be alive to the extensive resources in men which could be utilized in case of need in defence of the country.

MR. WHITWELL said, that the number of Volunteer sergeants drawing the additional £2 10s. for having passed their examination showed a considerable increase of efficiency in the Force, which afforded a very excellent substitute for conscription in this country. He thought the public were scarcely aware of the great pains taken by these sergeants to enable them to pass their examination. He also thought that the Volunteers should be utilized more than they had been hitherto; and that the different Forces in the various brigade districts should be drilled together more frequently than they were at present, under the command of the military officer in charge of the district.

LORD ELCHO said, that if the position of adjutants of the Yeomanry with regard to retirement were taken into consideration, he hoped the position of the adjutants of the Volunteers would also be considered, with the view of placing them on the same footing as adjutants of the Militia. The hon. Baronet the Member for Finsbury (Sir Andrew Lusk) had spoken very kindly of the Volunteer Force; but he had used expressions from which it might be inferred that its members were paid for their services. He (Lord Elcho) wished it to be clearly understood that the Volunteers received nothing for their services, and that the whole of the capitation grant was expended in defraying the regimental expenses. When the late Secretary for War, instead of increasing the general capitation grant to the Volunteers, proposed to pay an additional sum of £2 10s. for every Volunteer officer and sergeant that passed his examination, he confessed that he had not sufficient faith in their zeal and that he thought that the scheme would fail. He was happy, however, to say that Lord Cardwell was right and that he was wrong in the opinion they had formed on the subject. He thanked the present Secretary for War for the concession he had made during the past year in permitting Volunteer officers who had served in their regiments for a certain period to retain their rank and to continue to wear their uniforms after they had ceased to take an active part in the corps. In this manner, gentlemen would be able to keep up a most beneficial connection with the corps in which they had formerly served. In his opinion the present capitation grant was sufficient.

COLONEL MAKINS asked for increased opportunities for the Artillery Volunteers at Shoeburyness to pass a week in camp. Hitherto they had always been crowded, and he was aware that space was small; but there might with advantage be three or four meetings in the year. He also would ask whether the Government could not see its way, instead of giving an increase of capitation grant, to serve out great coats to the Volunteers, so as to enable them to drill with more comfort in the winter months.

COLONEL MURE considered the Volunteer adjutants had just cause of complaint. In many respects they were in a worse position than the adjutants of Militia, and in some parts of the country they had an enormous amount of work to perform. He would also suggest the advisability of increasing the sum granted for regimental camps. From his own experience, these camps were most serviceable. They increased the popularity of the service, and by bringing men and officers together for a longer period tended towards better discipline, good conduct, and sobriety. His own battalion in the neighbourhood of Glasgow had had one of these camps for the last two years. The rank and file performed all their own civil work, and upwards of 300 officers and men, together with himself, slept in the camp every night. The result of the continued drill of 14 days in the one year and 10 days in the other was very remarkable. It made a battalion which had always been considered fairly efficient very efficient indeed. By it the men were better kept up to practice, more orderly, and the officers had a better opportunity of becoming personally acquainted with them. He further thought it would be of great advantage if some small subsidy was granted for great coats. These could be kept in the drill-shed, and the effect, in his opinion, would be not only to induce men to join a corps, but those already connected with it would attend drill oftener. As to the question of officers retaining their rank after leaving a regiment, he would suggest that old quartermasters of the regular Army should have the same privilege accorded to them which had been given to the Volunteer officers.

MR. A. P. VIVIAN pointed out that when the corps composing an administrative battalion were situate at a great distance from one another, the work imposed on the adjutants was enormous.

SIR ANDREW LUSK said, that inasmuch as the rank and file of the Volunteers gave much valuable time and labour to this service they ought to be fairly recognized, and he did not see why they should do their work for nothing, besides having in so many cases to pay money out of their own pockets.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, that some of the suggestions which had been made, though useful in themselves, might wait a little while longer for consideration and adoption if thought advisable. He thought that every reasonable encouragement should be given to the Volunteers; but he was surprised that the hon. Baronet the Member for Finsbury should propose to give them pay, which would deprive them of their Volunteer character, and hoped he would use his influence with his friends to increase their liberality in other directions in which they were not so ready to bestow it. The question of their payment must be considered, if at all, on some other occasion than the present. As to regimental camps, he agreed with the hon. and gallant Member opposite (Colonel Mure) that they were useful and popular, and he was anxious, therefore, that they should be encouraged. No pressure, however, had been put upon the War Office to furnish an additional number of them. With regard to the Motion of the hon. Member for Sunderland (Mr. Gourley), he wished to state that it was necessary to keep the clerks of lieutenantancy in existence as long as we had to consider the quota of the Militia. The whole question of quotas would, however, have to be considered at some future time, though not during the present Session, with a view to the system being placed on a better footing. With regard to the Volunteer adjutants, there had been considerable delay in consequence of the change of the Inspector General of the Auxiliary Forces, and things had not gone on so fast as they would have done if Sir Garnet Wolseley had remained in England. The adjutants had accepted their office subject to the existing conditions on which they held it, and although there were some anomalies, there was nothing exceptional in their position generally. The whole question was, however, being carefully considered. With respect to the suggestion of his hon. and gallant Friend behind him (Colonel Makins), that an extension of time should be given for Volunteer Artillery practice at Shoeburyness, he had to say that their practice there had at all times been most favourably reported upon; but it was feared that to give more time would interfere with the necessary training and practice of the regular Artillery. The matter had, however, been brought under his notice, and he should be most anxious, as far as he could, to meet the desire which had been expressed. The question as to great coats would require grave consideration.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

(9.) £121,700, Army Reserve Forces (including Enrolled Pensioners).

LORD ELCHO asked the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War to specify the proportion of men contained in the different classes, distinguishing them from Enrolled Pensioners.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, the number of men in the First Class of 1870 was 7,676, and Class 1 of 1867, who were dying out, numbered 153—making 7,829; Class 2 of 1867 comprised 676 men; the Reserve of 1859, 1,991 men; and Enrolled Pensioners, 19,328—total, 21,995. That did not include the Militia Reserve. Class 2 of the Reserve were not liable to service abroad.

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK said, that there was considerable question as to the real existence of these Reserves. He could not say that he shared in that apprehension. He believed that in all cases where they had been actually called out, they had responded to almost the whole of their strength. A rumour, however, had gone abroad that in Ireland last year, when 500 of the First Army Reserve were called out, not more than 50 responded to the call, the fact being that the men were not ordered to come out, but offered the option of doing so.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, the First Class Army Reserve had never been called out peremptorily. They were merely asked to volunteer on the occasion referred to.

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK said, he thought it worth while considering whether something might not be done to ascertain that these Reserves were really effective, and could be relied upon when they were wanted. At present it was thought advisable that they should not be called out unless there was some strong necessity; but it would be well to arrange that the whole body of Reserve should be called out once a-year for three or four days, so that the country might have some evidence of their existence.

COLONEL MURE said, there had been a misapprehension throughout the country with regard to the First Class Army Reserve. He had heard an extraordinary rumour to the effect that if the Reserve Force failed to come out in time of war, there was an actual intention on the part of the authorities to offer them bounties as an inducement to them to fulfil their contracts. There had always been a presentiment in the country that although these men might come out to play, they might not come out for work. It was well known that we drew the men for our Army from a very low section of the labouring classes, and it was also well known that desertion from the Army was not looked on as a serious offence. That showed that there was an excessively low moral tone in the Army, and that being so, it was a question whether the men of the Reserve Force would come out in the event of their being actually required. Reserves were very admirable when they had a higher class of men—for example, in countries where they had the conscription—but in this country they recruited mere lads, who, going into the Army with hardly any tie connecting them to respectable civil life, could hardly be expected to have any whatever by the time they got into the Reserve Force. The authorities had no control over these men. A great many of them would be physically unfit for service, a great many would probably not come out, and probably only a few good men would be forthcoming. The rumour as to the bounties to which he had referred had come to him on authority he could not ignore, and therefore it was that he mentioned it to the Committee. [Mr. GATHORNE HARDY dissented.] He was glad to see the Secretary for War shake his head at it; because it showed that he, at all events, did not contemplate such a monstrous and demoralizing course of procedure. If anything of the kind were intended, he thought it should be stated at once, but to resort to it on an emergency as a bribe to men to join the Army and fulfil their contracts would be simply offering a premium on military felony.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY thought the sooner he replied to the statement the better. It was news to him to learn that anybody proposed to give a bounty to men to join their colours who were already bound to do so when required without any bounty. There was no truth in the rumour referred to; though, of course, it might become necessary hereafter to alter the conditions of service in the Reserve, and in that case, perhaps something would have to be done.

SIR ANDREW LUSK wished to ask, why we were to find pay for 12,000 enrolled pensioners in Western Australia? One would think the Western Australians would themselves pay for their own war requirements. What were these men doing? Perhaps they were attending to the sheep in the back country.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, they were attending to the black sheep we sent out there. That remark applied to those under letter D. The others were effective men, who were not enrolled in the sense of being enrolled in the Army but were effective men for garrison or the easier duties of a soldier's life, if their services should be required.

Vote agreed to.

(10.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £368,700, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge for Commissariat and Ordnance Store Establishments, Wages, &c., which will come in course of payment from the 1st day of April 1875 to the 31st day of March 1876, inclusive."

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR said, as this Vote showed the recent change in the designations of the officers of the Supply Department, he regretted the alteration, and that it should have been decided to abolish the Control Department. It was formed during the former administration of the present Prime Minister, and during the earlier portion of its existence, from the support and aid it had first received, it had been found so efficient in keeping down our military expenditure. He must say that it had been subjected to opposition from quarters bound to aid it, and it had failed to receive that formation which would have rendered the control permanently useful. All he could add was, that he hoped the Secretary of State would provide some machinery by which that tendency to increased military expenditure which came every day under his notice would be kept down.

MR. GOURLEY said, it was perfectly outrageous that the taxpayers of the country should be called upon to pay persons for molesting innocent women, as he considered the police did in enforcing the provisions of the Contagious Diseases Acts. He wished to prevent such cases as that of the late Mrs. Percy, the actress, who committed suicide rather than come under the operation of those Acts. In that view, he should move the reduction of the Vote by the sum of £4,750, the expenses of the police in carrying them out.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

—(Mr. Gourley.)

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, it was impossible to bring in these Estimates without putting in the charge in question. He was acting under an Act of Parliament which provided that that should be done, and as long as that Act remained unrepealed in putting this sum on the Estimates he was only discharging a Ministerial duty. Further, it was absurd to pass an Act for a certain purpose, and then to refuse the money necessary to carry out that Act. The whole question, however, would be soon raised by a right hon. Gentleman who was about to bring in a Bill on the subject, and when that time came, he (Mr. Hardy) would be prepared to express his opinion. The hon. and gallant Gentleman opposite (Sir George Balfour) was under a misapprehension in thinking that the Control Department had been abolished. It was only the name, which had led to an infinity of confusion and jealousy, that was taken away, and the change had been made with the most cordial agreement on both sides. The same control as before would be exercised, but under a different form.

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK desired to call the attention of the right hon. Gentleman to the Transport branch of the Commissariat. There were a few officers connected with that branch, and they were placed in a very anomalous and undesirable position, owing to the changes which had been made, by which that branch of the Service was no longer separate and distinct. It was manifest that in case of a war that branch must be suddenly extended, and that could only be carried out by the officers connected with the branch itself.

LORD EUSTACE CECIL said, it was impossible that an amalgamation like that which had been effected in the Commissariat and Control Departments could have taken place without individual hardships. Accordingly, many such cases had come before him since he had the honour of occupying the position which he now filled. So far as they had been able, they had taken the most pressing cases into consideration, but he was bound to confess it was almost impossible to go back five years without doing great injustice to many other officers. It was intended to keep the Transport branch as separate as possible from the Commissariat; and as a good deal had lately been said about exchanges, he might add that no exchange between the Commissariat and Transport officers would be allowed except in particular cases. With regard to entrance into the Service, the same rules would be observed as before. A certain number would enter by competition, and a certain number would be drawn from officers of the Army, and from non-commissioned officers. Those most competent to judge were not altogether satisfied with the experiment made in 1870. He could assure the hon. Baronet that his suggestions with regard to the Transport service would receive the fullest consideration.

LORD ELOHO said, that having served on the Abyssinian Committee, he would remind his noble Friend the Surveyor General of the Ordnance, that very valuable evidence had been given by Sir William Power as to the importance of the Army sea transport being under the Control Department, and not under the Navy.

SIR ANDREW LUSK said, that those who had opposed the Contagious Diseases Act would be placed in a false position if they now voted for this £4,750 for the police to carry out the Act, and must go against it. As to the general question of transport of stores, he, as a City man of business, thought it a very simple matter, involving no difficulties whatever.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN said, this was a statutory payment, and this was not the proper time to take exception to it. The money paid to the police was paid under the provisions of certain Acts of Parliament, and they must first repeal those Acts before they could refuse to put their provisions into effect. In the course of a few weeks an opportunity would be afforded to the House of expressing its opinion whether it was desirable to continue them any longer.

SIR ANDREW LUSK indignantly repudiated the hon. Gentleman's attempt to stifle discussion on this Vote by telling hon. Members that it was a statutory payment under an Act of Parliament. The Committee had the fullest right to criticize the Vote, and, if they pleased, to say "No" to it, in the teeth of any Act of Parliament, or why was it in the Vote?

MR. ANDERSON said, he was quite surprised to hear from the hon. Member for the Stirling Burghs (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) that that was not the proper time to cavil at the Vote. Such a statement was all the more remarkable coming as it did from the front Opposition Bench. The Votes were brought before them for the very purpose of cavilling at them. He should, in that case, like to know what was the proper time for considering it, if not when the Vote was proposed for work to be done next year. If the money were not voted the work could not be done, and no other harm would ensue; and, therefore, he should certainly vote for the Amendment of his hon. Friend.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN said, he did not mean to dispute the right of hon. Members to discuss Votes in Committee. He would repeat that the proper mode was not to object to the sum, but to the Acts under which it was payable. If it was alleged that the Acts were improperly administered—if, for instance, too many policemen were employed—it was quite proper to object to the item; but if the objection was one of principle, then the proper way to strike at the Vote was to move to repeal the Acts.

Question put.

The Committee divided: — Ayes 18; Noes 62: Majority 44.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

(11.) £2,950,000, Provisions, Forage, &c.

SIR ANDREW LUSK took exception, mainly on sanitary grounds, to the item of £13,000 for emptying cesspools. He thought it most disgraceful that in soldiers' quarters the cesspool system should be tolerated. Sanitary science had condemned this system long ago.

LORD EUSTACE CECIL explained, that in some districts a perfect system of drainage was not possible, and of course where cesspools existed they should be emptied as soon and as often as possible. The work was done under contract, and at, he believed, moderate cost.

SIR ANDREW LUSK said, he objected to the item because these cesspools were bad for the health of the troops, and should be done away with as soon as possible. Drains ought to be more generally used. Was it to be wondered at there was sickness in some camps?

MR. M'LAGAN said, he also believed that nothing could be so dangerous to the health of the troops as these cesspools. They ought to be replaced, where drains were not practicable, by earth closets.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, that many of the cesspools were on the dry-earth system, and the dry-earth formed part of the expenditure. There were a great many camps on a large scale where drains could not be laid down so easily as the hon. Baronet the Member for Finsbury supposed.

Vote agreed to.

MR. A. H. BROWN said, he wished to draw attention to the recommendations of the Report of the Committee on Public Departments made last year. They pointed out that the arrangements for the Contract Department at the Admiralty were under the financial head of that Department; while at the War Office they were under the Director General of Ordnance, and recommended that the system in operation at the Admiralty should be adopted at the War Office. They also stated that the two Departments frequently competed with each other in the purchase of stores; that the consequence was that prices were enhanced, and recommended that the chief purchasing officers of each Department should consult together periodically, so that competition between them in the same markets might be avoided. He wished, further, to draw attention also to the remarks of the Committee with regard to taking stock of the stores of the Army. That was a matter which the Committee found to be in a very unsatisfactory and confused position; and it was thought advisable that there should be an annual stock-taking and valuation, it being important to know that the stocks of stores were properly kept up, which could only be ascertained by having those stocks taken fairly and accurately at specific periods. Had anything been done to give effect to the views expressed by the Committee?

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR said, that the Committee referred to had arrived at their Report after a careful investigation extending over two Sessions. He hoped that the recommendations it contained would be duly considered by the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the War Department. Many of them were of a most useful character, and would benefit the Service if carried out. The main object in view was to ensure co-operative action in the purchasing of stores between the different Departments of the State, and to confide to one branch the duty of laying in stocks of those stores which were in common use, as practised regarding cloth for the marines purchased by the Army, and beef and groceries purchased by the Admiralty for the Army. The next great point was for the Government, by this combined action, to know where to obtain supplies in time of need.

LORD ELCHO said, that in the Vote a certain sum was taken for the manufacture of small arms. He desired some information on the point, for those who took an interest in the question knew that during last Autumn there was a good deal of discussion in the Press with respect to the Martini-Henry rifle, which was to be the future arm of the British Army and Reserve Forces. It was said that it was severe in recoil and inferior in its shooting qualities. He was glad the Government had not allowed themselves to be influenced by this criticism. He went into the Committee on the Martini-Henry rifle prejudiced against that arm; but he was converted by the evidence brought before the Committee. The evidence was the ablest that could be obtained, and upon it the Committee came deliberately to the conclusion that the Martini-Henry rifle was mechanically correct. He was glad the Government had stood by that arm, and, after the exhaustive inquiry of two Committees, he thought it would be absurd to re-open the question. There might be some small defects in the weapon; but the second Committee, of which he was a member, had, after applying practical tests, come to the conclusion that there was no recoil to which any man, who knew how to shoot, could object, and that its amount was less than that in the case of the Snider. Beyond that, Mr. Ross, one of the best shots in England, had tested it, and had not found the slightest recoil beyond what might have been expected. But it had been stated that, while standing by the rifle, Government had altered the ammunition for it, by reducing the charge of powder and diminishing the weight of the bullet. As the mass of men could not see well for shooting beyond 600 yards, and this rifle would carry up to 1,200, there might with advantage be two descriptions of bullets—the heavier kind for marksmen shooting a long distance, and the lighter for use up to 600 yards. By this arrangement a soldier carrying the lighter ammunition would have nine more shots in his pouch than he could have at present, and this would be of considerable importance. If, however, anything had been done to lower the value of the weapon for long ranges the decision was a mistake, and ought to be re-considered. He had obtained a Return which showed that the Martini-Henry, with its heavy bullet, was infinitely superior in accuracy and range to any arm at present being made for any Army in Europe. He wished to know what number of Martini-Henry rifles had been made; what was the number making; what the number the Government contemplated making; and within what time the Government anticipated that the whole Army, and he presumed the Volunteers, would be supplied with that arm, and have a reserve store beside? He wished also to know what the Government thought was the amount for this country to have of surplus arms for the proper equipment of its forces, and how far the store would consist of Martini-Henry and how far of Snider rifles? Another question he should like to ask was as to what sort of bayonet was to be served out? He believed that the bayonet was of little use in actual war, and that the proportion of men killed by steel in the Franco-German War did not exceed 2 per cent. He would suggest that instead of providing the soldier with one that could be used only as a weapon, it would be wise policy to spend 2s. additional in providing him with an instrument that could be used not only as a weapon, but also as a cutter of wood, and for other purposes.

COLONEL MURE said, the question of the efficiency of the Martini-Henry rifle was a most important one, and a great deal had been said in the newspapers and elsewhere lately on the subject. There was no doubt it was a good shooting weapon, and that men like the noble Lord the Member for Haddingtonshire (Lord Elcho), Captain Ross, and other able-bodied men were capable of handling it well; but a large number of our soldiers were not able-bodied, and he therefore doubted very much if it was a weapon suitable to the whole of the service. He objected strongly to the course which had been taken by the War Office in reference to the vision tests applied to recruits. The country was spending vast sums of money in arming the troops with weapons of precision, which would shoot with perfect accuracy up to 1,000 yards; but the vision test had been reduced from time to time, until at the present moment the visual powers of recruits were only tested up to 400 yards—that was to say, the test of vision in firing at a target had been reduced from 15 to 10 feet. The reduction was one which had been rendered necessary by a failing system. It was said that the soldiers of the Line could shoot very well; but, as a matter of fact, the best practice was made by members of Volunteer corps.

COLONEL ALEXANDER wished, in reference to the last remark of the hon. and gallant Gentleman, to say that recently the Martini-Henry rifle had been supplied to the recruits of three Line regiments in Dublin, and with the new regulation as to distance, they had made excellent practice with the weapon, which they preferred infinitely to the Snider.

LORD EUSTACE CECIL, in answer to the various questions which had been put to him, said, it had always been desired that the different Departments should not compete with each other in reference to contracts, but it had not at present been considered necessary to make any alteration as to the manner in which the Directorship of Contracts should be managed. With regard to the Martini-Henry rifle, notwithstanding the assertions to the contrary, he believed it would prove thoroughly worthy of the recommendation of the Committee which brought about its adoption, and that it would prove, if not the absolute best rifle, at any rate one of the best rifles in Europe. As to the reduction in the weight of the ammunition, they were told that it was impossible that recruits could fire these arms, and that it would be necessary to re-model the ammunition, and this naturally led to a certain amount of anxiety, in consequence of which experiments had been and were still going forward in reference to the question; but, at present, no change in the charge originally fixed had been made. Whether, if, in consequence of the experiments, a diminution should be recommended, it would be made, was another matter. The regular Infantry at home were armed with this rifle in November, 1874, and it had since been determined to supply them to the Navy, Marines, Engineers, Artillery, and Volunteers. The work had not as yet been completed; but it was hoped that the whole of the troops would shortly be supplied with the Martini-Henry rifle. The reports from the different regiments were highly favourable, evincing great satisfaction both with regard to accuracy and the amount of recoil. At the present moment there were 392,900 Sniders in use and 218,000 in store, or altogether 611,000, while there were 54,000 Martini-Henry rifles in use and 183,000 in store, or altogether 237,000; and if the whole of the manufacturing power at the disposal of the Government were employed to its full extent, rifles could be produced at the rate of 4,000 per week, as against 2,000, the average number now supplied, showing what could be done on an emergency. With regard to the question of bayonets, it had been determined after mature consideration to adopt in the Army the same type of weapon used by the Irish Constabulary, on the ground that it was cheaper in price and lighter in weight than the arm now in use. With respect to the stores he believed they were, in every point of consideration, in as efficient and satisfactory a state as could be desired, and equal to any contingency that might arise; and although they could not take stock in the manner which the hon. Member for Wenlock (Mr. A. H. Brown) desired, it was yet taken in a most satisfactory manner, as appeared by the Reports of the inspecting officers of the various military districts.

LORD ELCHO said, he was desirous to know what decision the Government had come to in reference to the proper number of reserved arms necessary to be maintained in the country? The Committee of which he had the honour to be a Member had made a certain decision as to the bayonet, and he should like to hear from the Government what was the evidence upon which a subsequent Committee reversed that decision, and whether they had any objection to produce it?

LORD EUSTACE CECIL said, he was unable to answer the last question off-hand, but he believed that the great recommendation of the Irish bayonet was its lightness. With regard to the evidence upon the question, if the Reports were not of a confidential character he would produce them. As to reserve arms, 300,000 was the number fixed as the normal reserve, but the numbers in existence were—of Sniders in use and in store, 611,803; of Martini-Henrys 237,630. The total numbers were 849,433.

COLONEL MURE said, that before he could agree to the Vote for Small Arms he must draw the attention of the Committee to the question to which he had already directed the right hon. Gentleman—namely, the test of vision.

THE CHAIRMAN: That is not the question before the Committee.

COLONEL MURE said, the question of the supply of arms of long range before the Committee was intimately connected with the power of vision of our troops, and he should divide the Committee upon it. He had pointed out to the Committee, that every few years they were increasing the expenses of the country for small arms, and reducing the test of vision, and he felt he was right in saying he would take the sense of the Committee upon it.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, that inquiries had been made as to shortening the distance for testing vision, but no information had yet been received on the subject. He was quite ready to cause further inquiries to be made as to that, and also as to the chest measurement, respecting which he had not been able to ascertain that measurements were made in the careless manner which had been imputed by the hon. and gallant Member the other evening.

COLONEL MURE said, that if the right hon. Gentleman would inquire, he would find that 15 feet, which in 1863 was the test of vision recommended by Dr. Longmore, and accepted by the War Office, was, in 1870, when there was a press of recruiting, reduced to 10 feet.

LORD ELCHO said, he had been in the enlistment room, at the barracks near the National Gallery, and had seen the shortened distance test sight, and, without having any pretensions to acute vision he could easily distinguish the test marks at a distance of 30 feet, whereas the distance for the sight test was now only 10 feet.

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK said, he concurred with his hon. and gallant Friend on his left (Colonel Mure), in his statement that the test of vision was altered as he had described in 1870. It was an important point whether the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gathorne Hardy), instead of being ignorant on the subject, ought not to have satisfied himself that the test distance had been altered on good grounds. He thought the Martini-Henry rifle was as efficient a weapon as was carried by any Army in Europe, though as to the breech-block, he thought that the German Mauser was the best at that moment. With respect to the point raised by his noble Friend opposite (Lord Elcho), in reference to the bayonet he thought it a most important one. When the Army had long rifles they had long bayonets, and now they had shorter rifles the bayonet was also shortened; and that was a great disadvantage to the Infantry soldier when engaged with Cavalry. It was rumoured that a change in the bayonet was contemplated, and that the Army would be armed with a bayonet of the pattern in use in the Irish Constabulary; but however that might be, the present bayonet placed our Infantry in the disadvantageous position of carrying the shortest pike in Europe, for it was 7 inches shorter than any pike carried by foreign Armies. He was informed that that defect could be remedied by re-heating and re-drawing it, so as to lengthen it 6 inches, without altering its temper.

GENERAL SHUTE begged to correct the hon. and gallant Gentleman. Fire would stop Cavalry; but bayonets never would, whether they were long or short.

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK urged that a long arm was of service in keeping a mounted enemy at a distance, whilst the cartridge was introduced, and for that reason, he was in favour of it.

LORD EUSTACE CECIL said, with reference to the adoption of the bayonet of the Irish Constabulary, the Reports referred to were of a confidential character, and he could not therefore produce them.

Vote agreed to.

(14.) £799,700, Works, Buildings, and Repairs at Home and Abroad.

COLONEL ALEXANDER pointed out the necessity of having Richmond and Island Bridge Barracks, Dublin, supplied with Vartry water instead of canal water, as at present. He wished also to draw attention to the disgraceful condition of the huts in the Beggar's Bush Barracks, Dublin, where the 3rd battalion Grenadier Guards, of which he had the command, lay last winter. The subject of fever in those barracks had been referred to in a letter which appeared in The Times on Friday last. Captain Langham and another gallant officer died of typhoid fever within a month. A minute inspection of the barracks was ordered and was made by the principal medical officer for the whole of Ireland, assisted by the principal medical officer in Dublin, but they could not trace the origin of the disease. In February last, the cook employed at the officers' mess died, and soon afterwards a fit investigation took place. The milk and the water supplied to the barracks were tested and found pure. But it was discovered that the sewer traps throughout the barracks were of the most primitive kind, and that poisonous gas diffused itself throughout the officers' quarters. Since he left Ireland he saw by the letter in The Times that a correspondence as to the condition of the barracks had previously passed between the officers of the 2nd battalion Scots Fusilier Guards and the Engineers' department in Dublin. Of that correspondence, he had not before heard; but it was so important, that he intended to move for its production. He could not but think in all such cases the Engineer's department should be instructed to have the necessary work done without delay or regard to the fact whether the expense came out of this or that year's Estimates.

LORD CLAUD J. HAMILTON said, he wished to confirm what had fallen from his hon. and gallant Friend with respect to the unhealthy character of Beggar's Bush, Richmond, and Island Bridge Barracks at Dublin. Their condition was a public scandal, and he trusted that the Secretary of State for War would give his earliest attention to the matter. Unless something were done to improve the sanitary condition of those barracks, it was utterly useless to talk of recruiting the Army; for the buildings into which they put the men were little better than pest-houses.

SIR ANDREW LUSK, though he knew nothing about arms of precision, hoped he knew something of the affairs of common life, and he maintained that they ought to use every means which sanitary science placed within their reach to preserve their soldiers in health. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would some day remove the ugly and hideous barracks at Knightsbridge, and so beautify Hyde Park.

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK said, he was glad to find that out of the £73,000 to be expended for new works, in addition to that for the alteration of barracks, £25,000 of it was to be applied to the amelioration of married soldiers' quarters in various parts of Ireland, for which the right hon. Gentleman deserved the hearty thanks of the Army and the public. He had seen 10 married families in two rooms, consisting of between 35 and 40 individuals in each room, with no separation between them. With regard to the barrack accommodation at Dublin, the condition of the Royal Hospital at Kilmainham was as bad as that of the other barracks in the city, and required immediate attention.

LORD ELCHO said, that Votes were being agreed to very rapidly; but before this Vote was passed, he would remind the Committee that it included Votes for fortifications at Home and Abroad. In past years stiff battles were fought over them, and they were known as the "Battles of the Shields." They had, in fact, to strengthen the shields concurrently with improvements in artillery. From 35-ton guns we had got to 80-ton guns, and he wished to know if the increased power of the guns were taken into consideration in the shields that were being erected at Gibraltar, Malta, and Bermuda? Of the 800 guns ready for use, how many would be required for the Army and fortifications at home, and when would the Home forts be completely armed? How many big guns had been sent to Gibraltar, Malta, and Bermuda? Whether any of them had been mounted, and by what time all the armaments abroad would be completed with artillery suited to them?

COLONEL MAKINS directed attention to the inconvenient state of some of the chapels in which Divine service was performed for the benefit of our soldiers, and asked whether anything was proposed to be done with regard to improving the accommodation?

COLONEL MURE, in corroborating what the hon. and gallant Member opposite (Colonel Alexander) had said about the Beggar's Bush Barracks, said, that when the Scots Fusiliers took up their quarters there the barracks were in a very bad state indeed, and the result of a correspondence that took place was one of the most lamentable pieces of red tapeism that ever came under his notice. It was found on inspection that it would only cost £15 to place the barracks in a proper sanitary condition; but because the Department did not wish to alter the Estimates this trifling sum was refused, and certain temporary remedies were suggested. The consequence was some mortality in the Scots Fusilier Guards, the death of two officers of the Grenadier Guards, and he did not know of how many of the soldiers' children. He did not know anything more degrading to the Army and the Army authorities than that such mortality should have ensued for the sake of not changing the Estimates. He trusted that the right hon. Gentleman, whatever he would do in regard to recruiting, would at least direct his attention to the lives of our soldiers.

Lord Elcho

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, he was quite sensible of the distressing nature of the circumstances which had occurred at Beggar's Bush Barracks, but he was not prepared, from the information before him, to come to the conclusion that the illness of the officers stationed there had been produced by the state of the barracks. He should, indeed, be sorry to find that was the case; but he had reason to believe that there were other causes for that illness. With respect to the private soldiers quartered there, he understood they were in as good health as the men quartered in other parts of the country. In consequence of the Question which an hon. Member had given Notice that he would put to him to-morrow as to these barracks, he had directed every inquiry to be made into the matter, and he would, therefore, give the House to-morrow full particulars on the subject. He might, however, now state that the subject had engaged attention from the first moment it was brought to his notice, and he did not believe there had been any putting off of what was necessary to be done on account of any disinclination to alter the Estimates to the amount of £15. He had given instructions to the Army Sanitary Commission to go over to Dublin to examine the barracks. A question had been asked by the hon. Baronet the Member for Finsbury about the Hyde Park Barracks. There was nothing respecting them in the present Estimates; and among the many duties cast upon the Secretary of State for War, he hoped the beautifying of London would not be included. It was desirable that he should be left to regard those buildings merely as barracks.

LORD EUSTACE CECIL said, that orders had been sent to Malta, Gibraltar, and Bermuda, with regard to the strengthening the shields; but on account of peculiar local circumstances, it was impossible to tell when the works would be entirely finished. Up to the 31st of March, 1875, the number of guns distributed, or ready to be distributed, over the United Kingdom, Malta, Gibraltar, and Bermuda was 806. Of these, 667 were already in the districts for which they were destined, mounted or about to be mounted; and the remainder were in the Arsenal, and would be gradually despatched to their respective destinations. As to the weight of the guns, there were at Malta five of 28-tons, eight of 25-tons, nine of 18-tons, and 21 of 12-tons—total, 43; at Gibraltar 18 of 18-tons, and 22 of 12-tons—total, 40; and at Bermuda five of 25-tons, 16 of 18-tons, and 12 of 12-tons—total, 33.

(15.) £141,800, Military Education.

CAPTAIN NOLAN said, there had been some mistake as to who was responsible for the Order by which the number of Staff appointments to be filled by students of the Staff College was reduced from one-half to one-sixth of the whole number. Though dated 1873, the Queen's Regulations were not published until March, 1874, and it was desirable to know what Government was responsible for it.

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK said, he would also like the Secretary for War to give some explanation on this important point. The Order was first issued as a paragraph in the Queen's Regulations bearing date at the end of 1873, but actually issued to the Army in March 1874. The latter date would place it under the jurisdiction of the present Secretary for War.

COLONEL ALEXANDER thought that as it was desirable to induce men of good education to become schoolmasters in the Army the present rate of pay—namely, 3s. 9d. a-day, increasing 6d. every third year—was rather small. Would the right hon. Gentleman have any objection to a small increase?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, he should, for he had found no difficulty in getting plenty of teachers at the present salary.

SIR PATRICK O'BRIEN said, it was of great importance to have in India officers who had passed through the Staff College, and he would like to know whether it was intended that the circumstance of an officer having passed through the Staff College should be taken into account in filling up Staff appointments in India?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN said, he thought that the Regulations did not express the intentions of the right hon. Gentleman, nor the military authorities, which he took to be that on the one hand Staff appointments should be filled, as a rule, by Staff College officers; whilst, on the other hand, it should be clearly understood that they had no absolute right to those appointments. The proper system was to require merely that officers who were candidates for Staff appointments should undergo an examination, leaving them at liberty to get their education where they liked. There would be much inconvenience in restricting the appointments exclusively to officers who had gone through the Staff College.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR also was decidedly in favour of having suitable examinations, and not the favour or patronage of individuals, to guide the authorities selecting officers for Army offices. The prospect of a narrow restriction in the disposal of Staff appointments had, he said, created much alarm in the Army. It was not only the subordinate offices but the highest appointments that should be open to the competition of all qualified officers.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, he was unable to state the exact date of the publication of the Regulations referred to, which had been drawn up prior to his coming into office. As he understood that Order, it was made with the object of showing that there was no absolute right on the part of those who had passed through the Staff College to Staff appointments. He was quite ready to look into the question; but it seemed to him that they could have no absolute claim. The matter was left in the hands of the general officers, who had a general power of selecting their Staff for themselves; although no doubt great consideration would be given to those gentlemen who had passed the Staff examinations and who had practically a monopoly of the lower Staff appointments. With regard to the question about India, he was not able to say what were the rules laid down in India, because he exercised no control over the arrangements made in that country.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN hoped that the right hon. Gentleman would see his way to amend the paragraphs in the Queen's Regulations as far as they related to the higher Staff appointments, so as to place these on the same footing as the lower.

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK remarked that there still appeared to be some misapprehension on the subject of these appointments. He thought it would be a great advantage to the Service and give great hopes of the education at the Staff College if some assurance were afforded that for the future the higher grades of the Staff appointments would be equally open to officers who had been specially educated at the College, and to those selected on account of claims arising from service.

GENERAL SHUTE believed that the real grievance against the late Government's military policy was that there was not a sufficient distribution of the Staff appointments.

MR. WHITWELL wished to have some information as to the condition of the Military College at Sandhurst.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY replied that there was an increase in the number of the pupils; that the College was working well at present; and that some improvements were in progress.

Vote agreed to.

(16.) £42,200, Miscellaneous Services.

In reply to Sir ANDREW LUSK,

MR. F. STANLEY stated that the expenses of carrying out the provisions of the Contagious Diseases Act were chiefly for the salaries of medical examiners and the staff of nurses, and for travelling expenses. The sum asked for the reparation of Crimean graveyards—namely, £5,000, was so large in consequence of the graveyards having been long neglected and allowed to fall into decay. The amount now asked for would enable the cemeteries to be put into a proper condition, and it was contemplated to ask Parliament to sanction a small amount for payment to a guardian permanently residing on the spot, who would prevent any further dilapidations of the graveyards from taking place.

Vote agreed to.

(17.) £210,900, Administration of the Army.

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK expressed a hope that the Government would take steps to bring the Intelligence Department in India not only into communication with the Intelligence Department at home, but into close relations with it. It was efficiently managed; but he thought that the two should be in communication, neither being subordinated to each other.

Sir Henry Havelock

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR thought the Quartermaster General's and the Adjutant General's Departments should be amalgamated, and the Intelligence Department raised to a higher position befitting its importance. No one could have given attention to the duties as formerly assigned to the officers of the Quartermaster General, without being struck with the fact that the Intelligence department as recently formed was a mere duplicated set of Staff, and that looking at the large array of generals and Staff officers of various denominations now existing, it must be conceded that they had an ample Staff for an infinitely larger Army than they at present maintained.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, he was not able to give details of what the Intelligence Department were doing; but he believed they were in communication with every part of the Empire, obtaining information which might hereafter prove of value. He quite saw the importance of co-operation between the Intelligence Departments here and in India.

SIR ANDREW LUSK asked if it was not better to employ clerks than writers who considered themselves not exactly as Government servants, and were more difficult, consequently, to manage?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, they were mostly employed temporarily, and it was not desirable, by engaging clerks, to increase the staff and thus swell the future pension list.

Vote agreed to.

(18.) £35,300, Rewards for Distinguished Services.

(19.) £88,500, Pay of General Officers.

(20.) £514,600, Full Pay and Half-Pay of Reduced and Retired Officers.

(22.) £16,400, Pensions for Wounds.

(23.) £34,300, Chelsea and Kilmainham Hospitals (In-Pensions).

(24.) £1,201,500, Out-Pensions.

MR. A. H. BROWN wished to know when there would be any reduction in that large amount for out-pensions which they were told two years ago would be shortly reduced?

MR. STEPHEN CAVE explained that a Royal Warrant lately issued had increased the Vote by a grant of pensions to old soldiers who had served in the Army during the Peninsular and Waterloo campaigns, and in operations of that period elsewhere. Many of them were not strictly entitled to pensions, because they had commuted them long ago; but they were scattered through the country in great poverty, some being in receipt of parochial relief, and it was scarcely creditable that this should be the condition of the old soldiers of a great country. Besides, as the hon. Gentleman was no doubt aware, the spectacle they presented, without pensions, operated as a great obstacle to recruiting. The number of these men proved to be considerably larger than had been anticipated. No pension had been granted without the strictest inquiry. The highest which had been granted was 1s. 6d. a-day, and this had been given only in the case of men who were over 80 years of age, or had been wounded. It was a Vote which might still grow; but, owing to the great age of the pensioners, it could only be for a short time, after which it would rapidly diminish.

Vote agreed to.

(25.) £167,500, Superannuation Allowances.

(26.) £22,700, Non-Effective Services (Militia, Yeomanry Cavalry, and Volunteer Corps).

MARINE MUTINY BILL.

(Mr. Raikes, Mr. Hunt, Mr. Algernon Egerton.)

COMMITTEE.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clauses 1 to 17, inclusive, agreed to.

CAPTAIN PIM, in moving, after Clause 17, to insert the following clause:—

(Trials by court martial.)

“(18.) In all trials by Court Martial the prisoner, should he desire it, may have the assistance of attorney and counsel, and, should the President consider it advisable, the services of a shorthand writer may be obtained to assist the Judge Advocate in recording the proceedings,” said, he did so with the view of simplifying the proceedings.

MR. HUNT said, if it were desirable in certain cases to secure the attendance of a shorthand writer, there would be no difficulty in making a regulation authorizing the President to employ one, and it was not necessary, therefore, to insert such a provision in the Act of Parliament. His hon. and gallant Friend must, however, know very well that in many cases of courts martial no shorthand writer could be found. As to the proposal that the prisoners should have the benefit of attorney and counsel, he could not accede to it, as it would entirely alter the character of the inquiry, and would render it necessary for the Court likewise to be assisted by legal advice, which in many instances could not be procured.

Clause negatived.

Remaining clauses agreed to.

Bill reported, without Amendment; to be read the third time To-morrow.

DOVER PIER AND HARBOUR BILL.

[BILL 84.] SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That the Bill be now read a second time.”—(Sir Charles Adderley.)

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR said, that the first reading of the Bill was brought in at the same late, or rather, he ought to add, at the early hour of the morning, in a thin House, when all were tired with the labours of the past hours. It was a Bill that, if passed, would involve the country in a guaranteed expenditure of £970,000, and probably entail a much larger sum, and his only way to prevent that was in moving, as an Amendment, that the Bill be read a second time that day six months. He opposed it on the ground that it would be impossible to construct a harbour at Dover, which would not silt up. The question had been inquired into at various times, from 1836 downwards, Committees and Royal Commissions had investigated the subject, and all had reported against the attempt. One engineer who had been specially employed to examine the question, had distinctly stated that it would take at least £20,000 a-year to keep the harbour clear; and in 1865 a Special Committee had reported to the Admiralty that the deposit had then begun and must increase, which led the Government to abandon the idea of forming a close harbour. Out of nine plans proposed between 1840 and 1846 for constructing the harbour, the lowest estimate was £2,500,000, and some were as high as £4,000,000; and when completed, a deposit of at least 10 inches might be expected to take place, and the cost of dredging would be enormous. In 1873 the late Government proposed a Vote of £10,000, and it was only passed by the House by 61 votes to 60 votes—a majority of 1; and both he and the hon. Member for Aberdeen were assured that this supply was intended for a preliminary inquiry. The Treasury were opposed to the formation of the harbour; but the Board of Trade set itself to work to defeat the Treasury. The President of the Board of Trade, then Mr. Chester Fortescue, distinctly assured the House that the Treasury had satisfied themselves that the surplus revenue of the Dover Harbour Board would enable the Public Works Loan Commissioners to advance a very large portion of the funds required for the construction of this work, and in the course of the debate, one of those Commissioners, the right hon. and gallant Officer the Member for Stamford (Sir John Hay), distinctly stated that no Report upon the subject of the security for advances for the completion of the work had been made by those Commissioners. Subsequently, the Treasury, in a Letter to the Board of Trade, dated 23rd October, 1873, directed the Board to refer the security to the Public Works Loan Commissioners, in order to ascertain its value; but that the Board of Trade had failed to do, or rather refused, notwithstanding the fact that on passing the Act of 1861, known as the Passing Tolls Act, it was the intention of the Legislature, as the Board of Trade had lately avowed, to subject all loans to harbours to the independent scrutiny of that body. This Bill proposed to lend out of the Consolidated Fund a sum equal to all that the Public Works Loan Commissioners had lent to harbours since 1861. For the whole of the harbours of England not £1,000,000 had been expended by the Public Works Commissioners, and yet—and it was what he complained of—under the Bill the Board of Trade proposed to lend to the Dover Pier and Harbour Board £640,000, without interest, for five years, and without any reference to the Public Works Loan Commissioners as required by the Treasury. Moreover, the Government added as a free gift the sum of £33,000. The rate of interest to be charged on even this nominal loan was at variance with the terms of the Act of 1861, and ought not to be permitted by the House of Commons to be violated. No plan had been submitted to the Commissioners so small in area as that now proposed for Dover. It was only to extend to 310 acres; whereas an area of 520 and even 1,000 acres had been suggested. It would be derogatory to the Navy to enter such a harbour of refuge, when there existed one of the finest anchorages in the Downs, within six miles of this bay, which had not even the merit of having good holding ground. Before the Government committed themselves to this wretched scheme, he hoped they would cause a thorough inquiry to be made. An expenditure of £30,000 or £40,000 would not be justified by any Inquiry or Report now before the House. He warned the House not to trust the information before it, as he believed the scheme would altogether involve an expenditure of several millions, and take 10 or 20 years to reach its completion. It was deeply to be regretted that this outlay should be permitted, when our commercial and fishing harbours so greatly needed aid. Everywhere abroad he had seen excellent harbours, with great facilities for loading and unloading; and in the face of the commercial activity which he saw, he urged the Government to concentrate all their energies on the improvement of our mercantile harbours, and not on doubtful military and naval harbours. The fisheries of Scotland could be so largely extended by a little aid from the State as to enable the hardy fishermen to collect produce more than the value of the whole land rental of the county in which improved harbours could be erected. And looking at the millions already spent on such harbours as Alderney, and, now, Dover, he much and deeply regretted that the Government should now desire to appropriate the fund at the disposal of the Chancellor of the Exchequer in constructing a harbour about which such great doubts existed as to its being either practicable, or, if made, of any use.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word “now,” and at the end of the Question to add the words “upon this day six months.”—(Sir George Balfour.)

General Sir George Balfour

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY, in supporting the measure, said, it was a Bill for enlarging Dover Harbour, or rather for completing it. The House had incurred an outlay of nearly £1,000,000 in building the Admiralty Pier at Dover, which was becoming useless because the harbour was not completed. The Admiralty Pier was, in fact, acting as a huge groyne, and was daily silting up, for want of the completion of the harbour, and the expenditure already incurred would be useless unless another £1,000,000 were expended, in which case the pier and harbour at Dover would become in a strategical sense one of the most valuable properties belonging to the nation. The harbour would be most useful for the purpose of Continental communication and the more so in the prospect of larger ships being used, because the French Government intended to make a corresponding harbour on the other side of the Channel. It would also serve as a harbour of refuge in cases where the Downs were not available. The chief argument of necessity for the Bill was, however, grounded upon the importance of this harbour as a great military and naval station in the narrowest part of the Channel. It was also well defended, and in close proximity to great military stations. This being a hybrid Bill, must be sent to a Select Committee, when all engineering and other questions connected with it might be considered in detail.

MR. FRESHFIELD said, the days had passed with them when it was the habit to advance and expend large sums of national money on harbours of refuge as such. But that was not the present case. The case of Dover was altogether exceptional, and the present proposed works were justified not on commercial grounds alone, or mainly, but on strategical considerations, as a measure of defence. Dover had been the port that, from time immemorial, had dominated the communication between England and the Continent. Our early Sovereigns recognized and appreciated the importance of that port. King Henry VIII. expended a sum—upwards of £80,000—a very large sum in those days, in the construction of a pier, besides other works. Queen Elizabeth expended further monies in maintaining and improving the works. James I. granted a charter to the Lord Warden and to the mayor and authorities at Dover, with power to collect monies for the support of the harbour. Under those auspices the port of Dover was improved from time to time; but it was not until the reign of Her present Majesty that that great and noble structure known as the Admiralty Pier was undertaken and completed. By means of that pier vessels of all sizes were enabled to lie in deep water at all states of the tide, and embark and disembark mails, passengers, and goods. Still the harbour, with that single pier, remained very imperfect and insufficient. It was only some two or three years ago that Dover was decided by a jury not to be a harbour of safe anchorage, and the present measure was intended to remedy that state of things, and to make the port of Dover what it ought to be, and the project was based not on commercial grounds alone, as he before stated, but on strategical. Now, in considering for a moment the question whether the outlay of national money involved in that proposal was justified, he ventured to lay down two or three propositions, the first of which was that England, in case of war, must rely for her defence and security, primarily, on her first line of defence—her Navy. Secondly, that they were most assailable on the line of their southern and eastern coasts. He thought he might also assume that since their naval force had become concentrated in iron and iron-clad vessels those vessels were neither safe nor efficient, except in connection with their steam power; and that, on the other hand, they could only carry coals for about 10 days. It was obvious, therefore, that a safe port of anchorage was indispensable in the centre of the long line of coast to be watched and guarded. Now, they had no port in the Channel eastward of Portsmouth. There was a time when their main anticipations of attack or invasion proceeded from the coasts and Navy of their opposite neighbour. But there were now three Navies that might threaten them—two in the North—the last of very recent creation, that was being increased constantly, and belonging to, a Power that was coveting and seeking ports in our neighbourhood, the possession of which might involve us in complications with States with which our interests were mixed. Now, it was clear that to enable us to be prepared in case of war against attack in those directions, as well as the defence of our own shipping which passed through the Straits of Dover in such vast numbers, a port was necessary in the position of Dover. Dover had been justly said to hold the key of the gate of the Channel, and our fleets ought to be able to lie in force in that vicinity. It was indispensable to our security that there should be a safe harbour at that point, at which our naval force should be concentrated, ready to issue, with full force of steam, to the East, or West, or North, whenever we were threatened, and into which our vessels should be able to retire, for the purpose of refitting or taking in stores, but, above all, for the purpose of coaling. If he might be allowed, he would say a few words on the subject of the cost and management of the works. It would be seen that the cost of the works was estimated at £970,000, of which one-third was to be a gift contributed from the national finances. The other two-thirds to be an advance by the Board of Public Works at interest at the rate of $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. As to the first portion of the outlay it must be admitted to be a very small charge in connection with an advantage so great to the nation. As to the remainder of the outlay, its repayment was to be secured by tolls on vessels using the harbour, and on passengers passing to and from the Continent in vessels sailing from the port. Estimates had been carefully prepared, showing that those tolls would be more than sufficient to pay the interest of the monies to be advanced under the Bill, and to yield a surplus to form some return for the cost of the Admiralty Pier, which had hitherto been unproductive. It was proposed to vest the works, both new and old, in the present Harbour Board, supplemented by additional members nominated by the three Departments, so as to give a majority in their councils to the Government, in consideration of the Imperial money that would be embarked in the undertaking. The existing Harbour Board was a body of considerable local influence and experience, and they had property in the town and harbour to the extent of an annual income of some £15,000 per annum. It seemed to him that no better management could be desired for the scheme.

MAJOR DICKSON suggested that the Town Council, in the interest of the rate-payers, should have a larger representation than was given by the Bill, and would propose the addition of two more persons connected with the town of Dover on the Harbour Board. He also hoped that private rights would be equally respected as those of the Crown. He was not sure that the measure would be an unmixed benefit to the town, and feared that it would quite spoil it as a watering-place.

MR. WHITWELL observed that if the arguments of one of the hon. Members for Dover (Mr. Freshfield) were to prevail, Government might be called upon to build harbours all round the coast, and he certainly thought the safety of England lay in something more substantial than Dover Harbour; besides, they had the opinion of competent authorities, both nautical and engineering, that if the harbour were constructed, an iron-clad would never get into it. Again, they had no assurance whatever that £1,000,000 would pay for the work, which, when completed, would have to be defended by new forts, which would lead to a further outlay. It was rather a bold claim for the expenditure of a large sum of money without the prospect of any adequate return, and he thought the House ought to have farther information before they consented to the second reading of the Bill. By acting without it, they would open the way to claims equally as good.

MR. BECKETT-DENISON reminded the House that the Bill was a heritage left by the late Government, who had carried it by only 1 of a majority. He did not think there was a Member on either side of the House who would oppose the Bill if he believed it would be efficient; but they could not control the powers of Nature, and he, for one, had grave doubts of the possibility of carrying out a harbour for the purposes that had been explained to the House. The winds, the waves, and the currents would cause a silting up of the bottom which would render the harbour useless. The area of all depths was only 320 acres, and it was ludicrous to think that iron-clads would have room there to get out to sea in case of an attack. Looking to our want of success in the construction of harbours at Alderney and elsewhere, he very much feared that, if the Bill went forward, Dover Harbour would become a standing monument of our want of prudence, and before the very large sum proposed for it was expended, we should have something like probability, at least, that the enterprize would be successful.

Mr. Freshfield

SIR EDWARD WATKIN supported the Bill, because though it might have defects it was a bold measure, and would, he hoped, be carried out in a patriotic manner. He thought it was opportune, when the French Government was going to improve the harbours on the opposite coast, and larger ships were being built, to improve the harbour at Dover. But the question might arise whether Dover was the best place, and he thought the Bill should be referred to a larger Committee than a hybrid Bill, and that its terms of Reference might include the question of Channel accommodation as regarded harbours generally.

MR. HUNT said, the Bill was prepared by the late Government, and in order to make it as complete a measure as possible, the present Government took the opinion upon it of all the Departments concerned in it—namely, the War Office, the Board of Trade, the Treasury, and the Admiralty, which was that the proposed harbour would be a very important work from a naval and military point of view, and that the “silt up” would not prevail to such an extent that it could not be overcome by constant attention. If the House consented to the second reading, the various questions which had been raised could be dealt with by a Committee.

Question, “That the word ‘now’ stand part of the Question,” put, and agreed to.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed to a Select Committee.

House adjourned at a quarter after One o'clock.

THE CHANNEL ISLANDS—PRISON RULES, JERSEY.

QUESTIONS.

MR. DAVID JENKINS asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether he has any control over the administration of Criminal Law in the island of Jersey; and, if so, whether his attention has been directed to the case of Harriet Gilbert, a girl of fourteen years of age, who was recently convicted on a charge of having stolen a small piece of butter and a few pence, and sentenced by a Jersey magistrate to imprisonment for one month, half of which time was to be passed in solitary confinement; whether, as reported, she was placed in a damp cell, and during the first and third weeks of imprisonment her fare was limited to a pound of bread daily, and a totally insufficient quantity of water, which, in spite of her earnest request for a further supply to quench her thirst, was not increased; and, whether, in consequence of this treatment, the child died before the term of the sentence had expired?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: I have, Sir, no control, as Secretary of State, over the administration of the criminal law in Jersey, except when advising Her Majesty in the exercise of her Prerogative. The prisons in Jersey are governed by a Prison Board, established by an Order in Council dated 1860. No reports are made to the Home Office by this Board, and there is no inspection of prisons in Jersey by the Prison Inspectors connected with the Home Office. I believe it is quite true, as stated in the Question, that a girl 14 years of age was sentenced to imprisonment for a month for theft, that half of this time was to be passed in solitary confinement, and that during the first and third weeks of her imprisonment she was kept on bread and water. Since my attention was called to this matter, I have communicated with the Governor respecting it, and am glad to find that his attention had already been directed to the case, and that he had made very stringent inquiries. It turns out that, by no rule of the Prison Board, but by a practice which has grown up, whenever a prisoner has been sentenced to solitary confinement, he has always been kept on bread and water. The Governor very properly interfered the moment the matter was brought to his attention, and that custom has in consequence been entirely discontinued for the future. The girl, however, was sentenced to this imprisonment. She was an old offender, and had been in custody five times within the previous six months. Probably, therefore, she deserved her sentence, but the bread and water formed no part of her sentence; and the magistrate, I believe, had no notion of the existence of this rule of the prison when he inflicted the sentence. However, I am happy to say that such an incident can never occur again. The authorities of the prison deny that the girl's health suffered injury from the dampness of her cell. She seems to have been naturally of a weakly constitution, though her death was no doubt accelerated by her treatment in prison. I regret very much that such a case should have occurred, and can only repeat that it cannot occur again.

MR. DAVID JENKINS asked, whether an inquest had been held on the body of the girl, who died in prison before her sentence expired?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, there was no Coroner in Jersey, but an inquiry had been held by the Vicomte into the cause of death, and the conclusion come to was that the child died from natural causes.

MERCHANT SHIPPING ACTS AMENDMENT BILL.—QUESTION.

MR. GOURLEY asked the President of the Board of Trade, If it be his intention to proceed with or withdraw the Merchant Shipping Acts Amendment Bill, which stands for second reading on Thursday next; if the latter, if he intends to introduce an amended Bill, based upon the information and opinions of practical seafaring shipowners, shipbuilders, and seamen with whom he held interviews during his recent visit to the North Eastern ports?

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY, in reply, said, with regard to this somewhat extraordinary Question, he could only suppose that the hon. Member's wish was father to the thought, for he could find no other origin for it. He could only refer the hon. Member to the Notice Paper, on which the second reading of this Bill was the First Order of the Day for Thursday. He should have regretted that the pressure of business had delayed the Bill so long, but for the opportunity thereby afforded him of having interviews with the three classes of persons indicated in the Question; and he was glad to say that in the proposals he was making he believed he had the concurrence of the seamen's best friends and of the best shipowners throughout the country.

ARMY—BEGGARS' BUSH BARRACKS.

QUESTION.

SIR LAWRENCE PALK asked the Secretary of State for War, If his attention has been called to a statement in "The Times" newspaper of April 2nd of the sanitary condition of Beggars' Bush Barracks, and to the quotation from the Annual Report of 1873—

"A serious sanitary defect in barracks awaits removal until the Engineer department is in the possession of the necessary funds. I allude to cess pits in the vicinity of the officers' quarters and those of the barrack sergeant;"

whether numerous deaths, including those of two officers, have not taken place from scarlet and typhoid fever; whether a third officer was not taken ill and his life for a time despaired of; and if the officers' cook has died from typhoid disease in those barracks; and, whether the existence of these cess pits and ash pits, reported upon by the Dublin Sanitary Committee in 1873, and the report duly transmitted to the Commander in Chief in Ireland still exists?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: Sir, I will give my hon. Friend such information as I have been able to collect on this subject. With respect to the Annual Report of 1873, I am not able to discover what that Report is; at all events, it is not an official Report connected with my Department, though I have no reason to doubt that some such Report was made. In December, 1873, the officer of Royal Engineers asked permission to remove these cess pits, and accordingly they were done away with, and the privies in the rear of the mess premises and barrack sergeant's quarters were converted into water-closets by March, 1874. With respect to the second Question, I am sorry to say that there were several deaths in 1873, especially of children. The medical officer in charge of the 2nd Battalion of Scots Fusilier

Guards thus reports as to the year 1873—

"Zymotic diseases have furnished a larger number of admissions than usual, owing to the occurrence of enteric and scarlet fevers when the battalion was quartered in Beggars' Bush Barracks, Dublin. These diseases could not be traced to any sanitary defects existing in those barracks. There were seven cases of enteric fever of mild form. With the exception of two, all recovered. Among the men there were 10 admissions from scarlet fever of a mild type; all did well. There were 21 cases of scarlet fever among the children, seven of whom died."

In 1874, I find that in the 3rd battalion of Grenadier Guards four cases of typhoid fever occurred in connection with these barracks. Whether they were attributable or not to insanitary conditions within the barracks is, however, open to question. The first case was that of a soldier admitted into hospital with typhoid fever, after confinement in prison cells. He stated that he had been employed in cleaning a drain near the officers' kitchen. The next case was that of Captain Langham, who resided in barracks, but who was absent in Glasgow from the 29th of October to the 3rd of November. About a fortnight after his return he appears to have been attacked. Being married, he resided at some distance from the officers' mess, from which, however, his meals were procured. The third case is that of Captain Van de Weyer. The surgeon-major stated that this officer was from the 20th to the 23rd of November on a visit to a country house, in which, it is believed, a case of typhoid fever had occurred some time before. On the 24th and 25th of November he was in barracks, apparently quite well, and on the 26th he left Kingstown for England. About a fortnight afterwards, at a country seat where he had gone to shoot, he was taken ill, with symptoms of fever, of which he died near Windsor. The fourth case was that of a mess cook, a civilian, who was employed in the kitchen during the day, sleeping outside. He died out of barracks. I am informed that the Medical department has no knowledge of the third officer alluded to in the Question in connection with these barracks. The principal medical officer in Ireland, in his Report, January 2, 1875, states—

"The general health of the troops has been good during the period specified. The Grenadier Guards have not been so healthy for the past 20 years."

As I have already stated, the cesspits have long since been removed, and no cause of disease can now be found in the barracks; but additional ventilation for the drains has been authorized, and the Army Sanitary Committee will inspect the place on the 12th of April.

PUBLIC HEALTH ACTS—SANITARY CONDITION OF FOLKESTONE.

QUESTION. PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

SIR EDWARD WATKIN asked the President of the Local Government Board, If he has received a copy of the resolutions of a public meeting held at Folkestone on the 31st March (the mayor in the chair), and a letter from the medical officer of health (Mr. Bateman) in reference to a statement reported to have been made by the noble Lord the Member for Westmeath, impugning the sanitary condition of the town; and, if the details given by the Medical Officer of Health are correct, viz.: that in the years 1873 and 1874 there were only four fatal cases of fever and scarlatina, and in the three past months of this year no case of fever at all, in a population of 13,000; while the whole average mortality in past years has been under 17 per 1,000?

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH, in reply, said, he had received only that morning a letter in reference to the matter to which the hon. Gentleman alluded, accompanied by a report from the medical officer of health for Folkestone; that the statement which the hon. Gentleman had quoted was in accordance with the facts stated in the letter, and that there was no information at the office of the Local Government Board to lead him to doubt to accuracy of that statement.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU said, as the statement just made would seem to impugn his accuracy, he must claim the indulgence of the House for a few moments whilst he set himself right in its estimation. He considered it a duty which every Member owed to the honour of the House, not to rest for a moment under the imputation of having deceived the House even in the smallest particular. In the first place, he had a right to complain of want of courtesy on the part of the hon. Gentleman who had put down this Question without having given him any Notice by letter or otherwise of his intention to ask it. He might have been absent, he might not have returned from the Recess, and then the hon. Gentleman would have had an opportunity of blackening his character while he would not have been able to defend himself. The way in which this matter arose was as followed:—While the House was in Committee on the Artizans Dwellings Bill he was anxious to extend the operation of the measure to places of less population than 25,000, the figure proposed by the Home Secretary. His argument was, that in the smaller towns, worse places, more dens of fever, were to be found than in the large towns; and he gave as an example a town in which he had lived for many years, and with which he has well acquainted—namely, Folkestone. He stated then—and he repeated now—that there were dens of fever there worse than could be found anywhere else in this country. That statement was challenged by a town councillor of the name of Harrison, who went round with a paper with the view of getting the Mayor to get up an indignation meeting, because he was anxious that those dens should not be inspected, while he (Lord Robert Montagu) and those who were acting with him tried to force inquiry into those matters. The argument which he (the town councillor) used to the lodging-house keepers was that, if statements were published about the sanitary condition of Folkestone, visitors, by whom the lodging-house keepers made their livelihood, would not come to reside there in summer. “We are great as Diana of Ephesus; we gain our livelihood by lodging-houses; no matter about the health of the people.”

MR. SPEAKER said, that the noble Lord was entitled to give a personal explanation, in order to show the accuracy of the statement he had made; but he was now passing the bounds of explanation by debating the question.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU said, he would confine himself to explanation. An indignation meeting was held, and to show the House the way he was attacked, he would quote one sentence from the speeches which were made at that meeting, when the resolutions to which the hon. Member's Question referred were passed. One speaker, the person to whom he had already referred, characterized his remarks in Committee of the House as being “the most glaring, lying, barefaced statement I ever saw in print.” Had he brought that language before the House as a Question of Privilege, he ventured to think that the Speaker would have said that it was a serious breach of the Privileges of that House to make such an assertion with respect to the remarks of any Member in Committee. He did not, however, think it right to take up the time of the House by bringing the matter forward as a Question of Privilege. Nor did he think that those persons were worthy of the distinction of being brought to the Bar of the House, as they were persons who were always daily to be seen in their shirt sleeves. He preferred, rather, to treat them with the contempt they deserved; but he unhesitatingly asserted that if any hon. Gentleman would go to Folkestone and inspect the place, they would see for themselves that in the statement he had made in Committee he was not deceiving the House. He referred them also to the Registrar General's Returns, as published in The Times on the 19th of August last, where they would find that Folkestone stood, not in the first, nor the second, but in the third category of towns where the death-rate was 23 per 1,000, and not 17 per 1,000—that high death-rate being caused by those very fever dens to which he had referred. The rest of Folkestone was healthy enough, and it was in the localities of those fever dens where the death-rate was so high as 23 per 1,000. He would only add that in the statement he had made in Committee he had spoken accurately, and he never would be guilty of deceiving the House in any matter.

SIR EDWARD WATKIN said, he wished to say a single word in reference to what the noble Lord had said about not having received Notice of the Question on the Paper. He did not think that he had been guilty of any want of courtesy towards the noble Lord. When he gave Notice of the Question he was aware that the noble Lord was in the House, and therefore he thought there was no occasion to call the attention of the noble Lord to the matter, as he otherwise would have done. He would not enter into the matter of controversy beyond saying that he believed that the statements which had been made to the House in regard to the condition of Folkestone had still been made in error.

NAVY—THE MARINE CORPS—PURCHASE.—QUESTION.

MR. ANDERSON asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, If he has yet issued the promised Order to put a stop to buying out officers in the Marine Corps; and, if so, if he will state the nature of it?

MR. HUNT, in reply, said, that officers of Marines were to make a declaration, on their honour, that they had not received any pecuniary inducement to retire. A declaration of a similar character was required on promotion, transfer, and retirement on half-pay.

ITALY—FLORENCE—IMPRISONMENT OF BRITISH SUBJECTS.—QUESTION.

COLONEL LOYD LINDSAY asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether he will make inquiries into a case of alleged ill-treatment of two Englishmen who are stated in "The Times" of April 5th, to have been arrested by Italian gendarmes while making a walking expedition from Florence to Ravenna, and while so engaged were taken up, locked in a cell, and on the following morning were manacled together and marched a distance of twelve miles into Ravenna, where they were taken to the prison and deprived of all their property; and whether, should the statement prove correct, proper redress will be asked for?

MR. BOURKE: I have to state, Sir, in reply, that a report on this case has been received which is substantially identical with that which has appeared in the Press. The matter was referred by the Consul at Florence to Sir Augustus Paget, who at once addressed a representation to the Italian Government, asking for a searching inquiry to be made. There has not yet been time for the answer to that representation to be received.

IRELAND—SMALL POX (GALWAY AND MAYO).—QUESTION.

CAPTAIN NOLAN asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, If he can inform the House how many cases of Small Pox have occurred since the 1st of October in the counties of Galway and Mayo; what has been the percentage of fatal results among those attacked; and, in what number of the cases which have terminated in death had the sufferers been vaccinated, and in what number inoculated?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH, in reply, said, he was afraid he was not in possession of sufficient information to enable him to reply fully to the Question. As it referred to the practice of inoculation, which was illegal and would therefore be kept secret both by those who carried it on and by those who submitted their children to it, the cases would, of course, not come to the knowledge of the authorities, except in rare instances. He regretted that he had reason to believe this practice had to some extent been resorted to in that part of Ireland to which the hon. and gallant Member referred. A case had been lately detected and prosecuted to conviction, the defendant having been sentenced to six months' imprisonment with hard labour. He trusted that conviction would have a salutary effect. As to the prevalence of small-pox in the two counties named, he had to say that the cases last year had been very few compared with those in previous years in which small-pox had extensively prevailed.

BREWERS' LICENCE DUTY.

RESOLUTION.

MR. JOHN HOLMS, in rising to move—

said, he felt deeply sensible of his inability to do justice to this question, but he would endeavour to place the subject clearly and completely before the House, having due regard to brevity, on the one hand, and the importance of the question on the other. It was essentially necessary at the outset to remove some misapprehensions which existed in the public mind in relation to this question generally. There were some, he understood, who believed that in 1862 the brewers were instrumental in having the hop duty removed, and that they were quite satisfied with the Brewers' Licence Duty as it now existed. The brewers had nothing whatever to do with the removal of the duty on hops, that work being entirely carried out by the hop-growers themselves, under the very able leadership of the right hon. Member for Chester (Mr. Dodson). Another misapprehension was that this question was, to some extent, part of the great licensing question which had occupied so much attention for the last two years. It was in no sense connected with that great question; indeed, it might well be discussed from the view of the hon. Member for Carlisle (Sir Wilfrid Lawson), who, he regretted to say, could not be present that evening owing to domestic affliction, as from the commercial and financial point of view from which he himself wished to treat it. Again, it was said that the brewers of this country were large and wealthy traders; but, so far as they were furnished with the facts, that was not the case. Last year the number was 28,968, and of that number 9,000 were so small that their whole annual turn-over did not exceed from £500 to £600. Whilst 18,600 did a business of under £2,000 of a turn-over, no doubt some of the remaining 1,368 did very large businesses indeed. He was perfectly well aware that the interests of the large brewers of the country were well represented in that House, and that probably it would be deemed presumption in him to bring forward such a question. Looking to the position of the small brewers, the course of affairs had been, as in relation to manufactures generally, that the larger gradually absorbed the smaller; but that was a state of affairs which need not be encouraged by unnatural means. Now, this licence duty undoubtedly operated in that direction. The tax was imposed in 1862; but it was essential to look at the Financial Statement of 1860, which was one of the most notable among the many made by the late Prime Minister, when he was Chancellor of the Exchequer. One of its main features was the lowering of the duty on the light wines of Europe. There was a slight reduction in the hop duty, preparing the way for its repeal in 1862. The Revenue at that time was only £150,000 more than the Expenditure, and the question was how to abolish the hop duty and avoid a deficit—in other words, how far it was possible to substitute with equity to all parties some other form of impost which would entirely set free the foreign trade as well as the British trade in hops. To do this the Chancellor of the Exchequer proposed to re-adjust the licence duty as it then existed, so as to take in the whole of the hop duties at that time. It was found that in the smallest quantity of beer that could well be brewed—one barrel—2 lbs. of hops and two bushels of malt would be used, and if 2 lbs. of hops were taxed at the then rate of 14s. per cwt, there would be 3d. a-barrel as the future outcome of the Brewers' Licence Duty. On that basis this tax was imposed. The Chancellor of the Exchequer held out to the brewers and consumers that they would obtain a supply of hops at a lower rate, and that, therefore, this would not really be a tax. In his (Mr. Holms's) opinion the right hon. Gentleman was perfectly justified in the view he then entertained. Before the duties on light foreign wines had been reduced, the importation was 6,000,000 gallons; but in 1862 it had increased to 9,650,000 gallons, and since to a far greater extent. It was calculated that an increase in the importation of hops would also follow the change proposed, and that hope was founded on the fact that whereas the average amount of the import duty was but £30,000 a-year, it amounted in 1862 to £110,000. The right hon. Gentleman was therefore justified in believing the price of hops would be lower, but the result was entirely different. In fact, hops were a great deal higher now than they had ever been known in this country before. In re-adjusting the Brewers' Licence Duty the Chancellor of the Exchequer of that day laid it down, as a rule, that the charge should be so taken as to relieve the small brewers, who, in comparison with the larger, were hardly dealt with. This was a matter of very considerable importance; but the fact was that even now the pressure was still the other way, for while the man who only brewed 20 barrels of beer paid at the rate of 7½d. per barrel duty, the brewer of 50 barrels paid only 6½d., the brewer of 100, 5d. per barrel, and the brewer of 1,000, 3½d. So that the injustice remained till this day. Undoubtedly before the hop duty was removed everybody paid according to the amount of hops consumed; but now the poor man whose beer had only a "nosing" of hops had to pay the same through the licensing duty as the rich man who used 1s. 8d. worth of hops per barrel. The Chancellor of the Exchequer at that time said—

"It would not be quite just to the regular brewer when called upon to make an equivalent payment in respect of the hop duty, that the private brewer should be allowed to go scot-free."—[3 Hansard, clxvi. 408c.]

Again, that it would be extremely hard that the brewer who brewed for sale should pay 3*d.* a barrel in lieu of duty, and that, at the same time, anyone who brewed for himself should be allowed to brew without doing so: And again, that—

"We are going to require from brewers for sale a payment in hard cash for every pound of hops they are estimated to use, and we cannot fairly make that demand upon them if we give to persons who choose to brew in private a positive premium by telling them that they shall have their hops free of duty without any payment at all. It may be true that brewers for sale brew more cheaply than private brewers. With that we have nothing to do. Our business is simply not to interfere. We ought not, without grave reasons, to give a premium to private brewers: but we should, as far as we can, leave both parties in the position in which we find them, asking them to bear the same burden of taxation."—[3 Hansard, clxvi. 782-3.]

Nothing could be more emphatic than that language, yet not a single private brewer had paid any duty since 1862, and some large private establishments were now brewing at least as much as anyone out of nine-tenths of the small brewers for sale. A letter he had received from a small brewer gave an instance of a private establishment which brewed 200 quarters of malt a-year, and it was added that 20,000 brewers who brewed less ale in the year were obliged to pay duty. Many large farmers now brewed beer for their homesteads, and even paid part of the wages in it; undergraduates at the University Colleges were getting their beer duty free; and some large places of business in London were taking advantage of the fact that they could brew without paying more duty than that upon hops. The House accepted the maxim of Adam Smith that the subjects of the Realm ought to contribute to its revenues as nearly as possible in proportion to their ability; but that maxim was violated when the rich nobleman was exempted from a duty paid by the small brewer at his gate. His belief was that had Parliament, in 1862, had the least notion that private brewers were to escape, the measure of that year would not have been passed. It was not so much of the amount of this tax as of the manner in which it was raised that he complained; it was one of those taxes that shackled trade and crippled industry. Had a slight increase been placed on the malt duty in 1862, we should have been rid of the difficulties attending the collection of this tax, and the worrying of the small brewer, and the private brewer would have paid his proportionate share of it. The tendency of our legislation in this country had been to encourage free trade, to open our ports to raw materials, and to remove every shackle from industry. In 1830 Mr. Poulett Thompson illustrated the condition of manufactures that were impeded by taxation, and he read a letter describing the hindrances to the manufacture of paper incidental to the collection of the duty upon it. That letter was strikingly analogous in the description it gave to another letter which he held in his hand, which related how brewers were hampered by having to give lengthened notice of the exact quantity they desired to brew, and to place distinctive marks on all their rooms, under a penalty of £200, while they had to pay the duty in advance; so that it was a tax on capital as well as on production. What trade would stand the re-imposition of a duty on what had once been relieved? Would calico printers tolerate a re-imposition of the duty of 3½*d.* a square yard on calico? Yet the Brewers' Licence Duty was practically a repealed tax re-imposed. It was clearly unfair as well as impolitic that any particular trade should be singled out for taxation opposed to the general tendency of our legislation. In 1830, three reasons influenced Parliament in removing the duty—first, it was done to remove a shackle from trade; secondly, it was done to remove the very inequality which was now urged as a grievance, for it was said at the time that the beer duty fell wholly on the lower and middle classes, who did not brew their own beer; and, lastly, it was said that the existence of the beer duty favoured the consumption of ardent spirits, which, he believed, was a sound reason for repealing it. Contrary to the intention of Parliament, however, the condition of the small brewer was worse at the present moment than in 1830, because of the trammels imposed upon his trade. There were 27,000 of these small brewers, many of whom retailed their own beer. They had first to pay the duty on malt; they had then to pay on the malt in their brewery; thirdly, if they were retailers they had to pay a licence duty; and, lastly, they paid income tax. They were, however, in the latter case in a different position from their brother-manufacturers, because the Inland Revenue had before them the returns of the malt they had used, and they corrected one return with the other. He believed that if the beer brewed for the working classes was of a sound and good quality there would be a fair chance of its displacing a portion of the present enormous consumption of ardent spirits. There was considerable misapprehension as to the drinking habits of the working classes and the use they were making of their money, and he had, therefore, prepared two sets of facts which threw some light on the subject. The first showed the home consumption of beer, wine, and spirits in 1860 compared with 1873. In beer the increase had been 35 per cent; but when it was recollected that in England and Wales beer was the beverage of the working classes, while very little was drunk in Scotland and Ireland, and when it was further recollected that the population of England and Wales had increased during that interval by 17 per cent, while taking Ireland and Scotland together, there had been no increase of population at all, it would be found that there had been an excess of 30 per cent in beer over the consumption of 1860. In wine, however, the excess of increase in 1873 as compared with 1860 was not less than 137 per cent. In spirits the increase was 30 per cent; but in brandy, of which the working classes drank least, it amounted to 158 per cent. The rich man now drank three bottles of wine where he used to drink one bottle, although the amount of duty paid into the Exchequer upon our total import of wine was precisely the same. But it was far otherwise in regard to beer. The poor paid precisely in the ratio of their consumption, and they paid an increase of £6,200,000 as compared with 1860. He would not deny that in many places they drank too much beer, but during the last Easter holidays, staying in a country house in a neighbouring county, he was told by his host that the labourers of that part of the country did not get beer more than once a week. They met a labourer whom they questioned upon the subject, and he told them that he drank cold tea to his dinner every day but Saturday, and he believed that this was true of many other counties. The other set of facts which he had prepared, showed that if more beer were consumed, the consumption of beer was not greater, but less in proportion to other articles of diet. In 1860 the home consumption of butter was at the rate per head of the population of 3·26; in 1873, 4·39. In cheese it was, in 1860, 2·24; in 1873, 4·69. In currants and raisins it was 3·59; in 1873, 4·29. In eggs it was 5·83; in 1873, 20·56. In potatoes, 2·18; in 1873, 26·17. In tea, 2·67; in 1873, 4·11. In malt, however, it was 1·45; in 1873, 1·98. So that the working classes were not spending the whole of their increased earnings on alcoholic liquors. It was an axiom that whatever manufacture was carried on should be left as free as possible to the manufacturer. Let the Government tax the article used in the manufacture of beer if they pleased, or after the manufacturer had made it, but not trammel the man in making the article itself. It ought also to be borne in mind that we had competitors all over the world, and unless we left the manufacture of beer as free as possible, our brewers would find themselves at a disadvantage with their rivals. Our export trade in beer already amounted to £2,500,000 a-year, and we had competitors in Austria, Germany, and elsewhere. The question had been raised whether this was a tax that fell upon the producer or the consumer. He would take it either way; but if the producer had paid it, the present system as the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Lowe) had pointed out, gave a qualified monopoly to the rich brewer, who more easily paid the duty beforehand. He was, however, quite confident that, as a rule, the consumer paid the duty in the shape of a deteriorated article, and that, therefore, this was a consumer's question, and it was for the House to consider further how far they were by this tax encouraging adulteration, especially in the beer produced for the poorer classes. He could not imagine that the brewers expected that this duty could be entirely repealed without something like a registration licence being substituted for it. He had, however, no doubt that this was one of those duties which ought to be removed at the very earliest date. No one could expect that it would be repealed at the expense of the creation of a new tax; but if it were unjust, and he believed it to be, in addition, most injurious and impolitic, the Executive Government ought to remove the duty at the very earliest moment. The hon. Member concluded by moving his Resolution.

MR. SHERRIFF, in seconding the Motion, said, he objected to the duty in question because it was saddled on the brewers in consequence of anticipations which had never been realized. At the time when the hop duty was abolished, it was supposed that a large reduction would be made in the price of hops; and as it was thought that the brewers would receive all the advantage, it was deemed right and fair that they should pay to the Exchequer a portion of the benefits they were to receive. What, however, were the facts? In 1862 the price of hops was between £6 and £8 a cwt.; now the same quality of hops could not be bought under £14 to £16. The brewers, therefore, instead of receiving an advantage, had to pay double the price they paid in 1862, and on that account this tax ought to receive great amelioration, if it were not completely removed. He objected to the tax also on account of its inequality. Since the tax was levied, there had been a reduction in the number of small brewers to the extent of over 700 a-year; and he believed, if it were continued, an industry which was of great importance to many towns and country districts would be altogether extinguished, so far as small brewers were concerned, and the manufacture placed in the hands of a few gentlemen who had the command of unbounded capital. He was aware that it had been said that matters affecting taxation ought not to be brought forward before the Chancellor of the Exchequer had made his annual statement, or upon Budget night, or after the financial scheme had been launched. Still, he hoped that the present being no Party question, and one which was founded in reason and justice, Her Majesty's Government would see their way to a reduction, if not to a total abolition of the tax.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I regret, Sir, very much, for various reasons, the absence from the House of the hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle (Sir Wilfrid Lawson). We always listen with pleasure to the speeches of the hon. Baronet, and the cause of his absence to-day must enhance our regret that he is not in his place. I regret his absence also because he has placed upon the Paper a Notice which appears to me to indicate the proper mode of dealing with the question which has been submitted to us by the hon. Gentleman opposite, and I will take upon myself the duty the hon. Baronet would have discharged were he present, and conclude by moving the Previous Question upon the Resolution of the hon. Member for Hackney. I do so partly because, as has just been said by the hon. Member for Worcester (Mr. Sherriff), it is not very convenient that the House should come to a Resolution of this character upon the eve of the Budget; but, at the same time, I wish distinctly to say that I do not at all challenge the propriety of discussions of this sort—a fair and full discussion upon the merits of taxes, either before the Budget or when it is laid before the House, or, indeed, at any time that may appear to be desirable for attracting attention to the subject. I will go further, and say that with regard to this particular question, I think it is one which very well deserves some quiet and candid and impartial consideration on the part of Parliament; because, although it has been brought forward from time to time for a good many years, and although it has been more than once adverted to in this House by private Members, by Chancellors of the Exchequer, and by other Ministers, yet unquestionably it has been commonly discussed under circumstances of some disadvantage. I am ready to concede to the hon. Member for Hackney that there is some force in the opening part of his observations with regard to some of the fallacies with which the question has been more than once met. For instance, it is a fallacy to deal with it and seek to set it aside on the ground that brewers are a rich body. It is perfectly true that there are a very large number of brewers who are men of very moderate means, and who are not to be passed over because it is said that they belong to a rich body of persons. I would even go beyond that, and say, Let them be as rich as you please, they are not to be treated unjustly. They have a right to come forward and say—"You are not to treat us unjustly simply because we are rich. We demand justice, and if we can show that we are treated with injustice, we have a right to ask for redress." Again,

I would frankly admit that there is no reason why we should say, We will not deal with this manufacture as we deal with other manufactures, because it is capable of being turned to abuse. No doubt, any intoxicating liquor may be, and often is, abused; but as long as men conduct their business fairly and properly, and are engaged in a legitimate calling like this, odium ought not to be attached to it, or fair play withheld from it. Therefore, I say it is quite reasonable and fair that every question should be heard, and temperately and fairly considered. On the other hand, I must be permitted an observation on the other side. I think it would be very unfortunate that anything like what may be called "Party" and "political" feeling should be imported into a question of this sort. It would be greatly to be lamented if in a question like this any political influence which might be supposed to be possessed by a body of men such as the brewers are, should be allowed to enter into the consideration of the subject, as though hon. Members were not to regard it on its own merits and decide it without reference to the influence a particular body of men may exercise in the constituencies. I believe there are circumstances connected with the agitation on this subject which justify me in making that remark, and in warning hon. Members that in a question of this sort they ought to lay aside all considerations except those of abstract justice and expediency. Now, the hon. Member for Hackney asks us to affirm a Resolution of a very serious character. He asks the House to say that the Brewers' Licence Duty is unjust and unfair in its incidence, and that it ought to be repealed. Well, I believe if we were to take any one tax upon our list of taxes, and devote ourselves exclusively to a consideration of that tax in order to see whether we could not find inequalities, or what might be called unfairness in it, there is scarcely any tax that would absolutely stand such a scrutiny. Take, for instance, the duty on tea. It would be perfectly competent for anybody to say that it is unfair because it presses equally on tea of a high quality and on tea of a low quality. I hardly like to refer to the income tax; but who has not heard it said that it was unfair in its incidences? Then, again, you might take local taxation, and many persons would be ready enough to say that it is unfair in its incidence, because it presses unequally on different classes of property. If you take any article in the whole category of taxes, it is probable that you will find in it some kind of unfairness and inequality. But you are not on that account to come forward and ask the House of Commons to pass a solemn Resolution that any tax in which you can find inconveniences or inequalities of that sort is to be condemned as unjust; and still more ought you to be cautious that you do not carry a Motion of that kind to the extent of declaring that the tax is so unfair that it must necessarily be repealed. If there are inequalities, let us consider what these inequalities are; whether they admit of being remedied without the necessity of sweeping away the tax altogether, or whether the tax is such that however you amend it, it still must remain unjust, and therefore ought to be abolished. This is the last position which the Motion asks the House to take, and which the hon. Gentleman in his speech points to. Well, now, where is the essential injustice of this tax? I am not talking at this moment about the particular incidence or the scale of the tax—I will come to that presently—because I am disposed to admit that there is something to be said on the scale of the tax. But let us look at the tax itself, irrespective of the particular pressure of the scale in its present form. The hon. Gentleman who moved the Motion made an admission or statement towards the end of his speech which I was very glad to hear, and in which I think he was perfectly right. I doubt whether everybody promoting this movement, or the brewers out-of-doors, will agree with him. He said it was a consumers' question, and I believe it. I will not take upon me to say what is the precise mode in which this tax is distributed in the prices charged to the consumers of beer; but of this I am sure, that the original burden laid upon the brewers and sellers of beer is taken into account in the arrangements they make; that it bears upon the rate of profit they make; that it influences the price paid, either the actual price in money, or which is more unsatisfactory, the price paid in deterioration of quality, by the consumer. We must, therefore, approach it as a consumers' question. The hon. Member asked whether there was not an injustice in this tax. What are the circumstances? It has long been the policy of Parliament to raise a considerable amount of revenue by taxation imposed upon various intoxicating liquors—spirits, wine, and beer, or the materials that compose beer. A direct duty on beer has long been given up. In the year 1862, the duty upon hops was put an end to; and at that time this surcharge upon brewers' licences was introduced instead. Well, the hon. Gentleman says the reason why the duty on hops was taken off in 1862 was that the duty on light wines had been greatly reduced, and that it was thought fair by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, my right hon. Friend opposite (Mr. Gladstone), at the time to make some reduction in the duties on beer in order to balance the reduction that had been made in the duties on light wines. I confess that is a new view to me. I confess that is not the way in which I heard the speech of my right hon. Friend when he brought forward the Budget in 1862. As far as I recollect, the main point that was made by the Chancellor of the Exchequer was this—that there were inherent objections to the hop duty; that it caused great inconvenience; that it was productive of gambling and uncertainty, and that it was open to a great many objections. Therefore, he proposed to meet those objections by abolishing the duty. The hon. Gentleman curiously enough, without perceiving the tendency of his own argument, quoted the statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to the effect that he would endeavour to provide some other means—as he could not spare the revenue—by which he might be able to bring into the Revenue about the same amount as had been obtained from the hop duty. But if the right hon. Gentleman was proposing to take off the hop duty in order to reduce the tax on beer in compensation for the reduction in light wines, I do not quite understand why he should substitute something that would bring in the same amount of Revenue from the same article. I have never been able to discover either in what was said on that occasion or on subsequent occasions by my right hon. Friend, that he held out any idea, such as brewers are apt to suppose existed in his mind, that this was a mere temporary removal of the hop duty, and a temporary placing of it on brewers' licences with the view to get rid of it altogether whenever he had a sufficient surplus. What the Chancellor of the Exchequer proposed to do was to alter the incidence of the tax without diminishing the flow of Revenue into the Exchequer. Now, has he done more than that? I think not. I had a comparison made some time ago as to the amount that came into the Exchequer under the present system, and what would probably have come into it under the old hop and licence duties. The calculation was made for 1873; but it would be applicable more or less to the year which has just passed. The result is, that in 1873 the brewers purchased something like 65,500,000lb of hops, and according to the old duty of $1\frac{1}{2}$ d. per pound, this would have produced £409,000. There would have been also the old licence duty, which would have produced about £78,000; and the total result of the maintenance of the old duties in the year 1873 would have been about £487,000. The amount which was actually paid into the Exchequer under the present system was £448,000, or £39,000 less than the Exchequer would have received if the old system had been maintained. That proves this at all events, that the arrangement was one which gave effect to that which the Chancellor of the Exchequer said was his intention in doing away with the hop duty—namely, to substitute for it a tax in the form of an addition to brewers' licences which should produce somewhere about the same amount of revenue as the hop duty had produced. The arrangement has produced rather less. The Exchequer is not a gainer thereby, and the consumer, we may presume, is left in about the same position as before. The hon. Gentleman says that the Chancellor of the Exchequer, when he made this change, held out certain advantages which have not been realized—that he said brewers would not suffer from the additional burdens put on them, because they would get their hops at a lower rate. The hon. Gentleman says that has proved a delusion, and that the price of hops has not fallen but, on the contrary, has risen. I do not intend to enter into the question whether the price of hops has risen or fallen, because I do not think it has anything to do with the question. The point is, what the effect of the removal of the duty upon hops was, and whether if you had not removed that duty hops would not have been higher now than they are. It is true that the price of hops has risen, though the rise has been a good deal exaggerated; but I cannot see how, because the price has advanced after the duty has been taken off, therefore the taking off the duty did no good at all. Some years ago the duty was taken off gloves; yet I know that I pay more for my gloves than I did before; but it does not follow that there has been no relief to the purchasers of gloves by means of taking off the duty. The fact, is that there has been a very large increase in the demand for hops, and the effect has naturally been to raise the price. I suspect, however, that you will find that the price has been steadier than it was before; and, certainly, if the duty had not been removed, the price of hops would have been higher than it now is. The hon. Gentleman points out, as did the hon. Member for Worcester, that the number of small brewers is continually diminishing, and he says you must attribute that to the alteration which was made as to brewers' licences. The licence duty crushes, as I understood him, small brewers. But if the hon. Gentleman had carried out his researches a little further he would have seen that the diminution in the number of small brewers did not commence with the abandonment of the hop duty, but that it has been going on for a great number of years—since 1830 most assuredly. The reduction since 1830 was from 49,228 to 38,000 in 1862. No doubt there has been a further decrease since; but it is a decrease which is due not to this system or any other system, but to natural causes, which would have operated whether you kept up this duty or not. The natural advantages possessed by large capitalists and great brewers have been quickened and advanced of late years by the development of the means of communication, and the consequent ease with which beer in large quantities can be transported from extensive manufacturing centres over the whole country. The almost inevitable result of this has been to close many of the small breweries which previously existed in parts of the country placed beyond the reach of the large towns. These brewers have been displaced by the superior energy and the great excellence of production shown by the large brewers whose names are household words among us, and not in any way by the operation of the licensing of brewers. I would also point out, as confirming this view, and as an answer to another objection raised by the hon. Gentleman, that the same process which has resulted in the reduction of the number of small brewers has operated also upon the practice of private brewing, which instead of being a formidable competitor to the business of the public brewers, has become altogether insignificant, in comparison. We cannot say what is the exact amount of private brewing, for we have no Returns; but we can say what is the difference between the quantity of malt charged with duty and the quantity known to be used by the public brewer; and it is fair to infer that the remainder chiefly represents what is used by private persons. Until about the year 1862 the difference between the total quantity of malt charged with duty and that known to have been used by public brewers was about 2,700,000 bushels. This may be taken to represent the quantity used by private brewers and manufacturers of vinegar and yeast. During the last seven years the difference to which I allude, instead of being 2,700,000 bushels, has fallen to 400,000 bushels, about half of which, it is fair to assume, has been used in the manufacture of yeast and vinegar; so that, as will be seen, the consumption of malt in private brewing is less than half per cent of the total consumption. While I admit that in theory an apparent injustice is done by allowing the private brewer to use malt which has not paid duty, I contend that in practice the injustice done is very insignificant; but that is a matter that lies rather apart from this part of the question. I now come to another portion of the question, that is with regard to what the hon. Gentleman said, and said with truth, as to the inequality of the present scale of licences. One of the points strongly insisted upon by my right hon. Friend the Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone) when he made the alteration in 1862 was that, according to the then existing scale of brewers' licences, very great injustice was done to the small brewer, who was called upon to pay a certain fixed sum, while the larger brewer who paid somewhat more was only called upon to do so up to a limited point, beyond which there was no increase whatever in the amount of licence duty which he had to pay. My right hon. Friend therefore proposed the present scale, which was intended to remedy the injustice complained of, and instead of stopping at a certain limit it was so arranged as to carry on the tax up to any amount that the brewer might brew. But if you will look into the details of that scale you will find this unsatisfactory result, that the small brewer pays a great deal more on the malt that he brews—say 20 or 30 quarters—in reference to each barrel, than the brewer who brews his hundreds of thousands of barrels; and, therefore, that is an injustice that is still in existence under the present scale. This matter is one to which I have given consideration, and it is a point upon which I hope to be able to make at the proper time some proposal to the House. I shall do this because I think such a proposal will be entirely consistent with the spirit of the plan adopted by Parliament in 1862 at the instance of my right hon. Friend the Member for Greenwich. Passing to another point mentioned by the hon. Gentleman the Member for Hackney, I must say that I do not think any alteration in the amount of licence duty chargeable would remedy the grievance of which he complains when he says that the charge falls more heavily than it ought upon the brewer who uses but a small quantity of hops in comparison with the malt which he puts into his beer. The inequality arises from the varying principles on which different brewers conduct their manufacture, and cannot be remedied or mitigated by altering the licence duty. Then there is one other point on which the hon. Gentleman has touched, and which I know is one that is very largely complained of, and that is one which I think is worthy of consideration also. It relates to the time at which the duty is collected. What is said is, that under the old system the hop grower paid his duty, but credit was allowed to him, and he frequently had a considerable time before he had to pay the duty; and that, to a certain extent, the brewer got the benefit of that length of time, whilst there is no credit now, but the tax is levied even before the beer is brewed. That is a point that is worthy of consideration, though it is not convenient at the present moment that I should make any positive statement; but it is a matter that I have undoubtedly under consideration, and I should be willing to see whether it would be possible to meet the complaints upon the point. With regard to the actual incidents of the scale and the time that the duty is collected, on these two points I am quite willing to say that the subject is under consideration. I have had frequent communications with practical officers upon the subject, and though I reserve myself from any pledge, I may say that it is one on which I am not indisposed to consider the frequent communications that have been made to me. With regard to the general argument of the hon. Gentleman that this duty is in itself unjust, and that it is one which the House can only deal with by abolishing it, I am sorry to say I can only resist such a proposition, as being unreasonable, unfair, and not capable of being sustained by argument. It is all very well to compare brewing with the manufacture of calico or any other similar process, but we all know that the two things are not similar. The taxes laid in some form or other upon the manufacture of intoxicating drinks are altogether out of the category of taxes laid, or possible of being laid, upon the production of articles such as calico, and I cannot for a moment admit the force of arguments based upon analogies which are no analogies at all, and ought not to determine our course in a matter like the present. In conclusion, therefore, I will only express my hope that the House will not adopt that which is, as a rule, the inconvenient practice of placing upon the Books of the House a Resolution condemnatory of a tax of this character. There is nothing in the circumstances of this tax to warrant any such exceptional course; and I think the House will do wisely by leaving the matter in the hands of the Government, contenting itself with the fact that the question has been fairly brought forward and temperately and dispassionately discussed. The right hon. Gentleman concluded by moving the Previous Question.

Previous Question moved.—(The Chancellor of the Exchequer.)

Mr. SULLIVAN said, it was his intention to have moved the Previous Question, in the absence of the hon.

Baronet the Member for Carlisle, (Sir Wilfrid Lawson) if it had not been done by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. J. Holms) and the Chancellor of the Exchequer had both looked at this question within a very narrow sphere indeed. The majority of the Irish Members of the House held that, as a class, the brewers, from whom this complaint emanated, had been exceptionally favoured in the matter of legislation. It had been stated that the brewing interest was in a state of decay, but he was unable to find any evidence of it, either in the metropolis or elsewhere in England; and so far from its showing any signs of ruin, decay, or death, beer was king in this land. It might, however, be true that the small brewers were being slain by their greater brethren. The abolition of this tax was urged as a relief to the brewers, and as an encouragement of the manufacture of beer in the interests of sobriety; but it struck him as being a very extraordinary appeal. It was on that ground that the late Prime Minister introduced the sale of light wines in England and Ireland by confectioners; but a more disastrous measure to morality had rarely emanated from that House, for it had increased tippling among the women population of Ireland to an extent previously unknown there. So far from its being in the interest of sobriety, it had established so many fashionable drinking schools and female drunkards. What he wished more particularly to point out, however, was that the beer interest was already unduly favoured. Assuming that alcoholic beverages ought to be taxed according to the amount of spirit they contained, he found that beer paid only 2s. per gallon, German and French wine 4s., Spanish and Portuguese wine 6s., and whiskey no less than 10s. Now he made to the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. J. Holms) this proposition—that he should equalize the duty upon all alcoholic spirits in the country, whether it was contained in beer, wine, or whisky, and then he should be able to come before the House with a case that was at all events, equitable as between the different branches of the trade. Beer was principally made in England, while whiskey was, for the most part, an Irish and Scotch manufacture; and he trusted that before conferring further advantages on the brewing interest, the right hon. Gentleman (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) would set about redressing the inequality which already existed in regard to this matter between the different parts of the United Kingdom.

MR. HERMON said, he hoped that after the statement made by the Chancellor of the Exchequer the hon. Member for Hackney would not press his Resolution to a division, and he also hoped that the Chancellor of the Exchequer would, when he addressed himself to this question, consider whether the inconveniences arising from the calls of the Excise officers upon the brewers could not be removed.

MR. GLADSTONE: Having been the person who originally introduced a proposal for the repeal of the Brewers' Licence Duty to the House, I may perhaps be permitted to say a few words on the present motion. It appears to me that the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer has taken the right course in this matter, viewing the time and the circumstances under which the Motion has been addressed to the House. Even if he were prepared to deal with the subject, it would be impossible for him at the present moment to agree to a Resolution of this kind, which would impair and cripple his power of dealing with the general finance of the country. At the same time, there is little value, it appears to me, in the argument which is so constantly urged upon the House, that Resolutions directed against particular taxes ought not to be brought forward at this period of the financial year. A Motion for the repeal of a particular tax is commonly said to be too soon if taken before the Budget, and too late if taken after it. Now so far as my experience goes—and I have had a good deal of experience in matters of this kind—that is not an accurate statement of the case. A proposal of this kind made before the Budget is, no doubt, inopportune when it merely asks the House to pledge itself with regard to a particular portion of the finances of the country without keeping the higher financial position of the country in view. In that case the objection would not, I think, be unfair if it were urged that the Motion was made too soon; but undoubtedly no one is in a position after the Budget to urge that then the Motion is too late.

Mr. Sullivan

If a Member then disapproves of any portion of the financial scheme of the Government, or if he has an alternative plan, there is no reason why he should not bring his Motion forward. I could easily, if necessary, cite cases in which this has been done; when it has been my duty to propose the repeal of a tax, or to suggest an alteration. Motions in opposition have been made to my proposal, and either success has followed the opposition, or else it has met with very formidable support. In any case the proposal in opposition has had a fair trial, and a just comparison has been made between the rival schemes. In this case my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer does not find himself in a condition to offer an actual opposition to the proposal of my hon. Friend the Member for Hackney, and I am very much disposed to concur in his observations as to this duty. It may be amended and mitigated, although not repealed, and I think that the two questions ought to be kept entirely distinct. For total repeal I should decline to vote, or for the repeal of any other tax, until I had the whole finances of the country under review. As a general rule, I think that to vote for the repeal of a tax would be inexpedient, except when we had the power of considering it in connection with the entire finances of the country. There might be some other case not then before me in which the inducement to repeal would be much stronger than in the case of this particular tax. My hon. Friend behind me will not, I think, compromise his title to urge his question on the House, when we know the actual condition of the national finances, and to press for the repeal of this tax, provided there be money disposable by withdrawing his present Motion, and therefore I hope he will cheerfully accept the promises made by the Chancellor of the Exchequer on the part of the Government. The protest that has been made against premature proceeding will not in the slightest degree deprive him of his power to renew his application when the general finances of the country come on for consideration.

MR. FIELDEN said, he could not support the Motion. The hon. Member for Hackney had made an admirable anti-malt tax speech, but he regretted to say that when he brought forward last Session his Motion for the repeal of the malt tax the hon. Member for Hackney was conspicuous by his absence on the division. He had always urged the repeal of the malt tax on the ground that it was an interference with the farmer in the cultivation of his land, as well as with the maltster in the manufacture of his malt and the brewer in the manufacture of his beer. Whenever they interfered with any industry by public officials, who necessarily laid down stringent rules and regulations, they did an irreparable injury both to the manufacturer and the consumer. In the abolition of the hop duties they took off the duty on the article at the point of production and laid it on at the point of consumption. That was the true principle. The Brewers' Licence produced something like £500,000 a-year, and the malt tax produced over £7,000,000 a-year. He thought the impost unjust; but he objected to repealing the Brewers' Licence until the malt tax was repealed.

MR. BASS said, he had been instructed and gratified by the able speech of the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Holms), and he had listened with the interest that it demanded to the speech of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, which was one of great ability and immense ingenuity; but he did not think that any hon. Member was satisfied by his arguments that it was fair to tax one class of tradesmen whilst all others were free. He saw no good reason why he should be obliged to pay some £10,000, £12,000, or £14,000 a-year for liberty to begin his business, while wine merchants and others were allowed to go scot-free. The injustice thus inflicted was, he contended, one which was unparalleled in any other country. In 1860, when the duty on wine was reduced in many instances from 7s. 6d. to 1s. per gallon, no extra licence duty was imposed. If every manufacturer and trader was bound to take out a licence for carrying on his trade the brewers would not complain; but it was unjust to tax in that way one class of tradesmen alone. The Chancellor of the Exchequer was wrong in thinking that the increase of the price of hops since the repeal of the duty was the natural consequence of a large increase in the business of the country. The reason was that the grower, not being forced into the market with his hops as soon as gathered to raise money with which to pay the duty, was able to hold on and get a better price. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had said that the Brewer's Licence was an injustice in theory and not in practice; but if he had to pay £12,000 or £14,000 a-year for carrying on his trade he would find it was an injustice in practice as well as in theory.

MR. J. G. HUBBARD recommended the hon. Member for Hackney to withdraw his Motion as premature, until the Chancellor of the Exchequer made his Financial Statement. He deprecated the idea that it was inopportune to discuss important questions of finance at any time when it was done without any intention of embarrassing a Government. He was not concerned for the brewers, and he did not believe that the imposition of this tax was a very serious injury to them, because, as in almost every other case, it was the consumer who, sooner or later, paid the tax, but he objected to it as a tax on a profession. He thought it wrong in principle to tax professions of any kind. He thought it a great advantage that the Chancellor of the Exchequer should have the opinion of the House freely expressed as to those taxes. This tax was unjust and unfair; it was a graduated tax, but graduated in the wrong direction, to the gain of the large brewer and the disadvantage of the small brewer. It was thoroughly vicious in principle, and therefore he would set his face against it.

MR. JOHN HOLMS, in reply, said, he was glad to find that the Chancellor of the Exchequer intended to examine into a small portion of the tax, but the speech had confirmed him in his intention of going to a division. That speech contained two points—the inequality of the scale, and the time of payment; but, as the main grievance, the vexatious character of the import. He trusted that the House would go to a division, and he rejoiced that the right hon. Gentleman had, in some sense, by moving the Previous Question, challenged one; because any Government which seriously intended to take into consideration a question of that kind would be strengthened in doing so if it knew the mind of the House upon it. It was high time that the opinion of the House should be declared on that subject.

Mr. Bass

Previous Question put, "That that Question be now put."—(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.)

The House divided:—Ayes 83; Noes 203: Majority 120.

BANK HOLIDAYS ACT (1871) EXTENSION AND AMENDMENT BILL.

(Mr. Ritchie, Mr. Wheelhouse, Mr. Kay-Shuttleworth, Sir Colman O'Loughlen.)

[BILL 30.] COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."—(Mr. Ritchie.)

MR. JAMES rose to move that the House resolve itself into Committee on the Bill that day six months. He said, that it was an invidious duty to undertake to oppose a Bill of this description; and in so doing he wished it to be understood that he did not grudge holidays to any member of the community. He opposed the Bill because, in his judgment, the principle on which it rested was unsound. It was a step in advance of the Bill of the hon. Baronet the Member for Maidstone (Sir John Lubbock), and an interference with trade. If it passed, it would become highly important to know where that description of legislation was to end. He was aware that the assumption on which the Bill before the House was framed was that the original Bill had been attended with so much good that it was deemed advisable to give to its provisions a wider application. He had inquired of managers of banks in London and the provinces, and nearly all of them said that the Act had worked well, and had been attended with great success, while its inconveniences had been comparatively trivial. Still, there were some inconveniences, such, for instance, when a holiday fell upon a market day in a country town. For this reason, he thought it would have been well had the Bill been made applicable to London, and London alone, as its conditions were daily becoming so different from those of other towns; elsewhere arrangements should be left in private hands, as at present people were taken from their work at inconvenient times. He observed that docks had been struck out of the Bill; but if the Customs remained that would, to a great extent, affect docks as well.

He thought the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Ritchie) should explain why the Customs, Bonded Warehouses, and Inland Revenue had been selected as objects for those special favours. If they adopted the principle of the Bill they could not allow it to stop there. It must be extended to the employés at the Post Office, to railway servants, miners, factory operatives, agricultural labourers, publicans, and others. He knew of no reason why, if a man was interested in a large number of railway operations, he should be subject to those fixed holidays. He wished to know why Bonding Warehouses and Custom Houses were especially selected? Another question he wished to ask of the hon. Gentleman was whether he was aware that the existing law entailed a large charge upon the public? He thought the House ought to know clearly, before it voted this Bill, whether the extensions it proposed would lead to increased expense; and, if so, where that expenditure was to end? He moved that the Bill go into Committee on that day six months.

MR. PALMER seconded the Amendment, believing that the effect of the Bill would be to interfere most unjustifiably with trade. The steamship owners in the North of England had sent a memorial, which had been presented to the House that day, setting forth that if a steamer arrived on a Saturday afternoon preceding a Bank Holiday, the entries at the Customs could not be made till Tuesday, so that the discharge of the cargo, which might be of a perishable nature, could not take place till the Wednesday. That was a matter of a very serious moment. On the Tyne the Custom House clerks had fixed holidays quite independent of the Bank Holidays, and he could not see why that House should enter on a system of legislation which would be an interference with the labour question throughout the whole country.

Amendment proposed, to leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "this House will, upon this day six months, resolve itself into the said Committee," — (Mr. James.) — instead thereof.

MR. GRANTHAM supported the Bill. The country had derived great advantage from the passing of the existing Bank Holidays Act, and he regarded the present Amending Bill as a necessary sequitur. It was found that on these holidays there was hardly any trade at the institutions included in this Bill; and therefore it was proposed to give persons employed in them the benefit of the holidays.

MR. NORWOOD pointed out how entirely different in principle the Bank Holidays Act was from this Bill. It was impossible for the bankers to close their establishments without an Act of Parliament authorizing them to do so; but the principle involved in the present Bill went further than that, inasmuch as apart from the interference with trade and shipping, it proposed to release Government employés from their duties on four days of the year, at the public expense. And if the privilege of this Act was made to apply to the Customs and Inland Revenue, he did not see how they could refuse to put the Post Office, and other Departments of the public service on the same footing. He objected to the Bill on the ground that it was an unwarrantable interference with the rights of labour. The working classes, unfortunately, had too many holidays in the course of the year, it was very hard upon the men working at the docks, railways, and shipping, that for an additional four days in the year they should be precluded from earning their living. His hon. Friend the Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ritchie) had made an alteration in his Bill, which, to a certain extent, disarmed his opposition, because it now left work in the Customs optional; but any work done on these four days would be at the expense of the merchant and shipowner. He should like to have some statement from the Treasury Bench as to the arrangement which it was proposed to make by which the Customs officials would be able to carry on business on these holidays.

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK said, that the operation of the Bank Holidays Act had given general satisfaction; and it was a farce to keep the Customs open on Bank Holidays, for practically they did no business at all. Still, so long as they were open a great many merchants and others engaged in business felt themselves bound to go to their offices; whereas if the Bill passed they would not come. It was a misapprehension to suppose that the Act was intended to apply only to the Banks, although it was necessary to use a term which should distinguish Bank Holidays from other holidays. Bills of exchange were payable before the holidays, but not until after Bank Holidays. There were only four of these holidays in the year, and nobody could say that, as Englishmen, we did not work hard enough. Holidays of this kind were more valuable to employés than those granted at irregular intervals by their employers; because it enabled members of the same family engaged in different pursuits to arrange beforehand as to the manner in which they would meet and enjoy themselves. He hoped the hon. Member (Mr. James) would not press his Amendment, but allow the House to go into Committee.

Mr. HERMON complained that the Bill proposed to give two new holidays, and as this would seriously affect the mercantile community he thought the House ought to consider well before they adopted it. If the House went into Committee upon it he should move to re-consider this question on the Report.

Mr. W. H. SMITH assured the hon. Member for Hull (Mr. Norwood) that if this Bill became law care would be taken that no impediment was thrown in the way of trade. There had been communications with the Custom House authorities on the subject, and there was a distinct understanding that every possible precaution would be taken to prevent these holidays causing any delay in ships entering and leaving a port. A reference had been made by the hon. Member for Gateshead (Mr. James) to the additional expense which would be thrown on the Exchequer. Care had been taken that if the Bill passed no additional burden should be placed upon the Exchequer, and the only additional expense would be a small charge for the attendance of a clerk in the event of its being necessary to clear a ship on a Bank Holiday.

Mr. RITCHIE said, he hoped, after the explanation made on the part of the Government, the House would not be put to the trouble of dividing. No facts had been adduced which were not discussed on the second reading. The greatest facilities would be given for the performance of any necessary work on these holidays. A vessel might be discharged, loaded, and cleared on those days, and only a trifling charge would be made for the attendance of the clerks, so that there would be no impediment thrown in the way of trade.

Mr. COWEN supported the Bill, as he believed that if fixed holidays were agreed upon throughout the country fewer irregular holidays would be taken, and, consequently, that both manufacturers and artisans would be benefited by the arrangement.

Mr. JAMES said, after the assurance of the Secretary of the Treasury he should not proceed with his Motion.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Main Question, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," put, and agreed to.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1 (Certain days mentioned in schedule to be holidays.)

Mr. RITCHIE proposed to render the Bill permissive as regarded the docks by leaving out in page 1, line 12, the words, "all docks, Custom Houses," and inserting "the Customs." On a former occasion he had stated that the East and West India Dock Companies wished for this Bill. He believed he had gone a little too far in making this statement; but could say that these Companies were not opposed to the Bill if it were made permissive as far as docks were concerned.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. NORWOOD moved that the words "post offices" be inserted. The Post Office employés were a very hard-worked body of men, and he thought they were fully entitled to the holidays which it was proposed to give to other classes of the community. Under the operation of the Bill business would be restricted, and few letters would be required, and the Post Office clerks ought to have on Bank Holidays the same opportunity for rest and recreation as they had on Sundays.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 12, after the word "Customs," to insert the words "post offices."—(Mr. Norwood.)

Mr. W. H. SMITH said, he thought the hon. Gentleman could hardly be in earnest in proposing such an Amendment, as its effect would be to disorganize all our commercial transactions, and to make the entire Bank Holiday scheme ridiculous.

MR. NORWOOD said, his object was to place post offices on the same footing as other offices. If a few clerks could transact the Customs business on a Bank holiday, he did not see why three-fourths of the Post Office clerks should not be released from labour on the same day.

MR. W. H. SMITH pointed out that closing the Post Office on a Bank holiday was altogether out of the question.

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK also opposed the Amendment.

Question put, "That the words 'post offices' be there inserted."

The Committee divided: — Ayes 14; Noes 92: Majority 78.

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK moved, in line 13, after "warehouses," to insert "and in every Post Office Savings Bank and other savings banks." He thought the same rule should be applied to these banks as to other banks.

MR. BACKHOUSE opposed the Amendment on the ground that in small towns where the savings bank was open only once or twice a week for a few hours great inconvenience would be felt if the proposal was agreed to.

MR. W. H. SMITH said, he hoped the hon. Baronet would not press the Amendment. The Government could not assent to it so far as the Post Office savings banks were concerned. The Postmaster General had power to close those banks on Bank holidays. He had done so in London, and was willing to do so wherever it could be done without inconvenience. He admitted that Post Office servants were very much entitled to consideration; they were hard-worked and had few holidays, and the Government were desirous to give them every indulgence which could be given without injury to the public service.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. RITCHIE moved, in page 1, at end of Clause, to add—

"And it shall be lawful for the directors or governing body (by whatever name known) of any dock or docks in England and Ireland respectively to cause the said days or any of them to be kept as holidays in such dock or docks, any restraining Clause in any Act of Parliament notwithstanding."

The Amendment was necessary, because some docks throughout the country were governed by different rules from those in London.

Amendment agreed to.

MR. W. H. SMITH said, he had reason to believe that some inconvenience had been found in closing the Inland Revenue Office on the anniversary of Her Majesty's coronation and on the birthday of the Prince of Wales. He should therefore propose to take away those holidays, and to assimilate for the future the practice of the Customs and Inland Revenue Departments in that respect.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 2 (Short title) agreed to.

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK moved a clause providing that the 28th of June should be a Bank holiday under the Act. There was no Bank holiday between spring and autumn, and he could not help thinking that a summer holiday would be very acceptable to the country.

MR. W. H. SMITH said, the Government would have no objection to substitute an earlier day for the 3rd of August as a Bank holiday, but they decidedly objected to the creation of a fifth Bank holiday. He did not think that a fifth holiday in the year was necessary, or that the country desired it. He should not object to the 27th of December being a Bank holiday if Christmas fell on the Saturday.

Clause negatived.

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK then moved the following clause:—

"Whenever the twenty-sixth day of December (as mentioned in Schedule hereto) shall fall on a Sunday, the Monday immediately next following, that is to say, the twenty-seventh day of December, shall be a Bank Holiday under this Act, and also under 'The Bank Holidays Act, 1871.'"

Experience of late years had shown that there would be no inconvenience in having three holidays in succession at Christmas when Christmas Day fell on Saturday.

Clause agreed to.

Bill reported; as amended, to be considered upon Friday.

TRAINING SCHOOLS AND SHIPS BILL.

(Captain Pim, Mr. Wheelhouse).

[BILL 89.] SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
 "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Captain Bedford Pim.)

MR. ASSHETON CROSS sympathized with the objects of the hon. and gallant Member in introducing the Bill, but felt compelled to insist on the advisability of doing what was aimed at, if it were possible, either under the provisions of the Reformatory and Industrial Schools Acts, or by amending those provisions if amendment could be shown to be necessary and desirable. In these institutions boys were being trained to industrial pursuits; but one clause of this Bill would go further than the Acts, by compelling a boy to adopt a trade even against his will; and that he could hardly agree to. There were several ships employed under both Acts, and, if more were wanted, he should be glad to render assistance in obtaining them. In the five training ships there were 14,000 boys. These had been established as training schools at an expense of £50,000. They were doing much good, and perhaps they would do more. Hitherto part of the work had been done by private benevolence; but this Bill would throw a burden on the rates, which was another reason for seeing whether its object could not be accomplished by an extension of the system at present in operation. He would be glad to have a conversation on the subject with his hon. and gallant Friend, and then he would be able to judge whether it would be necessary for him to introduce a Bill amending the present Acts. He would suggest that this Bill should be withdrawn.

CAPTAIN BEDFORD PIM said, he would withdraw the Bill on the understanding just expressed by the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn

Bill withdrawn.

PARLIAMENTARY ELECTIONS (RETURNING OFFICERS) BILL.—[BILL 32.]

(Sir Henry James, Sir William Harcourt.)

COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
 "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."—(Sir Henry James.)

MR. FAWCETT, in rising to move—

"That no measure dealing with the expenses of Returning Officers is likely to reduce those expenses which does not interest the constituencies in economy by relieving candidates of the charge," said, that the two Law Officers of the late Government, who were responsible for this Bill, had scheduled the charges connected with an election. It was only fair to assume that they would not desire to call upon candidates to deposit more than would meet the expenses of the Returning Officer, because if the money were deposited the probability was it would be spent. If the tendency of the Bill would be to promote economy and diminish expense he would not oppose it; but it appeared it would have a directly contrary effect. To show this he would take a few examples, constituencies of different sizes, in different parts of the country. The deposit required was to be proportionate to the number of electors. In Sheffield a deposit would be required of £1,200, and at the last election the Returning Officer's expenses were £600. At Huddersfield the Bill would require a deposit of £600; and at the last election the expenses amounted to £248 19s. 4d. At Cambridge £300, instead of £166 14s. 11d. At Rochdale £600, instead of £363 5s. 1d. In Leicester the candidates would have to deposit £750 and the Bill, instead of diminishing the expenses, would increase them by 150 per cent. The same results would be found in a multitude of other places. What was the fair conclusion to be drawn from these facts? If the ingenuity of the two Law Officers of the Crown in the late Government manifested itself in framing Schedules which, instead of diminishing election expenses, would increase them by 100 or 150 per cent, it was evident that economy in Parliamentary elections could not be secured by means of Schedules. Let the House remember what had been done in municipal and school board elections. These were very moderate, because it was not the candidate but the constituency that bore the expenses, while in Parliamentary elections the reverse was the case. There was no reason why elections should be more expensive in one case than the other, and the certain way to economy was not by framing Schedules, but by interesting constituencies themselves in that economy. At Southampton the school board election cost £140, and the expense of conducting the Parliamentary election the same year were £550, or 400 per cent more. At Bodmin the school board election cost £29, and the Parliamentary election £130—again an increase of 400 per cent. At Bristol the school board expenses were £393, while the last Parliamentary election cost £840, and the next election would cost £900 if this Bill should pass. The school board election at Dudley cost £240, and the Parliamentary election £700. In Exeter the school board election cost £90, but they fleeced the candidates at the Parliamentary election to the amount of £720, being an increase of about 800 per cent. With such facts before them as these, which could not be gainsaid or disputed, it would be trifling with the common sense of the House to say a word more to prove that interesting the constituencies themselves in economy was a remedy for extravagance. But, as a matter of principle, he put it to the House whether there was any reason why a gentleman who stood for the school board should not pay the necessary expenses, while if he stood for a seat in Parliament he should pay those expenses? Furthermore, it should be borne in mind, that if the constituencies had to bear all the cost, the expenses would be reduced to a minimum, as the same ballot-boxes, the same stamps, the same polling-booths, and the same machinery would do for all elections; but there was no security that under this Bill the candidates would not be obliged to have new booths and ballot-boxes, although the town might be in possession of them already. It had been proposed that the expenses of Parliamentary elections should be borne by the Consolidated Fund; but there was no more reason why the Parliamentary elections should be defrayed from that source than the school board elections, and any proposals to allow constituencies to put their hands into the Imperial

Exchequer for any such purpose ought to be resisted by the House with the utmost resolution. He was told that there was a growing feeling against any addition to local rates, and Members declared that if they voted for any proposal to increase them they would incur a great amount of unpopularity. With respect to the burden which his proposal would impose upon the ratepayers, he had taken the cases of the constituencies in which the charges of the Returning Officers were heaviest, and he found that, even if those charges remained as heavy as they now were—and he had shown that they might be 300 or 400 per cent less—the burden would amount in the case of the occupier of a £10 house to the price of a single glass of beer once in three years. Could anyone then pretend that if the principle for which he contended was a true one the constituencies would object to pay such a paltry price for the sanctioning of a sound, a just, and a true principle? A friend of his who represented a large borough, but who was no longer a Member of that House, went down to address his constituents, and having done so asked for a vote of confidence. A working man arose and said that he was commissioned by a large meeting of working men to go to the meeting and object to one vote which their Member had given. Of course, his hon. Friend was anxious to know what was the single vote he had given during the five years he had represented the town which they objected to, and he was startled to find that it was the vote he gave against the proposal to make the constituencies pay the expenses of Parliamentary elections. He replied—

“That vote had given him more trouble and anxiety than all his other votes, because he had given it against his convictions, and he had sacrificed his own feelings because he thought it would please them, and this was the result.”

When the Party now in office were in Opposition, Members of that Party were never weary of asserting that whatever was brought forward they would not listen to it until, if it imposed a single farthing on the ratepayers, the great question of Local Taxation and Local Government was considered by a responsible Government. Well, the Government which represented that Party had had the opportunity of considering the subject, and yet they had passed—or were in process of passing—Bill after Bill which would impose new charges on the ratepayers, so that the arguments which used to be advanced against him with so much feasibility and force had, to a certain extent, lost their cogency. The question of making the constituencies responsible for the necessary expenses of elections had, unfortunately, been confused with what was regarded as the working men's representation. But he did not bring forward this proposal in the interests of any particular class, or with the view of promoting working men's representation. He believed that the more truly representative that House was the greater and wider would be the sphere of its usefulness. That House was steadily increasing in wealth, and to many it might appear a matter of perfect indifference whether the expenses of the Returning Officer were £100 more or less, and perhaps they would consider it advantageous to them that these expenses should be higher, as the more the election expenses increased the more the area of selecting representatives was diminished. But that suggested a most important—probably the most important—consideration connected with this proposal. If this country had during the last few years been rapidly increasing in wealth, and if the House of Commons had also been increasing in wealth, it was all the more important that there should not be maintained a single artificial barrier which might impede the access of the poor man to that House. Nothing would be more likely to weaken or destroy the efficiency of representative institutions in this country than if an impression were to gain currency that that House was maintaining laws which placed obstacles in the way of poor men obtaining a seat in Parliament. In conclusion, he ventured to recommend this proposal not only on the grounds which he had already named—the practical grounds that it would secure economy and remove any impression that the House was interested in artificially preventing the poor man entering Parliament; but, beyond all, and before all, he was anxious that that House should accept the principle contained in his proposal; because he believed that nothing would more tend to diffuse amongst the people a recognition of the true relations which ought to exist between a constituency and him who represented that constituency. A constituency ought to feel that the man who aspired to represent it—to discharge an important and public trust—did not seek a favour which he was willing to buy, did not obtain a privilege which he could barter or turn to his own advantage. But was it not likely that those degrading ideas of the position of a Member of Parliament might obtain important currency if something was not done to prevent what no one who observed the times could doubt, that, as England became wealthier, a seat in that House was often a position for which the man who obtained it had to pay a heavier and heavier fine—a position which, if a man would gain it, he had to expend a higher and higher sum. The hon. Gentleman concluded by moving his Amendment.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "no measure dealing with the expenses of Returning Officers is likely to reduce those expenses which does not interest the constituencies in economy by relieving candidates of the charge,"—(Mr. Fawcett),—instead thereof.

MR. J. R. YORKE said, he thought the objections which he entertained against the Bill which the hon. Member for Hackney formerly introduced on this subject still held good. The hon. Member, having but a poor prospect of being able to carry that Bill, now brought it forward in the shape of a Resolution. The proposal of the hon. Member was to throw the expenses of the candidates at Parliamentary elections upon the constituencies, and thus relieve the candidates from such expenses. Now, he (Mr. J. R. Yorke) had been a Member of the Committee appointed to consider the question of Local Taxation, and the question was how far local taxation could be adjusted so as to diminish it; and here he would express a hope that the Government would lay to heart the hon. Member's remarks with regard to that subject. The ratepayers had not obtained such a considerable relief as they were entitled to expect. They should be told that they were to look to the Budget of the Chancellor of the Exchequer for further measures of relief from local taxation; and he could assure the right hon. Gentleman that among the Chambers of Agriculture and the local taxpayers throughout the country the Budget was in that respect looked forward to with great anxiety. He did not attribute much importance to the remarks of the hon. Member for Hackney with reference to the increasing difficulty of obtaining candidates for seats in that House, as there was always a sufficient number hovering about the gates of that Paradise who, whenever the opportunity occurred, were ready to go down and pay a handsome sum for the chance of obtaining the privilege. He remembered that one gentleman who had sat on that—the Ministerial—side of the House said he could not understand how life outside of the House of Commons was tolerable to one that had had a seat in it. The result of the last General Election had been to add very largely to the class who earnestly desired to be readmitted to the House. As to the question whether poor men who would be ornaments to the deliberations of the House were prevented from entering it he did not believe that, to any practical extent, they were prevented by the expense attending elections—at any rate, not by the comparatively small item of expense which would be affected by this Bill. He believed that no poor man of intelligence and respectability would have to wait long before a sufficient subscription would be organized by his friends and supporters to enable him to overcome difficulties preliminary to entering the House. If the proposition of the hon. Member for Hackney were adopted, it would not be merely electors, but also women and minors, who would have to pay the expenses of the Returning Officer, and as women and minors were not at present included in the constituency he (Mr. J. R. Yorke) objected to make them contribute to that payment. He agreed in much that the hon. Member had expressed in reference to the working man; and if he thought that the expense of standing a contest was an obstacle to his getting into Parliament, he would vote in support of the hon. Member's Resolution; but while the question of Local Taxation was still pending, he must vote against his Motion.

Mr. ANDERSON said, the hon. Member for Gloucester had alleged that candidates were not prevented from coming forward because of the returning officers' expenses, because plenty were always ready to come. But that was not the question. What ought to be borne in mind was that all the expenses except those of the Returning Officers were entirely under the control of the candidate. The candidates ought, therefore, not to be asked to pay expenses over which they had no control whatever, because in many instances those charges were very heavy indeed. It was not alleged that there was any difficulty in getting plenty of candidates. What was said was that the tendency appeared to be to restrict the candidates to rich men, and it could not be said that the richest men of the country were always the most intellectual, or that the rich people were those who ought chiefly to be Representatives in this House. For his own part, he had always thought it was a great mistake to limit the field of selection for Members of this House. If the expenses of the returning officers were thrown upon the constituencies, they would take care that economy was exercised. This House, however, wanted exclusiveness; and those who were in it desired to prevent other people from entering its doors. ["No!"] He ventured to say there were very few who, in private discussions on this matter, had not heard it said if these expenses were thrown on the constituencies it would enable Tom, Dick, and Harry to compete with those who were already Members. This was the real secret of the opposition to this question, and it was not a matter of economy at all. If the expenses were thrown on the ratepayers, he did not think there was any danger of multiplying the number of candidates beyond what was perfectly reasonable and right; and, as far as he was concerned, he would rather see an abundant number of candidates than see the election confined to the richest men in the country, as it was very much at present. Under these circumstances, he should vote for the Motion of the hon. Member for Hackney.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, that the amount of the charges which Returning Officers could make were clearly defined by the Bill, and if the amount of the deposit was greater than the expenses the candidate who made the deposit would be entitled to have a return of the surplus. No doubt, as the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett) had said, to interest constituencies in economy was a very desirable object; but, considering the heavy burdens already imposed on the payers of local rates, both in counties and in boroughs, he did not think a transfer of election expenses to them would interest them in economy. His contention was that the ratepayers in the various localities had already sufficiently heavy burdens to bear in the shape of taxation. The hon. Member for Hackney said, in the course of his argument, that if the law was altered in the way he proposed, the burden upon each £10 householder would not amount to more than the cost of a glass of beer. This would be all very well for £10 householders; but to those of higher rental the payment of sums amounting to the cost of many glasses of beer would become decidedly oppressive. Parliament ought not to impose additional burdens on those who were already overweighted and overwhelmed, unless a case of imperative necessity could be made out. He had failed to find out that there was any such case. Another reason why it would be hard to impose this burden was, that a great number of ratepayers had no voice in the election. Again, there might be cases where those called on to contribute to the expense had no interest in the election. There might be two candidates, one a Liberal Conservative and the other a Conservative Liberal, and no extreme man might appear. Yet the Radical ratepayers would have to contribute. Again, there might be a Liberal candidate and a Radical candidate, and no one to represent the body of Conservatives, but the Conservative ratepayers would be called on to contribute. The burden would thus fall on those who had no interest in the election. If the proposition of the hon. Gentleman were adopted, it would multiply contests, of which there were enough already, as Members knew to their cost. If this were made a matter of no expense, candidates would appear for the sake of the fun and excitement of a contest, but at other people's expense. Thus constituencies would be put to the trouble and annoyance of an election by candidates who had no chance of success—the person would be elected that every one knew beforehand was the choice of the electors, but the ratepayers would have to bear the expense. For those reasons, he should oppose the Motion of the hon. Member for Hackney.

The Solicitor General

Mr. DIXON said, he should like to ask the Solicitor General whether the force of his objection did not apply to the elections of town councillors and school boards as much as to the elections of Members of Parliament. It was only lately that this House passed an Act of Parliament to throw the expenses of election of school boards upon the ratepayers; but the moment it became a question of throwing the expenses of Parliamentary elections upon the ratepayers, the whole House was against such a proposal. The fact was, the working classes had come to the conclusion that they were not wanted in that House; and, unless some better arguments could be adduced against the proposition of his hon. Friend than those used by the Solicitor General, it would be very difficult to make them believe that what Parliament considered suitable in the case of municipal and school board elections was not applicable to the case of Parliamentary elections.

Mr. GREGORY said, he did not believe that the hon. Member (Mr. Dixon) had rightly expressed the opinion of the working classes in this matter, as he felt sure that no hon. Member wished to prevent them being represented in that House—that the working classes felt and acknowledged this. The case of municipal and school board elections was different to Parliamentary elections; because, while in the former they had great difficulty in getting good candidates, in the latter there was no difficulty whatever. The social position attached to the one was a great inducement to many gentlemen to come forward; but, in the other, there was nothing but the prospect of continuous and laborious duties. He thought that a poor man who had been selected by his fellow-citizens as a fit person to represent them would find no difficulty in obtaining sufficient contributions from them to pay for the necessary expenses attendant on his return; but his chief objection to the proposal of the hon. Member for Hackney was that it took the form of an abstract Resolution in opposition to a measure which was urgently required, and contained no definite proposal by means of which his object could be attained.

Sir HENRY JAMES said, he had already more than once since he came into Parliament expressed his opinions upon this question, and he now thought that it would be scarcely worth while to enter into the details of the measure, which might be far better discussed and considered in Committee. If he thought the proposal of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Hackney would diminish the amount of the expenses of election, he would have found him among his warmest supporters; but, on the contrary, he found that under it those expenses would be increased rather than diminished. At the General Election of 1868 one-fifteenth of the whole of the expenses then incurred were in the shape of the Returning Officers' charges; and if they took any course which calculated to increase the number of contests there would be no obstacle in the way of a sham candidate plunging a constituency into an unnecessary expenditure and disturbing an old Member who, from his long services, was entitled to an immunity from opposition. The late Government he recollected proposed, as a guard against the appearance of such candidates, that whenever a contest took place, the candidate should deposit a certain sum of money, and that that money should be absolutely forfeited if he failed to poll one-sixth of the constituency, and that met with the support of the hon. Member for Hackney. The object of the Bill was to lessen the expense of elections, and it had been brought forward after consulting Members upon both sides of the House. He hoped, therefore, that the House would consent to go into Committee and consider the clauses. An objection had been taken that the expenses under the Bill would be in some cases increased rather than diminished; and this was attempted to be shown by comparing the maximum charges under the Bill with the minimum charges now paid. He protested that in no case would the expenses be increased. The maximum charges allowed by the Bill would be subject to a provision that in no case should the charges exceed the sum necessary to be paid. As a rule, the Bill would reduce the charges to about one-fourth of what they now were. These charges were at present very unequal. In Manchester, with 60,000 electors, they were £1,400, whilst in Marylebone, with only 30,000 electors, they were £1,550. In the present state of the law Returning Officers could really make whatever charge they liked. The Bill had been framed to make the charges equal and reasonable, and he was sure that in Committee there would be every desire to consider fairly any proposal for amending the details of the measure.

MR. CHARLES LEWIS supported the Amendment, and said, that he thought that the House had pursued an entirely wrong line upon the subject. He thought that the most simple and common-sense view would be to leave it to the ratepayers to minimize the expenses which they themselves would have to pay. The position of a candidate was one of utter helplessness in reference to disputing the Returning Officers' charges. The great objection to this part of the Bill was that it would really impose a property qualification. What else would it be when if a third candidate for Marylebone wished to come forward, he must first deposit £400 for the Returning Officers' charges? He was of opinion that opposition to the Motion would appear to be a selfish action on the part of the House, while support of the Motion would prove its independence. It was, in one sense, unfortunate that at the last General Election, while contests were going on as a rule elsewhere, there were no contests in many of the great Conservative counties of England, whereby the enormous preponderance of Conservative opinion might have been clearly shown. Was the Conservative majority, he asked, to be maintained by putting a stopper upon the free opinion of the electors? For his part, he thought that if they could not retain their position by opening the door to the free expression of such opinion, the sooner they went into Opposition the better. Conservatives had nothing to fear from contests, because they did not split up into such sections as their Friends opposite did. They voted en bloc for their man, and county Members should not be afraid of having to put their hands into their pockets to defeat bogus candidates. He trusted that the House would not pass the Bill in its present form; but that while limiting the expenses of the Returning Officer, they would allow the constituencies to take upon themselves the payment of the legitimate expenses of the candidates.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT congratulated the hon. and learned Gentleman who had just spoken upon the example he had afforded of the united action of the Conservative Party. Contrasting his speech with that of the Solicitor General, they could not but see how the Party opposite acted together and voted en bloc. The hon. and learned Member spoke of sections into which the Liberal Party were divided; but he assured the hon. and learned Gentleman that they watched his proceedings with interest and hope. The hon. and learned Gentleman had only used one substantial argument against the Bill—namely, that it had a tendency to create a new property qualification; but the Bill did not create that change, because its object was to diminish existing charges, and to limit what was now an unlimited expense. With reference to the Motion of his hon. Friend the Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett), he might remind the House that though the Bill of his hon. and learned Friend (Sir Henry James) did not go the full length of that Motion, it went a certain distance in the same direction. Against the principle of that Motion he had nothing to say: the question was whether the opinion of the constituencies was just at this time ripe for its acceptance. He feared that at present it would be distasteful to them. There were, he knew, constituencies who were enlightened and liberal enough to pay the expenses of their Representatives, and he only wished that all were. The majority, however, were not, and if they were they had the remedy in their own hands. As matters now stood, he hoped the House would be content to read the Bill a second time.

MR. MUNDELLA appealed to the House, not on behalf of working men only, but of poor men generally. Was it not a fact that some of the most distinguished ornaments of that House were poor men, and it was not pleasant to poor statesmen who wished to come into the House to send the hat round for subscriptions to pay the expenses; and there were places where the expenses would, under this Bill, be considerably increased, perhaps doubled, and even trebled. At Sheffield, for instance, every candidate would have to deposit £400; and where would some candidates—even distinguished statesmen—find that sum on the instant? The question was one of freedom of choice from the whole of England, for there were as many good men out of the House as in it, but many of them could not pay the large expenses demanded of them.

The House divided:—Ayes 150; Noes 46: Majority 104.

Main Question, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," put, and agreed to.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clauses 1 to 4 agreed to.

Clause 5 (Taxation in Scotland).

MR. ANDERSON moved, in page 3, line 26, after "person" to insert the words "entirely unconnected with any sheriff court and." The object was this: In Scotland the Returning Officer was in every case the sheriff, and therefore it was desirable the person who taxed his accounts should be unconnected with any Sheriff Court. If they did not make such an Amendment, they might have two sheriffs taxing each other's accounts.

THE LORD ADVOCATE remarked that the special circumstances of Scotland had apparently not been carefully considered in drawing up the clauses of the Bill, and he therefore suggested the omission from the measure of all reference to Scotland, the circumstances of which country might be met by a supplemental Bill.

MR. KINNAIRD entirely concurred with this suggestion.

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE said, he thought that it might be found desirable to require the sheriff to appoint in open Court some arbiter who, in taxing the accounts, would be responsible to the public opinion.

SIR HENRY JAMES said, he had no objection to Scotland being struck out of the Bill altogether.

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE remarked that the Scotch Members were entirely in favour of the principle of the Bill, and he would suggest that a separate measure should be introduced for Scotland.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

On Motion of The LORD ADVOCATE, Clause struck out.

Clause 6 agreed to.

Sir William Harcourt

Clause 7 (Use of ballot boxes, &c. provided for municipal elections.)

MR. ANDERSON moved, in page 4, line 16, to leave out "fittings and compartments," and insert "stamping instruments, polling-stations, portable secret compartments, and other fittings and apparatus." The object of the Amendment, he explained, was entirely in the direction of economy, the intention being, in places where there were school boards, municipal and Parliamentary elections, to make it incumbent on the local authority to keep as many as possible of the permanent fittings, so that new ones would not have to be got for every election.

SIR HENRY JAMES maintained that the words of the clause were sufficient for the purpose.

Amendment negatived.

Amendment proposed,

In page 4, line 19, at the end of the Clause, to add the words "and it shall be the duty of the various local authorities to provide at their expense and to maintain all such of the above-named appliances as can be made of a sufficiently permanent character to be available for the various elections wholly or partly within their jurisdiction."—(Mr. Anderson.)

SIR HENRY JAMES presumed the Committee would not discuss this proposal, because the House had already considered it on the Motion introduced by the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett), which involved the question whether the erection of polling stations should be at the expense of local taxpayers.

MR. ANDERSON said, he was sorry the Amendment could not be adopted, as if the local authorities were not required to do these things the result would simply be that they would not be done at all.

Question put, "That those words be there added."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 72; Noes 126: Majority 54.

Clause ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Remaining clauses agreed to.

On Motion of The LORD ADVOCATE, a new clause excluding Scotland from the operation of the Bill was agreed to.

Schedule 1.

CAPTAIN NOLAN moved, in page 5, line 27, to insert—

"In Ireland the returning officer shall use a court house where one is available at a polling station, and his maximum charge for using and fitting the same shall in no case exceed three pounds three shillings."

Under the Ballot Act the sheriff would have the power of charging £7 7s. for the use of the Court House, and he was certain that the sheriffs in Ireland would always make out their bills on the highest possible scale.

CAPTAIN STACPOOLE concurred in the view expressed by his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Galway. He thought that each candidate should lodge a specific sum in proportion to the population of the county or borough contested.

SIR HENRY JAMES said, he had no objection to the Amendment.

Amendment agreed to.

CAPTAIN NOLAN proposed words which would prevent the presiding officers in Ireland from sending the ballot-boxes by one car and himself travelling by another, and so making a double charge for the same service.

Amendment proposed,

In page 6, line 19, after the word "mile," to insert the words "In Ireland no charge is to be made for the conveyance of ballot boxes beyond the charge of one shilling a mile to the presiding officer when a charge is made for the travelling expenses of the presiding officer of a station to the place where the ballot papers are to be counted."—(Captain Nolan.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

SIR HENRY JAMES said, he thought it hardly necessary to insert such an Amendment, as it would reflect rather upon the Returning Officers.

MR. SULLIVAN said, such a state of things as his hon. and gallant Friend had pointed out might exist under the Bill, for Irish sheriffs, although probably not less nice than English sheriffs, looked upon elections as blessed opportunities, very rarely occurring, of making candidates pay under every conceivable heading, and they would be sure to take advantage of the opportunities afforded them by the Bill.

MR. GREGORY observed, that it was the duty of the presiding officer to take charge of the ballot boxes and convey them to the place of their destination. The charge for the conveyance of the ballot boxes included every charge incidental thereto. He should support the Schedule as it stood.

MR. GRANTHAM remarked that the presiding officers and the clerks had often to incur considerable expense before the election took place. The taxing officer would take care that there was no improper multiplication of charges.

SIR PATRICK O'BRIEN said, that the Bill would not assist Irish Members. He believed that, so far from decreasing the expenses of candidates, it would increase them.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT remarked that if the presiding officer found that one clerk could not convey the ballot boxes he might employ two. If he had only one clerk, and chose to take more vehicles than were necessary to carry the ballot boxes, the charge would be disallowed.

MR. DODDS moved to amend the proposal of the hon. and gallant Member (Captain Nolan) by striking out the word "Ireland" in order that the Amendment might apply generally.

Amendment proposed to the said proposed Amendment, to leave out the words "in Ireland."—(Mr. Dodds.)

CAPTAIN STACPOOLE said, he was unable to see why Ireland should be omitted from the Amendment.

SIR HENRY JAMES said, if hon. Gentlemen really wished the words of the Amendment of the hon. and gallant Member for Galway to be inserted, he should be ready to accept them.

Question, "That the words 'In Ireland' stand part of the said proposed Amendment," put, and negatived.

Question put,

"That the words 'no charge is to be made for the conveyance of ballot boxes beyond the charge of one shilling a mile to the presiding officer when a charge is made for the travelling expenses of the presiding officer of a station to the place where the ballot papers are to be counted' be there inserted."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 94; Noes 103: Majority 9.

CAPTAIN NOLAN proposed to leave out those words in the Schedule which would entitle the Returning Officer to charge for employing an assessor.

SIR HENRY JAMES said, that in England an assessor was not required, and it was not contemplated that he should be paid under the Act.

Mr. Gregory

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. DODDS moved the omission of lines 31 and 32, which would enable a charge of 1s. a-mile for the travelling expenses of the clerks of the Returning Officer to be made.

SIR HENRY JAMES said, it was intended that travelling expenses should be allowed only when a class of persons whom it was desirable to employ could not otherwise be obtained. If it would fall in with the wishes of hon. Members who had voted in the minority in the late division, he would, on the Report, propose that the charge for the conveyance of ballot boxes should come under the head of travelling expenses.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

CAPTAIN NOLAN said, he had an Amendment now to propose which only applied to Ireland, the circumstances of which country, in reference to electoral divisions, were totally different to those of England in reference to the charges for journeys by the presiding officer. He had had a conversation lately in Ireland with a presiding officer in reference to his charges for journeys, and he heard from him that he made a good thing of it, for he charged 1s. per mile for going perhaps 20 miles to the sheriff of the county, and the same amount back; and he then charged 1s. per mile for being conveyed to his own home. The travelling expenses of clerks also should not be charged for, because good clerks could be got on the spot without bringing them from a distance. The hon. and gallant Gentleman concluded by moving his Amendment.

Amendment proposed,

In line 33, after the word "mile," to insert the words "In Ireland no journey shall be charged for except that of the presiding officer from the polling station to the place where the ballot papers are counted when in charge of the ballot boxes in which the ballot papers have been deposited, the charge of one shilling per mile, including the return journey; clerks are not to be allowed travelling expenses in Ireland."—(Captain Nolan.)

MR. GREGORY opposed the Amendment.

Question put, "That those words be there inserted."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 64; Noes 122: Majority 58.

Amendment negatived.

Clause agreed to.

Schedule 2 agreed to.

Schedule 3.

MR. CHILDERS expressed a hope that his hon. and learned Friend who had charge of the Bill would re-consider the question of amount of security which the Returning Officer might demand to cover expenses, and bring up some modification of this Schedule in that respect upon the Report. Taking the Yorkshire boroughs, he found that at the last General Election the Returning Officer's expenses, excessive as they were in many instances, were in nearly every case less than the amount which this Bill would enable him to demand as security.

MR. CHARLES LEWIS moved that the Schedule be omitted altogether. It implicitly restored a money qualification by requiring a candidate to give security for certain expenses, or otherwise to have his name withdrawn from the list of candidates.

SIR HENRY JAMES said, he thought that the proposal of the hon. and learned Member was scarcely reasonable, seeing that, as a Member of the Select Committee which considered the Bill, he had an opportunity of objecting to the provision now in question, and did not then oppose it.

MR. GOLDNEY said, that if the Schedule were not adopted, the whole of the expenses would be thrown on the Returning Officer.

MR. FAWCETT said, it appeared to him that if the Schedule were passed, a larger fine would be imposed upon candidates than the Returning Officer would have security for.

SIR HENRY JAMES explained that he had omitted to state that he should be willing to lower the sums named in the Schedule. With the permission of the Committee, therefore, he was prepared to withdraw the figures in the Schedule, and bring up lower ones on the Report, when the House might say whether it would accept the reduced ones.

MR. CHARLES LEWIS said, he would not trouble the House to divide; but he gave Notice of his intention to move, on the Report, to omit Clause 3 and the Schedule.

Schedule agreed to.

Bill reported; as amended, to be considered upon Tuesday next.

INTESTATES WIDOWS AND CHILDREN (SCOTLAND) BILL.

On Motion of The LORD ADVOCATE, Bill for the relief of Widows and Children of Intestates in Scotland where the personal estate is of small value, ordered to be brought in by The LORD ADVOCATE, Mr. Secretary CROSS, and Sir HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON.

House adjourned at a quarter before One o'clock.

BILL—[BILL 25.]

(Mr. Forsyth, Mr. Russell Gurney, Mr. Stansfeld, Sir Robert Anstruther.)

SECOND READING.

MR. FORSYTH: I rise to move the second reading of this Bill. It is extremely short, consisting of only a single clause. Its object is to enable women who are not under the coverture of marriage, if they are rated householders in boroughs, or possessed of sufficient property qualifications in counties, to vote at the election of Members of Parliament. I say, emphatically, "women not under the disability of coverture," for I am strongly opposed to the claim of married women to vote at Parliamentary Elections, and there is nothing in the present Bill which will enable them to do so. The measure will remove not the disqualification of status, but only the disqualification of sex. On this point no doubt can exist in the mind of any competent lawyer. In 1869 an Act was passed for shortening the period of residence as a qualification for the municipal franchise, and the 9th section provided that wherever words occurred which denoted the masculine gender, the same should be held to include females with reference to the right to vote for councillors, auditors, and assessors. It has, however, been decided by the Court of Queen's Bench, on a Quo Warranto, that that section does not enable married women to vote. The Bill which I introduced last year contained a distinct Proviso that married women should not be allowed to vote. I inserted it because, in previous debates on the subject, there was a lamentable confusion of thought in the minds of many hon. Members who opposed the Bill, and they erroneously imagined that it would destroy the foundations of society, introduce discord into married life, and wholly alter the relations of the sexes domestically and socially. Such an argument was entirely irrelevant; but it produced an effect on the mind of even so astute and sagacious a Gentleman as the late Member for Leeds (Mr. Baines), who, on the day after the debate, wrote a letter to The Times explaining how he had been puzzled and misled. I have now omitted the Proviso because the Common Law, apart from a statutory declaration, would suffice to prevent married women from voting for Members of Parliament. Mr. Goldwin Smith, in a pamphlet which has been printed at the request of some Members of Parliament—so it is stated in the preface—and industriously circulated, asserts that the limitation of the operation of the Bill to unmarried women was introduced by me only to hoodwink the House of Commons. I cannot find words to express my indignation at a statement so calumnious and unfounded. To what straits must the ex-Professor at Oxford have been reduced, when he was obliged to resort to an assertion so absolutely untrue! This is no Party question, as clearly appears from the names at the back of the Bill. There are my own name and that of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Recorder of London, who sits on the Ministerial side, and the names of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Halifax (Mr. Stansfeld) and of the hon. Baronet the Member for Fife (Sir Robert Anstruther), who sit on the Opposition side of the House. In like manner the opponents of the measure comprise both Conservatives and Liberals. It is impossible, indeed, to predict from the general political bias of any hon. Member how he will vote upon this question, though I believe a majority of the unmarried men in the House will vote against the Bill. I will not stop to explain the reason, though I believe I could easily do so. No, Sir, I should be ashamed to make this a Party question. I agree with the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone), who said, on a former occasion, that it would be a sin against first principles to make this a Party Question; but one of the main reasons urged by the ex-Professor Goldwin Smith against the Bill is that it is brought in by the Conservative Member for Marylebone. I may mention that Mr. Goldwin Smith had been, before I announced my Bill, a strong advocate of this measure. As regards the growth of public opinion in favour of the measure, I assert fearlessly that there has been no question introduced by a private Member which has in so short a time made so rapid a progress. Indeed, I do not believe that even the anti-Corn Law agitation increased with such accelerated velocity as the agitation in favour of this measure has done since the subject was first introduced to the House. This is shown by the number of Petitions for the Bill, which increased from 75, with 50,000 signatures, in 1858, to 1,404, with more than 430,000 signatures, in 1874. Between the years 1869 and 1873, exactly four Petitions were presented against the Bill, and these proceeded from Scotch municipal burghs, where women have no votes at all. Three of them came from the town councils of Elgin, Nairn, and Linlithgow—immortal burghs! which are destined in the history of this question to be as famous as the three tailors of Tooley Street. They remind me of Mrs. Partington trying, in her patters and with her mop, to push back the Atlantic. I venture to say that the Bill will not be lost in consequence of the opposition of three tumperry Scotch burghs. This year no fewer than 30 town councils in Scotland have petitioned in its favour, and not one against it. The numerous Petitions signed by women in favour of the Deceased Wife's

Mr. Foreyth

Sister Bill and the repeal of the Contagious Diseases Acts, show that women are not averse from petitioning the House on subjects interesting to the sex, and it will not do for my hon. Friend the Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. Beresford Hope) to assert that women are either indifferent to the matter, or that their retiring modesty will not allow them to sign Petitions in favour of the present measure. With respect to the attitude of the Members of the late and of the present Ministries as regards the Bill, I wish to point out that in 1867 four Members of the late Government voted for and seven against it, while of the Members of the present Government one voted for and 11 against it. In 1873, three Members of the late Government voted for the Bill and 11 against it; and of the Members of the present Government eight voted for the Bill and eight against it. A few years ago, the right hon. Gentleman who is now First Minister of the Crown said, that in a country which was governed by a woman, where women constituted a portion of one of the estates of the Realm as Peeresses in their own right, and where women could be churchwardens and overseers of the poor, and occupy various other official positions, he did not see what possible objection could be urged against such a proposal as was embodied in the Bill now under consideration. Afterwards, in answer to Mr. Gore Langton, the right hon. Gentleman spoke of the exclusion of women from the franchise as an anomaly which he believed to be injurious to the country, and which he trusted to see removed by the wisdom of Parliament. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone) cannot be quoted in terms of such strong approval; but in 1871 he made a speech distinguished not only by eloquence—that is a truism, and applies to all his speeches—but by candour and fairness, and well worthy the attention of the House. The right hon. Gentleman said he would not give a positive opinion on the subject, but he had heard no conclusive reason why we should not borrow an idea from the law of Italy, where a woman was allowed to exercise the franchise through a deputy or friend; it might be found on examination to be a good or a bad plan; but it was one worth discussion; and he admitted that there was more presumptive ground for a change in the law than some of the opponents of the Bill were disposed to admit. These were weighty words, and I am thankful the right hon. Gentleman went so far. I will now proceed to adduce some of the arguments for the Bill, and notice some of the objections against it, and I do so the more fully because I may not have an opportunity of reply, for I have no wish to have the Bill talked out, but to have a division upon it. I ask the House to give it a second reading; first because, since the passing of the Reform Act, it has been a constitutional principle that taxation and representation are reciprocal and correlative terms, and that no class ought to be taxed without having a voice in the selection of the persons who are to tax them. At present only six classes of persons are excluded from the franchise—paupers, lunatics, criminals, minors, idiots, and women; the first four may recover or gain the electoral status; and only idiots and women are permanently excluded. I do not think that women will feel themselves flattered by being placed in such a juxtaposition. No class ought to be excluded from the political franchise, because exclusion involves the neglect of their interests. Let hon. Members compare the position of the working classes before and after their enfranchisement; before, they had little influence; but now no barometer is more sensitive to the influence of the weather than hon. Members are to the opinions of the working men. For centuries the legislation of man towards woman has been the legislation of the strong over the weak; man has said, in the proud consciousness of physical superiority—

Up to 1870, while a man lost the control of his property only through the crime of felony, a woman lost the control of hers by marriage, and could not assert her right to the custody of her infant children; her right to appoint guardians to those children; her right, though a widow, to a voice in the education of those children; her right to dispose of her property by will; and her right to protection against excessive employment in factories and degrading employment in coal mines. Only of late years has tardy and imperfect justice been done; and the obvious reason why woman has so long been placed at a disadvantage is that she has been a cipher in political arithmetic, and that man has disregarded her wishes, because she could not give effect to them by her vote. How many years did Serjeant Talfourd labour in this House to give a mother the custody of infant children as against a drunken and profligate husband? When the mother had been given the custody of them up to the age of 7, 30 years elapsed before the age was increased to 16. Even now a woman cannot appoint a guardian for her own child. In a case in which father and mother are of different religious persuasions, if the father is dead a child brought up in the religion of the mother up to the age of 10 or 12 years may afterwards, on an application to the Court of Chancery, be forced to be brought up in the religion of the deceased father. The widows of farmers have great difficulties in retaining and procuring farms because they have not votes, landowners believing, in spite of the Ballot, that property will still have influence. On this ground, as is stated in a letter which I have received from Scotland there is a strong feeling there in favour of the Bill. The exclusion of women is also unjust because they are called upon to bear local burdens equally with men, and when Bridgwater, convicted by a Commission of extensive bribery, was required to pay a rate of 3s. in the pound, the women who were ratepayers, but were not electors, complained bitterly of their being made to pay for bribery which they had nothing to do with. Among the public questions in the settlement of which women are entitled to a voice there are the custody of infants, marriage and divorce, marriage with a deceased wife's sister, the control of property, the preservation of infant life, sanitary legislation, factory legislation, Mines Acts, Workshop Acts, local taxation, and education. Four-fifths of the measures that are now before Parliament are such as directly affect women, on which they are entitled to be heard, and on which their opinion would be valuable. When a large number of persons make demands which are not in themselves unreasonable, they ought as far as possible to be conceded; and, certainly, a vast number of women desire the franchise. My hon. and learned Friend the Member for Taunton (Sir Henry James) spoke of the demand as being the crotchets of a noisy few, whom he denominated "itinerant and restless politicians" and "social failures;" but what did he mean by that term? Was Mrs. Somerville a "social failure?" Petitions have been presented in favour of this Bill, signed by the Dowager Countess of Buchan, Viscountess Combermere, Lady Julia Lockwood, Lady Helen Stewart, the Honourable Miss Canning, Miss Florence Nightingale, and many other distinguished ladies. Are they "social failures?" Is Miss Rye, who has led bands of emigrants across the Atlantic, a "social failure?" No fewer than 3,000,000 women in this country are earning their bread by manual or mental labour, and there are in business in the metropolis between 4,000 and 5,000 women, who are employers of labour. It may be that the ladies whom hon. Members of Parliament meet in drawing-rooms are not generally in favour of this Bill; but they are hardly fair judges of the wants of their poor struggling sisters. I plead not for the minions of fortune nursed in the lap of luxury and sheltered from the wants of poverty and the storms of adversity. I plead not for the rich, but for the poor, who, unsheltered by marriage, have to fight the hard battle of life for themselves. The demand has been conceded in principle by giving the municipal franchise to women; and the arguments by which Lord Aberdare, then Mr. Bruce, attempted to justify a distinction between the Parliamentary and the municipal franchise were weak in the extreme. He said that women ought not to vote at Parliamentary Elections, because no woman had been a great musical composer, and because women had not stood beside the mailed Barons at Runnymede when they extorted the Great Charter from King John; and they did not serve in the Army. If so, the maimed, the halt, and the blind ought not to vote, and it would be just as reasonable to say that women ought not to vote, because they do not shoot partridges nor smoke tobacco. I will propose a test to those hon. Members who think that the Bill, giving the municipal franchise to women, ought not to have been passed. If any hon. Member will bring in a Bill to deprive women of the municipal franchise, he will not get five Members to follow him into the Lobby. Another positive reason for supporting the Bill is, that the Ballot is in operation, and the use of the Ballot has removed the most plausible objection against the granting of the suffrage to women. Under open voting there might appear to be something unfeminine in a woman going to the polling-booth, but now the voting is as solemn as a funeral and as quiet as a Quaker's meeting. The objection to the Bill, based on the alleged inferiority of women, is seldom heard out of the House. I am willing to admit that the average brain-power of women is not equal to that of men; but that is not the question. The question is, whether they are so inferior intellectually to men, and so incompetent to form a judgment about candidates, as not fit to be trusted with a fractional share of the responsibility of electing them. I now pass on to what I believe to be the most serious and formidable of the objections which will be urged against the Bill. The objection that will be most relied upon is a sentimental one, and one, therefore, which it is difficult to encounter by argument or logic. It is said that this measure will change the nature of women for the worse, and make them too masculine. Now, I yield to no one in the desire to preserve the distinctive charm of womanhood, her softness, her purity, her grace; and I wish the feelings and attitude of woman towards my own sex, to be, in all social and domestic relations, those so beautifully expressed by Portia, in Shakespeare—

"Happiest of all, is, that her gentle spirit Commits itself to yours to be directed,
As from her Lord, her Governor, her King."

If I thought the effect of this measure would be to deteriorate woman in these respects, while I should consider the claim just, I should consider the right purchased at too dear a price. But I believe the fear to be chimerical, a mere phantom of the imagination. It does not follow that because women could vote, they would become active and ardent politicians any more than men, of whom so many abstain from voting. Take, for instance, my own borough of Marylebone. Although at the last General Election the fate of a Ministry was at stake, there were no less than 11,000 electors whom it was impossible to induce to vote on either side. But, as in the one case, so in the other, the indifference of some constitutes no reason why those who take an intelligent interest in politics should not be allowed to have a vote. Women are generally considered better judges of character than men, and all that they will have to do in voting will be to select from among competing candidates those they think most eligible for Parliamentary responsibility. But it is said that there are ulterior views, and that this is simply the thin end of the wedge. In reply to this, I declare that I have no ulterior views in the sense in which those words are used, and I am inflexibly opposed to the idea that married women should have votes, or that women should sit in Parliament. If we are to refuse what is right, because something which is wrong may be demanded afterwards, it will be impossible to go on with legislation at all; but we stand on firmer vantage ground in resisting what is wrong, when we have granted that which is right. One of the strongest arguments used by the right hon. Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone) when he proposed to disestablish the Irish Church, was that an Established Church in Ireland was in itself wrong, and that having disestablished it the hands of Parliament would be stronger to resist any further measures which it thought to be wrong. If we admit his premise—which I, for one, do not—we must admit also that the deduction he drew from it is logically unanswerable. In one sense, of course, I have ulterior views—I desire that Parliament should take a more comprehensive view of the rights and interests of women. If the votes of women would turn the scale anywhere, that of itself shows that men on that subject are pretty equally divided in opinion, and, presumably, the interests of women would be so far involved that they would be justified in turning the scale. I regret the absence from the House of my right hon. Friend the late Member for Kilmarnock (Mr. Bouverie), who had formerly deprecated the Americanization of our institutions, and represented that the disposition of American women to agitate had produced a re-action against the granting of the suffrage to women in America. But I find this opinion denied by Mr. Garrison, of Massachusetts, in an account he has given of a conversation on the subject with the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster.) Mr. Garrison declared that the movement was never so far advanced as now and never had so many supporters. Everything in America seems to run into exaggeration; but in England we have to legislate for Englishwomen, in whose common sense I, for one, have unbounded confidence. I claim the vote of the hon. and learned Member for Taunton (Sir Henry James) in fulfilment of a promise. He said that he would vote for the Bill if one-half of the ladies in Taunton appealed to him to do so. Well, the hon. and learned Gentleman has presented a Petition in favour of the Bill from more than half the ladies. [Sir HENRY JAMES: Householders, you mean.] At all events, my hon. and learned Friend has promised to vote for a Bill, which he has described as fraught with discord to married life, and sapping the foundations of society, if only he were asked to do so by half the women in a small borough in the West of England. Let the House test the strength of the hon. and learned Member's arguments by the offer he has made. He said also that the sympathetic element in women was apt to deprive them of all logical power. I deny the fact; but surely logic is one of the rarest things, even among male electors. How many of the Members of this House are logical? Women may not be good logicians, but they have an intuitive perception of right and wrong, and will vote for the right kind of representative to pass useful measures. The Conservative hon. Member for Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate) formerly asked the House to reject this as an ultra-Radical measure; and to show how extremes meet, the ultra-Radical, Mr. Goldwin Smith, said it was a revolutionary proposal, and that if women had votes the free institutions of the country would be destroyed. I will not condescend to answer the absurdities of the ex-Professor, but I will ask my hon. Friend to consider whether woman's submission to authority, her reverence for religion, and her regard for law are elements of a revolutionary nature. The supporters of the Bill have sometimes to encounter ridicule. Argument I can meet, but misplaced ridicule I despise. Not that I object to wit, when it is used to feather the arrow of argument and give force and buoyancy to its flight; and I do not quarrel with Horace for saying, "Ridentem dicere verum Quid vetat?" Perhaps we may hear quoted the lines from Tennyson's Princess—

"Pretty were the sight,

If our old halls should change their sex, and flaunt
With Prudes for Doctors, Dowagers for Deans,

But I feel sure that in the House of Commons—an Assembly of Gentlemen—no hon. Member will descend to low and vulgar ridicule, or attempt to show his wit by coarse and silly alliterations, and speak of the "shrieking sisterhood;" language which I was ashamed to read in a newspaper which calls itself one of the enlightened instructors of the people. And now, Sir, I have done. I have pleaded this cause with all the earnestness of settled and deliberate conviction. I wish I could have pleaded it with more eloquence and power. I did wish that the conduct of the Bill should be placed in the hands of some Member of the House who has experience and authority to which I can make no pretension. I thought that the Bill ought to be brought in by some Member like the late Member for Manchester (Mr. Jacob Bright), whose name has so long been honourably connected with the question of Women's Suffrage. But as I was strongly urged to undertake the task, I was willing that others rather than myself should be judges of my fitness to bring forward the measure. In the present Parliament there are many new Members whose opinions on this question are not yet known—and there are many who, I believe, are wavering and quite open to conviction. To them I earnestly appeal. There is hardly any new measure which can be proposed to which there are not some objections, and this is no exception to the general rule. But what I ask is this—place all the objections if you like in one side of the balance, and place in the other the arguments in favour of the Bill—and then calmly and dispassionately ask yourselves which of the two really preponderates. If you find that the arguments for the measure are stronger than the arguments against it, give effect to the conviction of your judgment by your vote. You will thereby gratify the ardent wishes of a great proportion of your countrywomen. You will declare that you do not consider them so intellectually your inferiors that you cannot trust them to have a fractional vote in the choice of their Representatives. You will show that you appreciate at its true worth the fallacy that the possession of the franchise will deteriorate their nature, and you will assert the constitutional principle that taxation and representation ought to be reciprocal, and not altogether divorced, as is now the case with the larger part of the population of this Kingdom. In the days of ancient Rome the Social War was caused by the refusal of the Roman people to grant to the inhabitants of the provinces the Jus suffragii and rights of free citizens. They were compelled to serve in the Roman Armies, and bear the burdens of the proud Republic; but they were not allowed to vote in the election of a Roman magistrate. You know that the provincials were victorious in the contest, and by their loyal allegiance Rome was enabled to become the mistress of the world. If you reject this Bill you will say that women shall bear the burdens of the taxpayer, but shall not enjoy the only privilege which those burdens confer—namely, the possession of a vote. You will not, indeed, have a Social War, but you will have wide-spread discontent. There will be in the minds of one-half of the population of these islands a fixed feeling that they are treated with injustice, and doomed to bear the stigma of inferiority. They will not unnaturally resent the idea that they alone of all the subjects of a Sovereign—who is herself a woman—are to be denied the rights of free citizens of a constitutional Monarchy, and be assured that they will never cease from their demand until this unjust restriction is removed. That it will be removed, sooner or later, I have not a shadow of a doubt; and, if so, it is better soon than late. The history of past legislation shows how unwise it is to resist demands that are just, and to wait until you are forced or shamed into concession. In no long time after such a Bill as mine, if not mine now, is passed, men will wonder at their opposition, and smile at the forebodings which they allowed to haunt their imaginations. They will find that instead of injuring the nature and character of woman they have done something to elevate them both, and make her more fit to be the intellectual companion of man. It is right, just, and expedient to do so; and in the name of Right, Justice, and Expediency, I earnestly ask the House of Commons to consent to the second reading of this Bill.

MR. FRASER MACKINTOSH said, he wished to remind the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Marylebone, that it was one of the Rules of the House when one hon. Member misrepresented or depreciated another to give an explanation and an apology. Now, he believed the same rule ought to be applied to a case where constituencies were misrepresented or depreciated in a manner calculated to give pain. He was an ardent supporter of the Bill; but he must take exception to the remarks made by the hon. and learned Member which were prejudicial to certain Scottish burghs, inclusive of Nairn, one of the burghs he (Mr. Mackintosh) had the honour of representing.

MR. FORSYTH said, the words were uttered in the haste of the moment, and he entirely withdrew them.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Foreyth.)

MR. H. CHAPLIN, is rising to move as an Amendment, That the Bill be read a second time that day six months, said: Mr. Speaker, perhaps the House will, in the first place, allow me to express my sense of the courtesy which I have received from the hon. Gentleman the Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Leatham), in giving me precedence upon this occasion, and which has afforded to me and to others the opportunity which was desired, of giving the most practical contradiction in our power to the suggestion that hon. Gentlemen sitting on this side of the House were, generally speaking, in favour of this measure. Having said that, let me add that it is from no wish of my own that I fill the position which I occupy now, and I cannot help feeling that I labour under some disadvantage. The ladies, indeed, or perhaps I ought rather to say, that extremely limited number of ladies who have made this cause their own, are favoured indeed by fortune I think, in the man whom they have selected to advance and to further their views on this day, and who is no unworthy successor to the champion whom, through the fortunes of an election, they have recently lost from this House.

Whilst I, Sir, cannot pretend for a moment to vie with him who was lately their chief opponent, either in his power and practice in debate, or in the weight and authority with which everything coming from Mr. Bouverie was received in this House, and which was the first and natural tribute of a long and honoured and honourable career in this House, Sir, I confess that I have always myself been among the number of those who, from the out-set, regarded this question as one which was scarcely deserving of even our serious consideration. But we live in the days—whether for good or for evil—of rapidly changing opinions, and when I know that many hon. Members of this House, whose opinions I cannot but value, have, at one time or another, voted in support of this measure; when we see, as we have seen in this case, that Leaders upon both sides of this House have given either their absolute or their qualified adhesion to the principles of this measure, then, Sir, I for one am no longer prepared to deny that it is a serious question, and one which deserves the careful attention of the House; and viewing it then in that light, I am prepared to consider it, not alone on, as I think, the somewhat inadequate grounds—the narrow and limited lines, which the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Marylebone (Mr. Forsyth) has marked out for us to-night; not alone with regard to its more immediate issues, but as a question of which, if it be carried out to its logical ends, the importance can scarcely be overrated, and which will surely involve us in an absolute and a complete revolution of all the social relations, as well as political views, by which not only we, but the whole world, has been governed, since the earliest ages of History, and the very creation of man. Now, Sir, I know in discussing this question that there is little I fear which is new, and which is left to be said, either against or in support of this measure. My hon. and learned Friend has supplied us this evening with a number of different reasons, some of them plausible in the extreme why he thinks the Bill should become law, and with which in a moment I will endeavour to deal; but I am content to rest my opposition on grounds which I will at once state to the House. I object to this

Bill, then, in the first place, because in giving direct political power to women we are embarking upon an experiment for which, in History, so far, not one single precedent is to be found, which, however, it may be regarded, in the minds of dreaming philosophers, or philanthropic Professors, is unknown and untried, and has no place at all in the world of practical politics; and I object to experiments, especially when, as I think, they may best be described as political quackery, being tried in a country with a settled and well understood Constitution like England; my motto would rather be this—Fiat experimentum in corpore vili. Secondly, Sir, I oppose it, because I hold it to be our bounden duty to require and to demand at the hands of those who are its supporters convincing and absolute proof that there is urgent necessity for legislation of this kind, before we accept a proposal, which the collective wisdom of ages, the teaching of all religion in every form and under every guise, and, as I believe, the instincts of the whole human race has, on the one hand, never demanded; and, on the other hand, has thought it right to withhold; and I contend that in this case, no such necessity has been established. Again, Sir, I shall resist it, because I know not, indeed, on what ground of consistency we can refuse, if we sanction this Bill, the demand which is certain to follow—for admission for women to these very benches on which we sit at this moment. And, lastly, Sir, I shall oppose it on grounds which are perfectly simple, and which ought, I think, to commend themselves, at all events, to hon. Gentlemen sitting on this side of the House—namely, as another attempt to disturb and enlarge the existing franchise. Now, Sir, taking the last of these points to begin with, it cannot be denied that the Bill of my hon. and learned Friend, modest indeed as it is in dimensions and limited as to its clauses, is in the nature, at all events, of a new and another Reform Bill, and one which proposes to add an indefinite number of voters to the boroughs and counties throughout the Kingdom. Now, Sir, the House will remember, that we had a proposal of this kind only last Session—a Bill to extend household suffrage to counties, and we have another one yet to look forward to, in addition to this before the present Session is ended, and that too at a time when, as we ought to remember, this is the second Parliament only elected under the latest Reform Bill, and the first elected under the Ballot. Now, I agree with those hon. Gentlemen who think, that it is the most unwise thing in the world in any country, especially an old country like England, to be for ever speculating upon organic changes of the Constitution. My right hon. Friend at the head of the Government, speaking on the Bill of the hon. Member for the Border Burghs (Mr. Trevelyan) last year, expressed an empathic opinion to that effect, and therefore on those grounds alone, entirely apart from the general question, I should feel it my duty to resist this Motion this evening. And now, Sir, passing from this to the more special object and purpose contained in the Bill namely, to give the electoral franchise to women, on the same terms and conditions as men, I find it exceedingly hard to believe, that the united experience of the whole civilized world, has been from the commencement erroneous and fundamentally wrong, and yet we can come to no other conclusion than that this, if we are to accept the Bill of my hon. and learned Friend. Now, what has my hon. and learned Friend said this evening in support of this view? He has brought up again the old story of the Petitions, which have been laid on the Table, and he seeks to found on that fact, an urgent demand why the Bill should become law. But what is the number of women in England, and what does he think of the ominous silence of those millions of women who have not petitioned in support of his Bill? Does he suppose, and is it possible for us to believe, that if the women of England in reality laboured under a thralldom, so galling as to be insufferable to them, that the signatures to these Petitions would not have been numbered by millions instead of by thousands? Then, again, we have been told of the great and oppressive inequality which exists in the laws as between men and women, and my hon. and learned Friend would have us to believe, that until they have votes, it is hopeless for women to expect anything even approaching to justice and equity at the hands of a Parliament, which is composed of and which is elected solely by men. Now, if that statement were true, if it had even a shadow of foundation, I myself should be the first person to admit that they had strong prima facie grounds for the claim which has been made; but I deny that it is so, and I protest altogether against the idea that there is either the smallest desire or the intention, on the part of the Imperial Parliament, to do less than justice to women, and I claim, on the other hand, both for the Parliament and for those of whom it is composed, that they are animated by a deep and by a pure desire to deal out full and even-handed justice to all who come before them; be they rich or be they poor, be they young or be they old, or be they of whichever sex they may belong to. But, then, I am told that this is by no means the whole of the case; and my hon. and learned Friend has advanced a number of arguments, which he doubtless considers conclusive why the Bill should become law. We are told that women pay rates, and enjoy in that respect the same qualifications as men; that they are Peeresses in their own rights; that they can hold manorial courts; that women can be elected as overseers and churchwardens; and, finally, Sir, it is said—though I do not think my hon. and learned Friend used that argument this evening—that a woman sits on the Throne of the country, and that women vote for and sit upon school boards. Now, Sir, the House need be under no apprehension that I am about to discuss in detail, all these arguments which are brought forward. They have been argued and answered over and over again in this House, and they are one and all of them open, according to my mind, to one and the same objection. In theory, Sir, it is true, that if a woman pays rates, if a woman possesses the rights and bears the burdens of property, and is therefore a capable citizen, no adequate reason can be adduced why she should not have a vote in the same way as a man. But then we must go a little bit further than theory, and see where this doctrine would lead us. If the fact that a woman sits on the Throne, and that women vote for and sit upon school boards, is a reason why they should vote, it is, of course, a still better reason why they should sit in this House. Now, my hon. and learned Friend, following the example of all who have gone before him, has evaded this very material part of the question, by saying he treats it as a matter of ridicule. I take issue with my hon. and learned Friend altogether upon that point, and I say that it must be regarded as a most serious part of the question. I have the highest authority, Sir, when I do this. What says Mr. Mill upon this point, himself the original author of the whole of this movement? Mr. Mill, it is true, has pointed out with some care—

“That the right to share in the choice of those who exercise a public trust is altogether distinct from the right to compete in the exercise of that trust.”

And, so far, I admit he is right, that the law in this country, while it requires a qualification from those who are to elect Members of Parliament, requires no qualification and places no limitation on those who are to be elected. But nowhere does Mr. Mill say women ought not to compete for this trust; on the contrary, Sir, I find that this passage occurs in his book, which I will read to the House. Mr. Mill says, that—

“To ordain that any kind of persons shall not be physicians, or shall not be advocates, or shall not be Members of Parliament, is to injure not only them, but all who employ physicians, or advocates, or who elect Members of Parliament.”

And, again, Sir, if I may read another quotation of which I believe Mrs. Mill is the author, what does she say on this point? Mrs. Mill says—

“We deny the right of any portion of the species to decide for another portion, or any individual for another individual what is and what is not their proper sphere. The proper sphere for all human beings is the largest and highest which they are able to attain to. What this is cannot be ascertained without complete liberty of choice.”

Now, Sir, quotations like these, especially coming from the quarter they do, if they have meaning at all, clearly mean this—that they both had it in contemplation, that, sooner or later, women should not only vote, but should be elected as Members of Parliament also. I trust, therefore, Sir, that in future, when this objection is raised, that it will not be simply evaded, but will be met with the argument and the attention which it deserves, and that we may have it explained, if this Motion, indeed, is to be treated in earnest as a serious question. What the disqualification is which rests upon woman, as woman, with regard to a seat in this House, which does not equally rest upon woman, as woman, with regard to the votes, which confer the right to a seat in this House. And now, Sir, I have endeavoured, as far as it lies in my power to do so, to meet and to answer the arguments which have been advanced by my hon. and learned Friend. There remains little further for me to say. I have such reverence for women, such deep respect for their peaceful and unselfish lives, for the purity of all their thoughts, and for that unerring instinct, by which I do believe, in all their aspirations they are guided, that if I was convinced that the suffrage was demanded by any large majority, it would be difficult, indeed, to resist their application. But it is because I am convinced that this agitation which we see being carried on around us in no way represents the wishes or the views of the vast majority of Englishwomen, but rather the restless and discontented longings of a few, and those, it may be, not the happiest or most favoured of their sex, that I will not cease to offer opposition to this mischievous and idle Bill; and claiming, as I do claim, then to speak in the name and on behalf of an overwhelming majority of the women of my country, I move, Sir, with confidence and expectation, the rejection of this most uncalled-for and most unnecessary measure.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word “now,” and at the end of the Question to add the words “upon this day six months.”—(Mr. Chaplin.)

MR. LEATHAM: Mr. Speaker—Sir, the hon. and learned Gentleman who brought this Bill before the House (Mr. Forsyth) complains that some of those who dispute the claim of women to co-ordinate political authority with men have indulged in sarcasm and ridicule in place of argument. But, Sir, when it is proposed to set aside the immemorial usage of mankind, surely the burden of proof rests not on those who resist the change, but on those who urge it. And when something is proposed so strange that it has never yet occurred to any member of the human family until we arrived at the enlightened generation of the hon. and learned Gentleman to propose it, surely the prima facie irony of the situation is more crushing than any sarcasm which human ingenuity can devise. Does the hon. and learned Gentleman think that while mankind has been exploring now for thousands of years, every nook and corner of political experiment, yet that it has never occurred to anyone to suggest the promotion of women to equal political authority with ourselves, is or is not an argument against this Bill? But, perhaps, the hon. and learned Gentleman will say that the immemorial practice of mankind has been founded upon sentiment and not upon reason. Sir, I think it will be an evil day for all of us when we discard sentiment in legislation, especially when we are dealing with our relations towards the other sex. What is sentiment? It is the resultant of a great variety of forces, of which reason is only one, others being respect for authority and custom, the influence of conscience, of common sense, observation, and experience. Now, I do not hesitate to say, notwithstanding what has fallen from the hon. and learned Gentleman, that the concurrent sentiment of both sexes—I speak of the vast majority—is entirely opposed to the principle of this Bill. When any hon. Gentleman rests his vote upon the concurrent sentiment of both sexes, backed by the immemorial usage of the species, I do not think he need be under any very violent anxiety, even if for a moment he permits his reason to repose. But I should be content to base my opposition to the measure upon the attitude towards it of the very sex for whose benefit it is sought. The hon. and learned Gentleman has admitted that women are not great logicians. I think that every one will allow that Nature, speaking generally of the sex, has denied to woman the faculty of very close reasoning; but Nature has given woman another faculty, which, under her circumstances, is perhaps of equal importance—and that is an innate and unerring, and, to the best women, imperative sense of what is womanly. And with all the vehemence of an intuitive perception, I maintain that this sense rebels and protests against the principle of this Bill. Does the hon. and learned Gentleman deny it? It was only the other day that I read a letter in the newspapers, written by an ardent supporter of the hon. and learned Gentleman, in which she bitterly and passionately upbraided her sex for their almost total indifference to this movement. I think her words were,

that not one woman in a hundred could be induced to take any interest in it. Is it possible to conceive a more crushing condemnation of the movement itself? Are we asked to enfranchise women in spite of themselves? Every appeal has been made to the foibles of the sex, to vanity, love of change and novelty, and the notion which some women entertain that man is an oppressor. And what is the result? Why, the sense of what is womanly stands firm, and women generally have set their faces resolutely against their benefactors. The hon. and learned Gentleman spoke of the Petitions presented in favour of this Bill. There never was a more conspicuous failure. We all know how Petitions are got up. Let the hon. and learned Gentleman count the number of women in the constituencies, and then compare them with the number of women who have signed these Petitions. I have ventured to oppose this measure before, and I put a Motion on the Paper for its rejection, and, therefore, at times I have drawn upon myself the full stream of the hon. and learned Gentleman's agitation. Meetings have been held in my constituency. Women, charming in everything except the false position which they were betrayed into assuming upon a public platform, have addressed highly sympathetic audiences, who admired the oratory through lorgnettes. And what was the result? I received a memorial signed by 130 persons. I have the honour to represent a constituency of 12,000 electors, and containing 80,000 persons. I have presented to-day a Petition, signed, I am told, by 6,000 persons, or not quite one in every 12 throughout my constituency. Let the hon. and learned Gentleman convince the clients on whose behalf he professes to appear before he attempts to convince this House. Well, Sir, because we confront the hon. and learned Gentleman with sentiment, or, if he will, with ridicule, do not let it be supposed that we are unwilling to meet him in fair argument. I think he has been met in fair argument already by the brilliant speech of my hon. Friend opposite (Mr. Chaplin), and, like him, I decline to argue this broad question upon the narrow and artificial ground selected by the hon. and learned Gentleman. The question before the House is not, shall a few spinsters and widows be admitted to the franchise? but shall woman be declared the political equal of man? The House may at once gather what is the real scope and object of this movement if it recalls what took place last year. The hon. and learned Gentleman has told us that last year he inserted a Proviso in his Bill which should formally exempt all married women from the franchise. What was the result? There was an immediate exclamation, I will not call it "a shriek," from the sisterhood. There was a general erasure of names from the committee, and angry letters appeared in the newspapers from supporters of the hon. and learned Gentleman, in which they stated, with the freedom and courage with which some women approach certain questions, that if the Bill were passed in that shape it would be a Bill for the enfranchisement of a class of women—not being a woman I will use a periphrasis—whose public virtues greatly outshine their private ones. The hon. and learned Gentleman has admitted that if we pass this Bill we shall enact exactly the same franchise as that which would have been established last year with this Proviso. Is the House, then, asked to pass a Bill which, in the language of supporters of the hon. and learned Gentleman, is for the enfranchisement of women of easy virtue? Is this what he means by the removal of the disabilities of women? The House will arrive at the same conclusion with regard to the scope of this movement if it recalls the history of the movement itself. A few years ago, with that indifference—I will not say contempt—with which this House at times appears to regard matters of a purely municipal character, at 3 o'clock in the morning, it flung the municipal suffrage to the clamour of these agitators. Almost simultaneously we gave the school board franchise. We were told at the time when these franchises were conferred that we were not so much as touching the far wider question of the Imperial franchise; and yet, Sir, the municipal franchise was scarcely given when the Imperial franchise was demanded. We are told now that we are not so much as touching the far wider question of the enfranchisement of women irrespective of marriage; and yet I am prepared to show that a parallel movement in favour of giving franchises to married women has already commenced. I hold in my hand a letter which was addressed a few months ago to an hon. Friend of mine in this House. With his permission, and the leave of the House, I should like to read a short extract from it. The writer says—

"I am writing to ask whether you will allow your name to be inserted in the list of vice-presidents of an influential Liberal-Conservative Society, which is being formed solely for the purpose of obtaining the school board franchise alone for the wives of registered male electors. It is thought a grievance and injustice that mothers of families, whose respectability is guaranteed by their husband's position as a householder, should be indirectly excluded from a trust"—['educational' is written in afterwards]—"already conceded to ratepaying spinsters."

If you pass this Bill, what is to prevent this "influential Liberal-Conservative Association" from extending its operations? What is there in this argument which is not applicable to the municipal or Parliamentary franchise? Would not the respectability of married women be guaranteed then by their husband's position as a householder, and would it not be just as great an injustice that they should be indirectly excluded from other trusts? Of course we shall be told, as the hon. and learned Gentleman has suggested, that married women can never be enfranchised in this country, because by the Common Law of England a married woman is placed in a position of subordination to her husband, and of dependence upon him, and that it is of the very essence of our electoral system that electors should be independent and free. But this leads me to the centre and kernel of the whole question. It is impossible to discuss female privileges apart from the consideration of the relations of the sexes in marriage. If marriage were an accident, or merely an incident in the career of woman, it would be different; but when marriage is the ordinary and normal state of woman—the state which, Miss Becker herself tells us, all women regard "either from the side of experience or expectation"—it is simple folly to discuss the question of female suffrages and privileges apart from it. If you give the franchise to women at all, give it first to those women who are discharging the sovereign responsibilities of the sex; who are mothers of families; and who have given precisely those guarantees to law and order which it was the intention of the State in enacting household suffrage to demand from men. Again, Sir, if the sexes are to be declared politically equal, equality of political rights involves equality of political obligations. The right of voting involves the right of being voted for. Political equality means a great deal more than equality from an electoral point of view; it means also equality from a legislative and an administrative point of view. You must have women in this House, women upon that Bench, and women, too, upon the Judicial Bench. The hon. and learned Gentlemen disclaims this. He derides the idea of women sitting in this House; but when you come to political equality between the sexes, I defy him to fix the logical point at which the absurdity begins. Of course, the position of those who are opposed to this measure is that which has already been stated by my hon. Friend opposite (Mr. Chaplin)—namely, that it is not sentiment, or prejudice, or any desire of one sex to domineer over the other, but the highest economy, based upon the Divine law itself, which has resolved the whole sum of human duties into two distinct spheres; not antagonistic, the one inferior and the other superior, but complementary the one to the other, and representing together the ideal of humanity which is dual not single. Under this natural and providential arrangement, those duties which belong to the external world, which are rugged in their character and require the exercise of that practical sagacity which it is not possible any one can obtain without mixing freely with his fellows, fall to the rougher and more rugged sex; while those which are best discharged in the privacy of home, which appeal more to the heart, have fallen to that sex, of whose virtue shrinking modesty is an essential part, and who, in all matters relating to the heart, are a higher and purer sex than ourselves. But when we talk of the duality of the species we are assailed by statistics, which show that there are a number of women in this country, who, in the nature of things, can never marry, and we are asked to provide for them a masculine career. But is it any proof because a woman happens to have failed, from one cause or another, in the rôle of her own sex, that she can adequately discharge the more difficult and less congenial part of man? As I have said, Miss Becker implies that she still regards marriage from the side of expectation; and I think it argues strange poverty of resource in women to assert that there is no career open to them unless they have the career of men presented to their choice. In spite of the march of civilization, there is still some human suffering left in the world. There is still pain enough to soothe, and sorrow enough to solace. It is in this field that women in all ages have been able to satisfy the loftiest ambitions, and, in doing so, have raised themselves, and their whole sex along with them, to a pinnacle of greatness which the best men have envied in vain. Nor is it any argument to say that there always have been women equal to any man in political capacity. As there are always mule birds in every pheasantry, so there are always, as Shakespeare says, women, who, "if they be not caparisoned like a man, have a doublet and hose in their disposition." What should we think of the logic of a logician who argued that because there have been men the equals of any woman in the management of children, or of the batterie de cuisine, therefore the nursery and kitchen formed the proper sphere for the exercise of masculine energy? I have observed that even the Queen has been dragged into this discussion. I wish to speak of the Queen with the deep respect and loyalty which I feel; but I must ask whether the Queen is an apt illustration of this theory? Is the Queen a Party politician? Has the Queen to choose between two rival policies? We all know that the Queen rules by the advice of her Ministers, who, thank God! at present are men and not women. And if there be one trait in the character of the Queen which has endeared her to her people more than any other, it is the profound respect which she has always felt for the memory of the Prince upon the guidance of whose masculine intellect she was accustomed to rely. I will not enter at any length into the somewhat invidious controversy raised by the hon. and learned Gentleman as to the comparative political capacities of men and women; but I should like to ask him one question upon this point. How does he explain the fact that we—I speak of the Anglo-Saxons on both sides of the Atlantic—are the only race which is able to point to the permanent success of representative institutions established upon a popular basis? Is it not due to the fact that we are in all probability the most practical and least emotional of nations; that we are almost wholly free from those paroxysms of passion and caprice which have again and again made women of the Latin races upon the Continent? But just in proportion as you introduce into your electoral system the elements which distinguish the Latin races, and the whole race of women, you endanger everything of which in this country we are proud. If these are the arguments which can be adduced against the measure, I want to know what becomes of arguments based on an assumption of abstract right? When my hon. Friend the late Member for Manchester (Mr. Jacob Bright) had charge of this Bill, I think he was wiser in his generation than the hon. and learned Gentleman, for he used to begin by frankly admitting that he could not base his argument upon any question of abstract right. He said—"I am aware that Parliament never yet legislated to satisfy a theory or to establish an abstract right." But the argument in favour of the Bill to-day has been abstract right from one end to the other; and I think the hon. and learned Gentleman will not complain if I proceed to formulate his argument in these words—If sex be no ground for relieving women from the burdens of citizenship, sex can form no justification for refusing them the rights of citizenship. But, Sir, sex is a ground for relieving women from many of the burdens of citizenship. For example, they are relieved from the burden of personally assisting in defence of their country, or of aiding the police in the discharge of their duties, and from the onerous burden of serving upon juries. The hon. and learned Gentleman tells us that because women pay the Queen's taxes, therefore they ought to vote, on the ground that representation and taxation go together. I understand that some women have gone the length of refusing to pay Queen's taxes on that ground. I wonder whether it occurred to them at the same time to renounce the Queen's protection? Do they forget that all women, all unmarried women especially, receive from the State an amount of protection far in excess of that accorded to any man, or of any contribution which they are asked to make to the Exchequer? Do they forget, as Shakespeare says, that "Beauty provoketh thieves as much as gold?" The hon. and learned Gentleman has cited the instance of the persons at Bridgwater who have protested against the payment of rates enhanced by the expenses of the local Election Inquiry, on the ground that they were not voters, and had nothing to do with bribery. They might just as well have protested against payment of the police rate on the ground that they were not pickpockets. Then we are told that the suffrage is based upon property, and that property has a vote, whoever holds it. I will not remind the House of the well-worn story of Dr. Franklin and the donkey suffrage; but I may say that the suffrage is not based upon property in this country, or the voting power of the individual would be proportionate to the property he possessed. Nor is it based upon the personal payment of rates in the sense of taxation being linked with representation; or why have we a lodger franchise: and how can the discharge of municipal obligations confer an Imperial privilege? The real intention of the Legislature in prescribing the personal payment of rates as a condition of the suffrage, was simply to draw a line somewhere, and to establish a hedge on the other side of which it might fairly be contended that no one had arrived at that position of independence and intelligence which would alone justify us in giving the Imperial franchise. It is no doubt true, as a matter of antiquarian lore, that representation was originally based upon taxation. Parliament, in those days, had no higher function than to vote Supplies, although they availed themselves of the opportunity now and then to offer sound advice to the Monarch. But we have long ago drifted away from that primitive state of things; and it is trifling to argue this question as if we were still living in the days of the Plantagenets. The questions which now come before Parliament are of the utmost importance, and of a technical and complicated character. We have questions about the administration of the Army and the Navy, about finance, and ecclesiastical policy, the judicature, and procedure in the Law Courts. What information can women bring to us upon these points! Yet the hon. and learned Gentleman argues as though this great Parliament were assembled for no higher purpose than to legislate about the custody of infants. By all means let such questions be duly and patiently considered; but do not let us remodel our whole electoral system with an eye to the supposed interest which unmarried women take in the loathsome and disgusting question which was glanced at by the hon. and learned Gentleman. We are told that there are certain women's grievances which will never be redressed until women are represented. It is hardly credible, but scarcely one of those grievances to which he referred affect the women whom he proposes to enfranchise. The hon. and learned Gentleman says that women must be enfranchised in order that their grievances may be redressed; and yet the women whom he selects for enfranchisement are those whom the grievances do not touch. It is almost as though my hon. Friend the Member for the Border Burghs (Mr. Trevelyan) were to bring in a Bill for the extension of the franchise in counties, on the ground that the grievances of agricultural labourers would never be redressed until they had votes, well knowing that there was a clause in his Bill which would have the practical effect of disfranchising every agricultural labourer. If these grievances of women are as oppressive and patent as the hon. and learned Gentleman has asked us to believe, I want to know why he does not devote some part of his redundant energy and overflowing eloquence to their exposure in this House? I will give the House a reason why this is not done, although I do not suggest that it is the one which actuates the hon. and learned Gentleman. Were these grievances to be brought before this House they would be discussed, and the House would arrive at one of two decisions. It would either decide that they were grievances, and redress them; or it would decide that they were not, and dismiss them. Either course would be fatal to the hon. and learned Gentleman's case for this Bill. The fundamental error of all this reasoning is, that women constitute a class apart in the sense that agricultural labourers or working men constitute a class apart. They do not do so; there is no want of sympathy between men and women; and for all practical purposes women are represented already by their husbands, sons, and brothers. But no one will contend that working men are adequately represented by their employers, or that agricultural labourers are adequately represented by the farmers. The last argument to which I shall advert, is that to which the hon. and learned Gentleman referred when he spoke of the Ballot. Perhaps I have some little right to speak on behalf of the advocates of the Ballot. He says the institution of the Ballot has removed the greatest obstacle to female suffrage, because it has put an end to violence at the polls. I am glad to hear from him such valuable testimony to the success of the Ballot. It is quite true that the advocates of the Ballot hoped that its introduction would put an end to all forms of intimidation, and amongst others to that of violence at the polls. And we attached so much importance to this, that we were willing at the time to disregard other evils which the experience of Australia had told us we might expect if the Ballot were introduced. One of these was the greater prevalence of treating prior to the poll. I do not know whether it has had that effect, but I should not be surprised if it has; and I consider that nothing could be more demoralizing than to subject unmarried women to this general treating before the poll took place. So that if the Ballot has removed one objection to female suffrage, it seems to me to have substituted another. I ought, Sir, to apologize for trespassing upon the time of the House so long. I have spoken at some length, because I was anxious to clear myself from the imputation of desiring to dismiss this question lightly. I do not think the question ought to be measured by the amount of emotional inconsequence and hysterical incoherence displayed by some of its advocates. As I have endeavoured to show, it goes down to the very roots of political principle. I have heard that it is desired to secure for women an equal share in the distribution of Garters and ribbons. By all means let them have Garters and ribbons; but if we value the manliness of our institutions and the manliness of our policy, let us keep all the springs and sources of them manly.

MR. SMOLLETT said, he believed he was not at fault when he said that the first Motion for removing women's disabilities in that House was made in 1867, and he further believed he was equally correct in stating that when the matter was mooted on that occasion it was thought to be a sorry jest. In the same year the House was engaged in the discussion of a huge Reform Bill, which was characterized by its authors and promoters as a "great leap in the dark;" and Members of Parliament at that time could hardly bring themselves to believe that women, who were as a sex wide awake to their own concerns, could have endured these supposed wrongs for so many generations, nay, could have slumbered over them for centuries; and that they had then only for the first time discovered that all the ills to which flesh is heir would be redressed by the admission of a small portion of their sex to the enjoyment of a household or lodger franchise, shared by tens of thousands of the artisans and working classes in this country, most of whom, but for a self-acting registration, would not take the trouble of making a claim for their votes. But what was at that time thought a very sorry jest, had turned out to be a sad reality; for dilettanti statesmen and idle legislators had seemingly resolved that the question should be agitated to the extent of at least wasting one night every Session; and if the promoters of the Bill succeeded in carrying the second reading, it was obvious that several days must necessarily be consumed in its discussion, to the delay of all ordinary business and the detriment of the real legislation of the Session. The Bill, the second reading of which had been moved that evening, was one of the tiniest and puniest measures it had ever been his fortune to criticize. It recited no grievance which its adoption would remedy. It had no Preamble, and yet the Bill had been described by some of the greatest statesmen in the House—notably by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone)—as a measure which he would not countenance, because it was calculated to uproot society from its foundations. He was stated to have made this admission in 1870. As that right hon. Gentleman was

"Everything by turns and nothing long"

he supposed the promoters of the Bill expected he would support its second reading on the present occasion. But the earnest opponents of the Bill continued to declare that it was a measure which would disturb the entire structure of society; which would obliterate distinctions which had existed since the commencement of the world, and were still recognized by every civilized community; for—

"When Adam delved and Eve span,"

Adam was a bread-winner, and Eve attended to her domestic duties. This was a Bill of organic change, a huge measure of reform, and like all such measures reforming downwards, tending to universal suffrage. Yet the Bill was compressed into six short lines. It simply declared that in certain Acts of Parliament, which it did not specify, wherever the words imported the masculine gender, they should be held to mean the feminine gender—that was the Bill, the whole Bill, and nothing but the Bill. He remembered that in the year 1860, Lord John Russell introduced a Reform Bill into the House of Commons, which consisted of five or six printed pages. That measure did not propose to enfranchise more than the present Bill did, but it was nearly snuffed out on the second reading by an observation made by the then hon. Member for Marylebone (Mr. Edwin James), who, although he supported the proposal, said the Bill was not meant to pass, for he would undertake that his clerk would draw a better Bill for the modest remuneration of three guineas. The laughter that followed that announcement nearly destroyed the Bill, and it was shortly afterwards withdrawn. He thought the draftsman of the present Bill would be well paid by a little sixpence, which was at the rate of a penny a line. Last year there was a Proviso to the Bill, which was contained in one line, stating that married women might be registered, though they should not vote under the Bill. There was no such Proviso in this Bill; and in explanation it was stated that, as by the Common Law, married women were disqualified, the proviso was unnecessary. Well, if this was the case, he contended that both Bills had something in common—both threw a stigma on married life. Both declared emphatically that when a woman married she lost her rights of citizenship—that her duty thereafter was to bear children; that she was the slave of her husband, and part of his goods and chattels; that her role in life was altered, and that she must be content—

“To suckle fools and chronicle small beer.”

Under this Bill, elderly virgins, widows, a large class of the demi-monde and kept women, of whom, in a large town like this, there must be a great number, would be admitted to the franchise, while the married women of England—mothers, who formed the mainstay of the nation—were rigidly excluded. He had stated that it was only in 1867 that notice was taken of the disabilities of women in the House of Commons; but he was aware that this agitation had been carried on for some years before in the country. That agitation was brought into Great Britain by an importation of turbulent women from America, a country where it had been going on without any good result for something like half a century. Those ladies came over to champion “Woman’s rights,” and proclaim the equality of the sexes; and to show they had a right to do so, they assumed, or rather usurped male attire—they clad themselves in breeches. They were called “Bloomers.” That agitation lasted but a very short time, and why? Because women, as a rule, coveted admiration—the admiration of the male sex. Every woman who entered life expected, and hoped and believed, that one day she would be a bride, the mistress of a household, the mother of a family. Women made use of dress as an attraction to the male sex, for there was nothing so pleasing to the latter as to see a well-dressed woman. The ladies soon discovered that the new costume was not attractive. They saw at once that the pectoral, abdominal, and fundamental development of the sex looked grotesque in male attire. That style of dress was, therefore, soon abandoned. But although this distinctive dress was discontinued, the type of the strong-minded woman still survived. They formed a great organization, but it was not one which could be in any respect formidable—it was nothing like so troublesome as the Tichborne organization which now prevailed. No doubt, associations had been formed by the ladies in almost all the large towns, and lecturers sent round the counties talked a vast amount of rubbish, and the rights of women were constantly paraded. Those women who took up questions which they said appertained to the female sex alone had taken up questions that belonged properly to men, for they had entered into an hysterical crusade against the Contagious Diseases Acts. They championed the right of their fallen sisters to spread disease broadcast among the brave defenders of their country in seaport towns and in camps. The only consolation we had was, that the women in this country who took up these questions were few—not one in 50. Women generally were ashamed of those of their sex who took up this subject. Married women, as a rule, did not care for a Bill like this, because they believed what was said in Scripture, that man wanted a helpmate, and woman the comfort and support of a husband. And yet in all the meetings held throughout the country on the subject, the great argument used was that women ought to have a vote because the sexes were equal—nay, that women were far superior to men. He was not in the habit of attending any of those meetings, but he had read the lucubrations of some of the speakers, and with the permission of the House he would give a specimen of what was said at them. Some years ago a meeting was held at Edinburgh, which was the hot-bed of this agitation, for Edinburgh was a town where strong-minded women “most do congregate.” It was one of the most respectable meetings ever held on this subject; it contained a sprinkling of Members of Parliament, the families, he believed, of those Members attended, a number of Professors of the University, and a considerable body of citizens were present. The oratory was most successful. It was of the most sensational character, and was to this effect:—Women were described as something only inferior to angels; men, especially of the lower or the middle classes, as being brutal and debased; and the right of married women to vote in contradistinction to their husbands was insisted upon by almost every speaker. One of the orators present discoursed in something like the following language:—“Go into the wide world—he presumed by that expression the wide world of Scotland was meant—and what is the common language that we hear every day? It is that women, as a rule, are as administrators vastly superior to men. From the Newhaven fishwife to the highest lady in the Realm, women do every duty they undertake far better than men. If we go into general society, what is the purport of the conversation that we hear next morning at the breakfast table? It is this—that the man in the house where the previous evening was spent is a very ordinary fellow, a poor creature; but that ‘the grey mare in that household is the better horse.’ What is the language which every day meets our ears in ordinary life? It is this—‘That woman has made a good wife to him;’ that the woman is the real bread-winner, the real head of the household; that but for her labours and her exertions that fellow of a husband would have gone to the gaol or probably to the gallows. All this is admitted by society; but what says the law? The law as at present constituted says that the nobler vessel, the woman, shall be plundered, rifled, robbed, by a thief of a husband.”

MR. LYON PLAYFAIR: Could the hon. Gentleman tell us whether he is quoting a speech?

MR. SMOLLETT: The purport of the speech. The speech itself is to be found in the newspapers, and to quote it would take some hours.

MR. LYON PLAYFAIR: Who is speaking, may I ask?

MR. SMOLLETT: You may refer to the newspapers of the time. He might say, however, that it was a Member of Parliament. The orator proceeded thus:—“The man never did, never could gain his livelihood, but no doubt he has a vote, and he is ready to sell it for a pot of beer.” All that, of course, the orator added, required reform—we wanted a new Reform Bill, and here we had it, the Bill of the hon. and learned Member for Marylebone. But this Bill would not give a vote to the wretched, rifled, and robbed wife, the husband would have it still, and therefore it would not meet the grievance of which the orator so pathetically complained. Another speaker expressed himself thus:—“No man can truly represent a woman’s interests and feelings. John Stuart Mill may write of their wrongs, Professor Masson may make an eloquent harangue in their favour, but no one save a woman herself can find out what is a woman’s will.” Lord Byron had said—“Men with their heads reflect on this or that,

But women with their hearts on Heaven knows what.”

If Lord Byron lived to this day, he would have found out what it was, he would now know that they set their hearts on the lodger franchise. The same speaker went on to say that the cleverest women in Great Britain were lodging-house keepers, he seemed to have a large acquaintance with that portion of the community. He said, very truly, that there were whole streets of lodging-houses in great towns, kept generally by women who were married. Of course, they had drunken husbands. One, indeed, would have supposed that it was a meeting convened by the hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle (Sir Wilfrid Lawson), and that the remedy would have been the Permissive Bill. But no; the speaker said that those drunken husbands spent all their time in public-houses, leaving their wives to carry on the whole duty of the household, and yet they had no votes. And why, he asked, should they not have votes? Assuredly, they deserved them better than their drunken husbands. But this was not a Bill to give them votes, and therefore, if it were passed, every one of these excellent women would be as badly off as she was now. He would not now go into the question at greater length; but, in conclusion, he would say that if we were to have legislation for the removal of women’s disabilities, this was not a straightforward, honest, and manly way to meet the difficulty. If women, as a rule, were trampled on, thrust aside, tyrannized over by the male sex, as they alleged, let us freely admit the fact and make them ample reparation. If women no longer desired to be helpmates to men, if they thought that their role in the world was to compete with men and to surpass them in all the walks of life, let all the Universities in Great Britain be thrown open freely, and let young women and young men compete on equal terms for the honours of University life. They should be permitted to be called to the bar, to hold livings in the Church, to practise medicine and every other profession. They should be named as grand jurors, put upon the bench of magistrates, and compelled to serve as petty and special jurors upon all occasions, even upon coroners' inquests. They should be not merely permitted to vote, they should be admitted to those benches in the flesh, and not kept cooped up as they were now in the cage above the Chair. Peeresses by descent or by creation ought to be summoned by Her Majesty to take part in all the great business of the nation along with the Lords Spiritual and Temporal at the commencement of each Session. Nay, more. This House would not be stepping outside its functions by going up with an humble Address, praying Her Majesty to create a batch of Peeresses to take part in the discussions of the Upper Chamber. And if the administrative power, the genius, the eloquence of women should prove of great service in the Upper House; if these attributes should succeed in leavening the mass of that august but inert Assembly, then we might devise means by which a considerable number should be brought into the House of Commons at the next General Election. That was the sort of legislation we ought to take in hand, if the rights and wrongs of women be as they had been stated by their advocates; but, first of all, let them get rid of that abortion of a Bill, which was simply to say that in some Acts of Parliament which were not specified "men" should mean "women," and "women" mean "men," for that was a sort of language which, as Lord Dundreary had it, no fellow could understand.

MR. STANSFELD: I do not rise to reply to the speech of the hon. Member who has just addressed the House. Attacks which are coarse without being humorous defeat their own purpose, and damage the cause which they are meant to promote. The hon. Member has spoken of the women who rightly or wrongly are interested in this question in terms which I will not condescend to discuss. He has spoken of this question as having been imported by turbulent, fantastically-dressed women from beyond the Atlantic, and has said that it would largely enfranchise women of bad character. If it were necessary I could meet the hon. Member upon that ground, and I should be willing to undertake to expurgate from the Bill any words that could confer such a franchise, and insert others which would prevent its being conferred, on one condition, that the men who frequented the habitations of these supposed future voters should also be disfranchised. The hon. Member has had the courage to refer to the question of the Contagious Diseases Acts. In my opinion those Acts form a piece of grossly unjust, unconstitutional, and immoral legislation. ["No," and "Question."] No, I beg the hon. Member's pardon, I have not raised this question, it was raised by the hon. Member opposite. Those Acts would never have been passed if women's voices could have been potentially heard through Representatives whom they might elect to this House. But I am not about to discuss that question. It is not before us to-day, and I have only referred to it on this occasion to object to its having been introduced by the hon. Member. It will come before the House on a future day, and if the hon. Member will be here, and will do me the honour to listen to me upon that occasion, he shall hear in no uncertain terms what I believe I can prove of the character, the operation, and the immorality of those Acts. But I pass with pleasure from the speech of the hon. Member to those of the hon. Members for Lincolnshire and for Huddersfield. Both those speeches were distinguished by argument, by eloquence, and by brilliancy, and against neither of them have I a word to say—with one reserve, that I should have been glad if my hon. Friend the Member for Huddersfield could have prevailed upon himself to resist the temptation to utter a few bon mots, which it would have been better not to have given utterance to. Those hon. Members stated in their speeches much that was of a remarkable and a hopeful character. They both opposed the proposed legislation on grounds which would make it impossible for them logically even to entertain a proposal of this kind, and yet both of them gave the House to understand that although they did not believe that there was any evidence of women desiring such legislation, yet if a proposal of this kind were generally supported by the women of this country, they might modify their views on the subject, and might even vote for the Bill.

MR. CHAPLIN: I beg the right hon. Gentleman's pardon. What I said was that there would be a difficulty in resisting the application.

MR. STANSFELD: I did not take the hon. Member's exact words down. I understand, now, that what the hon.

Member means is that it would increase the difficulty of resistance, and not, as I understood him, that it would have an operation upon his own mind.

MR. CHAPLIN: I had no intention to convey that impression in the language I used.

MR. STANSFELD: I accept the explanation of the hon. Member. Both of the hon. Members said, and said quite reasonably, that it was for the supporters of the Bill to prove their case, and called upon them to show that there was a claim of right or expediency, and that there were conditions of sufficient urgency to justify Parliament in acceding to the demand. Well, I will endeavour, and, I hope, not at great length, to comply with this reasonable demand, because I for one seriously believe that what we now ask for would improve the conditions of the representation in this country, and would exercise a beneficial influence upon our Imperial legislation. I will not enter into the question of abstract right. If the House of Commons is not prepared seriously to entertain the proposal before it, no demonstration on my part of the abstract right will serve to convince it. But if, on the other hand, the time should arrive when, in consequence of the urgency of the demand, or of new political motives, hon. Members should become more prepared to entertain this question than they now are, I have no doubt that ideas of abstract right will very rapidly and easily range themselves on the side of events to come. The ground of abstract right, however, was one which the hon. and learned Gentleman, in introducing this measure, was bound to put before the House. There is also the ground of a large expediency, the advisability of satisfying a not unreasonable desire and demand, the expediency of bringing new influences to bear upon the legislation and the administration of the country. But there is another aspect of the question which to my mind is more practical and more fitted for our consideration, and that is that we should ask ourselves on what grounds we are to refuse the present proposal, why we should desire to refuse it, and what there is to fear in granting it. I listened to the debate in some respects with considerable satisfaction, because in the course of it I found that many of the objections that formerly were raised to the enfranchisement of women have disappeared. It was not without satisfaction that I found that no hon. Member referred to the pamphlet by Mr. Goldwin Smith, in which that able writer states that the enfranchisement of women by this Bill would lead to the enfranchisement of a law and liberty disliking class, and would end by overthrowing all our free institutions. A view so extravagant is not worthy of a writer of Mr. Goldwin Smith's ability and eminence, and I am glad that it has not been put forward to-day. Then, again, we have heard much less of the physical unfitness of women to exercise the franchise. There is no doubt that there is a radical difference in nature and in constitution between men and women, but that is a difference which will endure whatever our legislation may be, and I should be glad to see hon. Members put more faith in this constitutional difference between the sexes which the laws of Nature have provided. But although it may be true that there is this constitutional difference between the sexes, yet there is this distinction to be borne in mind—that although there may be an unfitness on the part of women for certain careers in life, such as that of the Bar, or that of politics, or to be members of a Legislative Assembly, or of an Imperial Government—that is not the question we have to discuss to-day—the question we are called upon to determine, and in my opinion it is impossible to dispute it, is the competency of women once in every three or four years to vote by ballot at the election of a Member to serve in this House. Women have by the Common Law a local vote, and of late years we have given them the municipal and the school board franchise. It has been said that we gave them the municipal franchise by surprise; but no proposal to withdraw that franchise from them has been brought forward, and I challenge any hon. Member who holds the view that they ought not to possess it, to propose a repeal of the law in that respect. If that law is not to be repealed, then I say that the distinction you endeavour to draw between the exercise of the local and Imperial franchises is not founded either in reason or in fact. I hear such expressions as these used—that it is not the function of woman, and she is not trained or educated to rule great Empires? But is the bulk of the male population trained and educated to rule great Empires? Can we not draw a distinction between the function of voting for a Representative and the function of representing those who vote. I would further ask hon. Members to bear in mind the fact that women are gradually accustoming themselves to the exercise of the privilege of voting in consequence of their possessing the local franchise, and that their thus having a share in local government tends to enlarge and elevate their character, and that any distinction you may choose to draw between the exercise of the local and Imperial franchise is one that is destined to diminish and to disappear. So much for the objections that have been raised against the Bill; and I think that I have shown that I am justified in saying that the hon. and learned Gentleman is entitled to ask the House to come to the consideration of this measure upon its merits, without being too much alarmed at the bugbears and the ulterior results to which this proposed legislation may be supposed by some as likely to conduce. As I understand the arguments of those who oppose the measure they come to this: that on the one hand the Bill is not a genuine practical measure of reform, because it would only enfranchise a small proportion of women, and not those who, if women were enfranchised, ought to be placed on the register. The second objection is that this measure, having no sufficient practical justification in itself, ought to be regarded simply as a stepping-stone to something further intended to be accomplished by the hon. Member at some future day, but when it is impossible to say. I take issue upon these objections. As to the first objection, it is perfectly true that the franchise would be conferred by this Bill only upon widows and unmarried women, and not upon married women who are not widows; but it does not, therefore, follow that the views of women would not be fairly represented upon every question affecting their interests. What is our experience upon this point? There is a remarkable logic in the course of political events connected with the franchise. As soon as you remove the political disabilities of a certain class, it is not necessary that that class should be represented in proportion to its numbers, or even so as to alter practically the composition of this House. The mere fact that the disabilities of a class have been removed alters its condition, and raises its status in the public and in the legislative mind, and brings those questions in which it is interested to the front with a fair chance of their competing with others for precedence, and in these days the chief question is one of competing for precedence in legislation. Take for instance the case of the admission of the working classes to the franchise in 1867. The great blot upon the escutcheon of the middle classes of the Parliament of 1832 was that they failed in their legislation to provide for the education of the working classes; but the moment you introduced household suffrage, although it applied only to the towns and not to the counties, a complete change came "o'er the spirit of our dream," with reference to the question of education, and we made an enormous stride in that direction. We were told that we must educate our future masters—that we must educate those whom we enfranchised. The same thing will follow if women are enfranchised by virtue of those among them who are placed upon the register, and whether the widows and unmarried women care much or little for the education of female children, I firmly believe that the logical and practical and proximate consequence of passing this measure would be that we should be compelled to do an act of large justice to women with regard to their education, and that they would be able to make a demand upon the Imperial and local funds and endowments of the country such as would, if acceded to, bring about something approaching justice and equality in their educational treatment as compared with that of boys. As to the second objection, that this measure is not a resting-place—that it is a mere stepping-stone to further legislation—I distinctly deny and disbelieve that proposition, and I will state to the House my reasons for doing so. One reason is that which I have already endeavoured to place before the House—namely, that this Bill will give to women a bond fide representation, although only a portion of the sex would be enfranchised by it, and would affect sensibly the order and precedence in which we should approach questions in which they are interested. But beyond that I believe that this measure, if carried, would positively conduce to finality and permanence in our Representative institutions, which the House and the public accepted and adopted in the Reform Act of 1867. The hon. Member for Huddersfield has said that it is not the possession of property, nor even the occupation of property, that ought to confer a right to the franchise, and that the base and principle of the measure of 1867 was the representation of the household. I ask you to go a step further, and to say that the household should be represented through its chief and head, whether male or female. You will then be on the lines of your own legislation; you will be adopting, not a Radical and revolutionary, but a Conservative view of the subject, and you will have a chance of obtaining something like a firm and stable basis for your future representation. There are other objections which have been raised by those who oppose this Bill which are quite as fundamental as those to which I have already referred. The hon. Member for Huddersfield calls us theorists. That charge I retort. I say that those who oppose this practical and moderate measure are the theorists, because, after all, when we probe them to the very bottom of their thoughts, upon what grounds is it that they oppose this proposal? It is because they entertain certain a priori notions as to the place and functions of women in the world. The views of hon. Members who repudiate this proposal are based upon an a priori and upon consequences supposed to flow from it that are entirely inconsistent with modern facts. They would be consistent only with a condition of society which should combine the primitive relations of pastoral life with all that is most elevating and progressive in modern civilization. They deal with the question as though every woman in society in this country had a husband, a father, or a brother to protect her, and as though her functions were exclusively confined to the home. I say that that is not a practical view based upon the facts of the world in which we live. The hon. and learned Member in bringing this Bill before the House referred to certain statistics to which I propose to add a few figures. It may be well that I should remind the House of the large surplus population of women as compared with men, many of whom have no choice but to remain unmarried, and are forced to maintain themselves by their own exertions. I find the figures on the point are these. The surplus number of women in the United Kingdom is 925,764; against whom ought to be set 200,000 soldiers and sailors who are absent from the country, leaving a preponderance of more than 700,000 women over men. I know how that fact may be used against this measure. It may be said that women form the majority in this country, and now you are about to hand over the representation of the country to them; but I deny the truth of that proposition, because all that you will do by this Bill is to complete your household suffrage system. I find that of the total female population about 487,000 are widows, who having no man upon whom they can depend for assistance and protection have to earn their own livelihood, and have to rough it in the world and to maintain families left to them by their husbands who are dead. Going through the list of trades in which women are engaged, I find that the number of women so employed is about 2,500,000, not existing under the ideal conditions of which we have heard, but having to maintain their own in their unequal struggle, sometimes the cruelly unequal struggle for bread for themselves and their children, against the stronger sex. I find such figures as these—women who maintain themselves by working in the various textile manufactures, 517,000; school teachers, 94,000; shopkeepers, 18,000; and farmers and graziers, 24,338. I wish to ask the House how, having already household suffrage in the boroughs, and it looming in the not very distant future for the counties, we can admit every labourer in the country to the franchise, and yet shut out from it these 24,338 women farmers and graziers? Of about 6,000,000 of women some 3,000,000 are supposed to remain at home as daughters and wives, 1,000,000 partly support themselves, and 2,000,000 are engaged independently in supporting themselves. These are facts which to my mind are entirely inconsistent with the theories and the a prioris on which hon. Members oppose fundamentally any proposal of this kind. But we have been asked, and it is a fair question—"What will this measure lead to?" Well, I do not pretend to be philosopher enough to tell you. But I will put another question, instead of answering that—"Can you tell me what will your persistent resistance to this measure lead to if you succeed?" To me it appears that the future place of women in political and social life is not the question we have to determine to-day, and that whatever conclusion we may arrive at will not exercise much influence upon the ultimate solution of this question. By opposing a moderate measure of this kind hon. Members may precipitate the results they apprehend; they will not prevent them if they are coming in the great order of events, but in any case I have no fear but that Nature's laws will assert themselves however Parliament may legislate, and that the great distinction between the sexes will be on the whole preserved and maintained. We are told that the lodger franchise presents a difficulty, but the lodger franchise is but an insignificant part of this question. In the cities and boroughs of England and Wales the number of persons who vote as occupiers of houses is 1,280,000, while the number of lodgers voting is only 5,257. The number of female lodgers would be still more insignificant. The number of male persons voting in Ireland as occupiers is 43,000, and of lodgers only 774, who principally reside in Dublin. In Scotland the number voting as occupiers is 161,750, and of lodgers only 76. Under these circumstances the lodger franchise for women is utterly insignificant, and I am perfectly willing to abandon it to the tender mercies of the hon. Members who oppose the Bill. Then as regards the other point as to the Proviso which was in the other Bill excluding married women from the franchise, I am at least bound to say that the hon. and learned Member has been well advised in omitting that Proviso from the present Bill, for in doing so he acted to some extent on my advice. Should, however, any reasonable doubt be entertained as to the possible effect of the measure with respect to married women when the Bill gets into Committee, I shall have no objection to words being inserted which shall remove all doubt, and shall exclude married women from the franchise. In conclusion, I say that the object of the Bill and of its promoters is definite and clear. They do not introduce a measure which is to be a stepping-stone to anything else, but they seek to confer the franchise upon a portion of a sex which they believe would be virtually and effectually represented under this Bill. I believe it to be untrue that it will be no satisfaction to the claims which women make, because its practical result will be to lead the Legislature to the study of the subjects that interest women especially; and lastly, I submit the Bill to the House on the ground that it is a corollary of the principle and object of the legislation of 1867, and that it will make household suffrage a fact as well as a name. It will confer the franchise on the head of the household, upon the bread-winner, whether a man or a woman; and if the House passes this Bill there will be a prospect for the first time of getting upon that firm and stable ground and basis which the House sought to arrive at in the legislation of 1867.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE: The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Stansfeld) who has just spoken with an ability and fairness for which I compliment him, has asked a question, and I will give him an answer. Hitherto, England has followed, like other civilized countries, the law of Nature, the rule of Providence and the order of the human race, created as it is, male and female. Following that order we have advanced in civilization, in liberty, in education, and in power, with a persistence that will keep us in our place among the other nations. If we give up that which makes this persistence possible we shall drift into an unknown future of mere theoretical philosophy, and all our old advantages, all the great treasures of political and social wisdom which we have garnered up will be staked on the hazard of a crude experiment. That is my answer to the question of the right hon. Gentleman. I was interested in the only two speeches as yet made for the Bill—those of my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Marylebone (Mr. Forsyth) and of the right hon. Gentleman, for I was struck by the very different ways in which they tried to grapple with the same bewildering fact—that the Bill before the House was, in reality, a proposal just not to do what sweet, though resonant, voices out-of-doors have called on us to carry out. Cloak as you may, phrase it as you please—"look on it with ridicule" was, I think, what my hon. and learned Friend had to say of the idea of women sitting here—clothe it if you like in philosophical generalizations, as the right hon. Gentleman opposite did, the fact remains that the outside cry is for the enfranchisement of women as women. The nostrum which we are here told to swallow is the enfranchisement of the householder, if that householder should happen to be a "miss" or a "widow;" and the disfranchisement of the householder who has the good fortune to be a wedded wife. Those two proposals are diametrically and irreconcilably opposite, and how do the two hon. Gentlemen and their speeches respectively deal with the difference? I must give the palm of courage to my hon. and learned Friend on my left (Mr. Forstyth); for when he had to face it he simply took a flying leap over it. Every word he said appealed to us to accept a bold and consistent proposal, and having thus argued, he called upon us to support the narrow and inconsistent makeshift. He rode off upon "the interests of women, which have been for centuries neglected," "the domination of the strong over the weak," "women's sphere according to political arithmetic;" then he spoke of "women farmers;" he next went to "Bridgwater;" then he came to the "Hard battle of life," and the "Ballot Act," and at last he reached "vaccination," and the transmigration of men into cows. Here I must stop for this cow of my hon. Friend jumped over rather too high a moon for me to follow. All this was a very grand prelude to what from his own arguments approved itself to be a very small measure. The right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Stansfeld), however, perceived the logical difficulty in which the hon. and learned Member for Marylebone had involved himself and he constructed an argument which, as a specimen of ingenuous and fantastical Conservatism, I think is one of the ablest I ever heard. When we passed the Reform Bill a few years ago, we accepted household suffrage as a sort of rough-and-ready way of reaching a sufficient constituency and yet one that should not be too large. We had an unlimited household franchise in boroughs and what was a practically limited household franchise in the counties, and we had a certain number of lodgers thrown in, I suppose by way of ballast. Upon this the right hon. Gentleman has constructed his theory. He implied that our idea of things as they are was too ideal and too pastoral. I really must appeal to him to say whether there could conceivably be anything more ideal, or more beautifully pastoral, than his own theory of a constituency as composed of a number of houses, each constituting a household, the head of which was to have a vote, while the residue of these households, and all the unhappy waifs and strays of humanity, who have no hearth which would give them the right to speak of their own households, are to accept this revival of the old patriarchal ideal in the shape of a country governed by a constituency of householders. All I shall say of his theory is, that I would we were in the primitive and innocent condition in which such a system would give contentment. But how does he apply this directly to the present case? He says that virtually you enfranchise all womankind, because you enfranchise the woman householder. How does he arrive at this point, that the women you enfranchise are the women householders? He says you enfranchise the single women and widows; but he then sees the weakness of his case, inasmuch as the single women you would enfranchise would more likely be lodgers than householders, and he produces figures to show that the lodger voters in this country are so small a number that they might be struck out of the equation, and need not give us any further trouble. The right hon. Gentleman offers this statement as a reason why we should admit to this lodger franchise a class of persons who, on the other hand, are represented as being an enormous infusion of additional political power. He tells us that the men lodgers at the present moment are so few that we need not be afraid to let in the many women who would get votes under a women-lodger franchise. But how are these women lodgers to be brought into the general argument? How do you range them as in any way possessing a good household character? You can only create such a character or condition by letting in the widows. I grant that there the argument of the right hon. Gentleman may have something in it; but what does it lead to. Why, that a woman, when she enters into a contract of marriage, is to lose her political status, and that that political status is only to revive on the condition of her having suffered the greatest of all domestic and social calamities. What, I ask, can be so ridiculous as this? A woman, so long as she is a spinster, is to have the franchise. She performs the greatest and the highest duty a woman can undertake, and the fulfilment of that greatest and highest duty is to deprive her of her political privilege; but this political privilege is to be revived if the performance of her highest duty is cut short by the visitation of Providence—by the loss of the bread-winner—by her being reduced to that condition of comparative helplessness which the widow must inevitably fill as compared with the married woman. But here I must ask, how long will this ideal householder condition last? How long will the married estate in all its aspects—not merely religious or social, but also political and legal—continue as it is now, under such a distortion of logical considerations. At present the husband is the master of the house; he manages the household; his is the strong arm, and therefore his is the guiding hand. If you once make the condition of marriage to the woman a political stigma and the loss of her antecedent citizenship, how long do you believe that condition can be maintained, supposing that women's enfranchisement is valuable, as we are told that it is? Assuming that cry for this enfranchisement of which we have heard, but which I do not believe, and in proof of which no facts have yet been produced, how long do you suppose, if women have to choose between coverture and the franchise, that they will allow the present relations of husband and wife in the common interest of their family to exist when the price that is paid for it is, as the right hon. Gentleman would lead us to suppose, that of political degradation? There are many more things that will be thrown into confusion by this Bill, should it pass into law, than the mere relations of Parliament and the constituencies. There is much more in this matter than the mere question of whom we shall have sitting on this bench and who shall sit upon that. These are mere trifles compared with the complete revolution which the measure, if successful, must import into all the social relations of life. Then, again, look at the theory of the right hon. Gentleman, that the whole of the rest of womankind of this country would consent to be represented merely by the spinsters and the widows. The spinsters and the widows no doubt are as well informed and as fit to vote or to sit in this House, or to take the chair at public meetings as the married women of the country; but they would be a fantastical—they would be an accidental representation of their sex. And what is it that has been at the bottom of all right reform and of all wrong reform, of all the claims for redress that have had something in them, and of all those claims for redress that have had nothing in them at all, but this one cry of "inequality"—this one plea—that the enfranchisement of this class, the privilege of that class, the disqualification of the other class has been the result of accident and not of reason? If anything could be a disqualification of accident and not of reason in the case of women, it would be the disqualification of having succeeded in getting married, and if anything could be a qualification of accident it would be that, when they had succeeded in getting married, the heavy blow of Providence has deprived them of their protectors. That loss they would be comforted for by getting a vote—a ballot paper for a husband! Such are the doors which, by this Bill, are to open and to close to womankind their political privileges. The whole thing is so utterly fantastical and unreal that I am very much surprised to find persons endowed with the known intellect and ability of the right hon. Gentleman attempting to found any argument upon it. My hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Forsyth) did not attempt to face the question. He simply slurred it, and was wise. As far the idea of ladies not wanting seats in Parliament is concerned, how will the right hon. Gentleman meet facts? A number of ladies held, on one occasion, a counter debate to ours when a similar measure was before the House two years ago, at which speeches were made, which were more or less effective against the Bill, a distinguished female orator being set up to answer each particular speaker, and I have a ticket for that meeting in my hand. It is headed "Women's Suffrage," and says—

"A public meeting will be held in Hanover Square Rooms on Friday, May 10th, which will be addressed by ladies, in reply to the speeches delivered in the House of Commons against the second reading of the Women's Disabilities Bill."

Then follow the names of the ladies; but I will not read them to the House.

"The chair to be taken at 8 o'clock by Dr. Lyon Playfair, M.P.;" I merely say that if this took place only two years ago, not many yards out of the borough of which my hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Forsyth) is now the distinguished Representative, he need not be so sceptical or contemptuous of what may happen in the not very distant future should this measure be allowed to pass. The fact is, that this question of women's suffrage has, in the eyes of some advanced Reformers, taken a somewhat ugly prominence of late. Let the franchise be enlarged or let it be kept where it is—let it be enlarged on the principle of a wide but still a limited franchise in the counties, or let it go on to universal suffrage—whatever shape it may take the woman's question has got in, has intruded itself, and has taken possession of the field. If you vote for this Bill in any shape you make it impossible that in any future extension of the franchise, the women and the men should not march pari passu. I hold in my hand a report of a meeting which was held on the 15th of last month. It says—

"Yesterday a meeting of the Committee of the National Society for Women's Suffrage was held for the purpose of receiving a deputation from the Adult Suffrage League, the object of which was to acquaint the first-mentioned society with the difficulty, unpopularity, and prejudice which arose when working men, agitating for an extension of the suffrage, attempted to introduce and sustain the claim of women."

It was, in fact, an appeal from the men's men to the women's men to be a little more manly in support of their principles, and to balance the difficulty they were creating by affording some direct help to universal suffrage. Accordingly, certain eminent members of the Universal Suffrage Society appeared to meet several distinguished advocates of women's suffrage. The chief spokesman of the women's party was a gentleman who is well known as the most eminent living philosopher who has attempted to grapple with the subject of the franchise, and I am sure when I mention Mr. Hare the House will appreciate the weight and authority attaching to anything he says on the question, whether we may happen to agree with him or not. Mr. Hare, who, as I have said, was their spokesman, speaking on behalf of the Women's Suffrage Society, said that—

"It had recognized with the utmost satisfaction the higher principles which had been adopted by the Adult Suffrage League, in submitting the claim for a franchise unrestricted by sex, in place of the comparatively poor and selfish, and, he hoped he might say, worn-out cry for 'manhood suffrage.'"

I hope my hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Forsyth) will see what very strong supporters he has a little in advance of the movement in which he is engaged. I will not trouble the House with the whole of Mr. Hare's speech, but according to the report I have here of what took place, he was converted to universal or manhood suffrage plus women's suffrage, and he says—"Will there be an educational test? If a sufficient test of that of that nature were adopted he should personally be ready to join the League." Mr. Hare's speech seem to have given very general satisfaction. Two gentlemen who represented the Adult Suffrage League—Mr. Smith and Mr. Ship-ton—

"Expressed a doubt whether if the more popular demands of manhood suffrage were adopted, they would not obtain more present support, but acquiesced in the view that the true policy was always to insist on the principle which was abstractedly the most just and right."

Those two gentlemen, whose names I never heard before, and Mr. Hare, whose name must be familiar to every student of political science, shook hands together over the real universal suffrage of every man and every woman, and this took place only about three weeks ago. I have just read these extracts to the House, in order that the House may appreciate for itself what it is to which we are tending. It may be right, as the right hon. Gentleman opposite thinks, to enfranchise women; but if they are to be enfranchised, the narrow, fantastical limitations of this Bill are mere rubbish. "The voice may be the voice of Jacob; but the hands are the hands of Esau." The rough demand for manhood suffrage and for an equally general women's suffrage will soon follow, and when that has been attained, the happier, better, and more beautiful half of human nature will not long be satisfied with meeting in Hanover Square Rooms and answering our speeches from the outside of this House. It is upon these grounds, Sir, that I shall certainly give my support to the Amendment.

MR. O'SULLIVAN said, he had listened with particular attention to the debate on the question before the House. As it was a matter on which he had not had his mind fully made up, he was not pledged to the promoters of the Bill; neither was he promised to the opponents of the Bill—therefore any remarks made by him on the question were quite free from bias or prejudice of any kind. He had heard a good deal in favour of the Bill; and, on the other hand, he confessed he had not heard a single argument against it which should warrant him in opposing its further progress. He should say he considered the arguments brought forward against the Bill weak and impotent. One hon. Member had told the House that women were not fit to be Members of Parliament, and should not be allowed on any terms to enter that House. Well, that argument he would call a mere ninepin, which was put up simply for the purpose of knocking it down again, as the promoters of this Bill did not even ask for such a measure. If they did make such a demand, they would find an opponent in him, as well as in the hon. Member who opposed the Bill on those imaginary grounds. Another hon. Member had opposed the Bill, on the ground that it would take up the time of women, and distract their attention from their household work. Well, all he need say in reply to that argument was that, under the Ballot Bill, polling-places were now brought to the doors of electors, or, at furthest, within an hour's drive of every elector; and when they recollected that electors were not called on, on an average, more than once in seven years to make use of their privilege as electors, then, all he would say was, that if a woman made good use of her time during the remainder of the period, her household could well afford to spare her one hour in the seven years to devote to the interests of her country. He merely illustrated those things to show the absurdity of this part of the opposition given to the Bill. He would now deal with what seemed to be the real and substantial opposition to the Bill—that is, that being women they should not possess votes—that they belong to man.

He could well understand this argument, if they enjoyed the same electoral law as was enjoyed by the subjects of either France or America, for in those countries it was man and not property that was represented. But what was the state of things in this country to enable any hon. Member to make use of such an argument? Was it not a well-known fact that if the greatest statesman that ever lived, the bravest general that ever led an army to victory, or the most brilliant orator that ever adorned the pages of history were to live in this country, or if the three were rolled into one, he could not vote for a Member of this House unless he occupied a certain amount of property in houses or land? Therefore it was property that voted in this country, and not man. They honoured property far beyond man. If John Brown lived in this townland, or that street, and occupied houses or land value for a certain amount he voted for a Member of Parliament, not because he was John Brown, but because he represented so much property. Then, for the life of him, he (Mr. O'Sullivan) could not see why it was if Mary Smith held land or houses in the same street or townland, and had no husband, father, or brother to represent her, she should not be allowed to vote out of her property as well as her neighbour. Then, again, in this respect their laws seemed completely out of joint. They allowed women to vote for Poor Law guardians; they allowed them to vote for municipal councillors, and they allowed them to vote for members of school boards; yet they refused to allow them to vote for the men who taxed their property as well as the property of men, and who made laws to which women should be subject, though she had no voice in the making of those laws. Then, again, their laws were quite inconsistent in this respect. That property had many rights in this country was admitted, and among those rights was the right which it gave to the party holding it to vote at elections. Then, if they continued this bar against their voting out of the property they held, to make their laws consistent they should pass a law to debar women from holding property at all. It was clear they should pass such a law if they continued the present state of things. Before he concluded he would appeal to them, as a body of honourable men who represented the feelings of the people of every class and creed, not to be so narrow-minded or jealous as to oppose this measure of justice. It was simply the weak appealing to the strong to grant them a small boon, to which they were justly entitled. Would the strong refuse that right to the weak, and have themselves branded as unjust, unfair, and unmanly? He asked them for the credit of that great Assembly, and for the credit of the position they occupied, to pass the second reading of the Bill.

MR. NEWDEGATE: Nothing, Sir, is more remarkable in the advocacy of this Bill than the anxiety displayed by the hon. and learned Gentleman the Mover and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Halifax to avoid any discussion of the issue this measure really raises. The terms of the Bill are clear enough. The House is asked to sweep away the limitation of the franchise as between the sexes, which not only the laws of this country, but the laws of the whole civilized world preserve. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Halifax was shocked at the audacity of those who ventured to discuss the Bill as it had been printed and placed in their hands. The hon. and learned Mover of the Bill declared that it did not contain a Proviso against the enfranchisement of married women, which ought to have been inserted, while the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Halifax explained that this Proviso had been omitted at his instance, and that he repented the omission. The right hon. Gentleman is known to have taken a great interest in the affairs of Italy, and to glory in the enfranchisement of the Italian people; but, in Italy, although women are permitted to take part in matters of Parliamentary Elections, there is a positive limitation to their action — they are compelled to vote through the intervention of male delegates. In this limitation, there is a recognition of the law of Nature, that man shall go forth to warfare and to labour, supported by, but for the sustenance of woman. The right hon. Gentleman admired that arrangement for Italy, but proposed nothing of the kind for his own country. And then, forsooth, the right hon. Gentleman is shocked because other hon. Members in the debate urged that the tendency of this Bill was towards the universal and direct enfranchisement of women. You must not, exclaimed the right hon. Gentleman, speculate upon the future consequences of the passing of the Bill; it is a small measure, and will not confer the franchise upon many women; and yet he has argued the production of this very Bill is the legitimate consequence of the passing of the Election Act of 1867. He describes this Bill as the complement to the Bill of 1867, and yet seems outraged, when others calculate the inevitable consequence of the admission of the principle which pervades this Bill and tends to universal suffrage, not among men only but among women. The hon. Gentleman sought to perform the part of a very Nahash by the House. But the truth is, that the advocates of this Bill have been labouring assiduously, by the suggestion of fictitious limitations, to be hereafter, as they say, introduced into the Bill, to grind the edge of this wedge as thin as possible, that they might have a better chance of introducing it for the severance of the institutions of this country. As often happens on Wednesdays in this House, numbers of hon. Members, who have been employed or amused elsewhere, during the previous hours, are now entering the House, in total ignorance of what has passed here. They have not heard the able and exhaustive speeches of the hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire (Mr. Chaplin) and the hon. Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Leatham), which ranged over the whole question. They arrive here, full, perhaps, of preconceived notions, for the mere lees of the debate. There is a natural and almost honourable repugnance to refuse anything any section of our fellow-countrymen, however misguided we may think them, may ask of us. The hon. and learned Member for Marylebone, however, in moving the second reading of this Bill, commented upon my opinion that this is a revolutionary measure. I consider this Bill revolutionary, nay, Socialistic in its tendency; and when I assert that, I do not rest my assertion merely upon my own authority. I have the authority of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone), who is not considered a timid legislator, for this opinion. What said that right hon. Gentleman, after this Bill had been introduced in 1870 by Mr. Jacob Bright, and the Bill then contained the Proviso, which is now omitted? The right hon. Gentleman then declared—

"I must say I cannot recognize a necessity or a desire for this measure, which would justify such an unsettling, not to say uprooting, of the old landmarks of society."—[3 Hansard, cci. 620.]

I am not, therefore, isolated in the opinion that this is a revolutionary measure. But we have now another authority. Mr. Goldwin Smith, in the able pamphlet he has recently published, declares a similar opinion. Mr. Goldwin Smith is a convert. He tells that before he went to the United States, he signed a Petition in favour of the Bill; but what he saw of the public conduct of the women in the United States, who desired to possess the franchise, and had not spared to attack the inviolability of marriage, had induced him to send us a warning from the United States; he tells that the power of divorce is so wide in several of the States as almost to have dissolved the most sacred of human institutions. Am I not, then, justified in suspecting a measure as Socialistic, which in the United States is the favourite project of a Socialistic school? The hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Marylebone says that the scheme for the political enfranchisement of women is making progress in the United States. I do not believe that to be the case. I believe that the manly intellect of the American Republicans will, for the sake of their institutions, preserve the limit which confines the political franchise to men. Mr. Goldwin Smith has sent us this warning, and yet the hon. and learned Gentleman styles himself a Conservative, and would have us accept this measure as of a Conservative character. It seems to me that the hon. and learned Gentleman spoke lightly of the marriage laws, while he inveighed fiercely against the laws which regulate the property of women; he spoke of the laws of this country as harsh and unjust to women. Let me ask him whether this House and Parliament have not of late years given much attention to this subject, whether the law has not been amended in respect of the property of women? The hon. and learned Gentleman knows that Parliament has attended to this subject, and the laws regulating their property have been amended. Then may I not assert that this House needs not in this respect the enfranchisement of women, nor the introduction of female legislatresses into this House to teach us our duty towards their sisters? This Bill casts an unjust reflection upon the conduct and intentions of Parliament; but I will admit that this House and Parliament have, in some respects, been slow in providing legislative protection for women. The House has been dilatory in considering the laws, which in all other countries have been enacted for the regulation of Conventual Institutions and in the adoption of some analogous provisions. [Laughter.] Will the hon. Gentlemen who seem inclined to treat that circumstance with derision, deny that laws regulating Conventual Institutions exist in all or in almost every European State except the United Kingdom? There are, it is true, no such laws in the United States; and may not that account for the Socialistic disposition manifested by some of the American women?—the progress of which seems to commend itself to some of the advocates of this Bill. Is the House prepared to pave the way for the adoption of universal suffrage, and that peculiar kind of universal suffrage which would include women? And yet, to me, it seems that if the House is not prepared for such a consequence, it ought not to annul that limit of the franchise which, as yet, is of universal application among the civilized nations of the world; that limitation which is founded upon the distinction between the functions, the duties, the relations of the sexes, which has existed since the creation of man. It is because this Bill would invade that limitation thus founded that I denounce it as a revolutionary measure. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Halifax felt this, and was too candid not, in some degree, to admit the force of it. He repentantly promised to restore the Proviso excluding married women as already represented by their husbands. And he suggested another most anomalous limitation; he said that he would make these unmarried women or widows voters, but he would support a prohibition against their becoming candidates for seats in this House. Can any proposal be more anomalous? No; if we are to sweep away this natural limitation against women taking a direct part, politically, by voting at elections, the new limitations you may invent, or have invented, resting upon weaker foundations, will all be swept away. It had been argued that, women having been admitted to the exercise of the municipal franchise, therefore they ought to be admitted to the franchise for electing Members of this House. Is there no distinction then, between the functions of a municipality and the functions of an Imperial Legislature? The fact is well known that women had been admitted to the possession of the municipal franchise through an accident, and not by the deliberate intention of Parliament. I admit that women have long exercised the franchise in parochial matters, and that it has a sanction which I would on no account ignore; parochial matters, however, are matters, so to speak, of family economy, different from the subjects which most occupy the attention of an Imperial Legislature; they relate to the care of the poor, the care of the sick, the care of the roadways to our homes; matters which belong to women as well as men; and this has been recognized ever since the time of Queen Elizabeth, who, if ever woman could, might be trusted to understand the capacity of her own sex. The House must beware of these proposals, then; for they emanate from a school which defies the principles of equality. The measure may commend itself to the approval of those who will be satisfied with nothing less than a dead level of democratic equality, and to those who prefer the equality of subjection to a despotism. For my own part, I believe that the misguided ladies who are so urgent in demanding this Bill, are prompted by those, who entertain ulterior views and objects, and that the great mass of my countrywomen carefully abstain from lending their sanction or voices to this cause. I trust, that the House will not shut its eyes to the vast consequences that are to be apprehended from the passing of such a measure. The House is told that it is a proposal to enfranchise 300,000 women; and is it for the sake of enfranchising 300,000 women that we are called upon to break down the limitation of the franchise which rests upon the great natural distinction existing between the functions and relations of the sexes, upon which alone we can hope the limitation will rest surely, as it had rested safely for centuries, corresponding as it does with the limit which divided the duties of men and women? I will not further detain the House, though I might quote evidence from the speeches of Mr. Bouverie, who showed, step by step, that this movement had its origin and growth from the disciples of Mr. Robert Owen, the well-known Socialist of the earlier part of the century. I might show the connection of this movement with other Socialistic movements that have of late years taken place until it has assumed the form in which it is now presented to the House; in the shape in which it comes before the House, this proposal casts an unworthy and unjust reflection upon the conduct of the House and of its Members—upon our feelings as men and as Gentlemen, this Bill ought to be rejected as embodying a most unworthy reflection upon the views and intentions of Parliament.

MR. JACKSON said, that after carefully reading the Bill, he had come to the conclusion that it would, in certain cases, confer votes upon married women. Therefore, if it should pass its present stage, he would feel it to be his duty to propose the insertion of words in Committee which would place the intention of the House to restrict the franchise to qualified unmarried women beyond question. The question, he could not but think, had been debated in too high a key. The point they had to decide was, whether those women who satisfied the definition of a qualified voter with regard to men had made out a case to be admitted to the franchise, notwithstanding that they were women. With the exception of the hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire (Mr. Chaplin), in his splendid speech, every hon. Member who had spoken against the Bill had avoided that question. In language more or less eloquent or fanciful, they had dealt with a different state of things. In spite of the disclaimer of the hon. and learned Member for Marylebone (Mr. Forsyth), and his right hon. Friend the Member for Halifax (Mr. Stansfeld), hon. Members had persisted in seeing nothing in the Bill but a first step to the conferring of the franchise upon all women, co-extensive with the granting of manhood suffrage. But there was no such proposal before the House. Such a dream might be entertained by certain political philosophers; but it had never been clothed in the language, or assumed the form of a practical political question. If it ever did, the House would know how to deal with it. The whole argument against the Bill amounted to this—that the Bill meant something different from what it said. In point of fact, the Bill was meant to confer upon certain persons who happened to be females, the right which they would have but for their sex; and the only answer that could be given to that claim was that which had been candidly offered by the hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire—that there was in women, either by Divine ordinance or from the habits of mankind, some personal disability unfitting them for the exercise of the franchise. But was that true? Experience answered in the negative, because women now exercised an inferior franchise, and there was no inherent difference between the inferior and the superior. The hon. Member said that the experience of mankind, from the creation down to the year 1875, had been the other way; but, at the same time, he admitted that the experiment now asked for had never been tried. When, then, was the argument based on experience? Surely, the Bill was only one more step in the series of legislative measures which had characterized the political movements of the present generation. Parliament had first dealt with the claims of the middle classes, then of the working classes in towns, and was now considering the claims of another grade of the working classes. Why should they now refuse the full rights of citizenship to women who were qualified to exercise them within the limitations imposed by the Bill? To that question no satisfactory or conclusive answer had yet been given. On that ground, and because he adopted the view of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Halifax, that this concession would establish the principle of the finality of the household as the basis of the suffrage, and would thereby strengthen one of the standpoints for resisting the wave of democracy, that he thought the House would do wrong to read the Bill a second time. But they were asked—What was the object of the measure? They were told that Parliament was always ready to redress grievances, and to a great extent that was so: but he did not think that those who supported the Bill were called upon to show that any immediate or radical result would be the outcome of the Bill, if it were passed. It was enough to say, as he, for one, conscientiously believed, that the result of the contemplated addition to the voting power of the country would be almost entirely for good. If they compared the class of women who would be admitted to the franchise with the same class of men voters among the humbler classes, the comparison would be in favour of the former. So far from being a source of danger, the Bill offered a guarantee for safety; and, above all, it would afford a lever which would assist in obtaining for women that open career and means of obtaining their livelihood for which their dispositions and talents fitted them, and which he believed was the object most aimed at by those most intelligent women who mainly supported the agitation. They had seen how the cause of education had been advanced by women, and he believed that they would, in perhaps a small degree, but still appreciably, find the capacity of women for benefiting the State enlarged if they conferred upon them the privilege for which they now asked.

SIR HENRY JAMES: I should have preferred, for several reasons, to have taken no part in this debate; but my hon. and learned Friend who introduced the Bill referred to me so frequently and pointedly in the course of the speech in which he submitted the measure to the House, that I trust the House will allow me very briefly indeed to occupy their time, while I state the reasons for the opposition which I have hitherto given to this measure, and to vindicate the vote I am now about to record against it. Before discussing the effects of the Bill, it will be well for us really to know what are the provisions contained in it. There are in it some words, few in number, which have been clearly and distinctly printed in plain ink, which we can all read; but a great deal has been printed, too, in invisible type, which causes it to be necessary to hold the Bill up to the light, before those words can be clearly read. Even as the Bill stands, it is clear my hon. and learned Friend was the subject of a deception, when he yielded to the request made to him to remove the Proviso he inserted in the Bill last year, in order to carry his intention, not to give the franchise to married women, into effect. I fancy there was somebody who knew more about the effect of that removal than he did, for, if he will look at the Representation of the People Act, he will find that by the removal of that Proviso, every married woman having property to her separate use will be enabled under the Bill to exercise the county franchise. He will find that every married female lodger, whether separated from her husband by an express judicial decree or by agreement, so that her occupation as a lodger becomes a bond fide occupation, will be entitled to vote. My hon. and learned Friend admits that he had no such intention in removing the Proviso. How those ladies! who knew its effect must have laughed—

What the wily sex could do.”

It is not, however, evils like these which can be remedied in Committee that I stop to point out; it is the consequences of the Bill which I would ask the House to consider before they sanction it. We have heard to-day from my hon. and learned Friend and my right hon. Friend (Mr. Stansfeld) a doctrine which I would ask the House to weigh. We have been told that we are to look only to the immediate consequences, and not to the ultimate effects of the measure. What manner of statesmanship is that? It will be not only my protest, but the protest of every Member of this House, that we bear the responsibility of looking to the ultimate results of every measure that we pass. Is it to be said that the man who sets the stone rolling at the hill-top is not to look to its effects in the valley—that, because the stone has been moved, and met with nothing in its first motion, we are not to consider its ultimate destination? On the same principle, when the municipal franchise was granted in 1869, without consideration, without even the knowledge of nine-tenths of the Members of this House that it was being granted, we should have been told then, if the matter had been discussed, that we should look only to the immediate consequence, that it was only to confer the municipal and not the Parliamentary franchise; but how is it used against us now? This argument has been employed to-day, and it has made converts—that as you conferred the municipal franchise on women, can you deny them the Parliamentary? There is as great a distinction between the two as there is between married women and single. On what principle is it that you who have spoken of the weaker sex, have introduced a Bill to confer this right on single women, and refuse it to married women? Is it right and politic to tell a woman who desires to bear her part in political life, that if she marries she shall lose her right? Are you to give that right to a woman who has not the power of consulting with a husband, and refuse it to a woman who receives that counsel and experience? It stands now as a natural consequence of the Bill, and I have a right to argue upon its natural consequences, and to ask whether you mean to give full and equal electoral rights to all women? I do not know whether that is the intention of hon. Members who support the Bill—I know it is not the intention of my hon. and learned Friend, because he has said it is not; but the fact remains that, let this Bill once pass through his exertions, and his wishes then would have but little weight as to its ultimate effects with those who support him. Let me quote a greater authority even than my hon. and learned Friend. It is a letter written on the 4th April last year, shortly after the introduction of his Bill, signed by a lady bearing for many reasons an honoured name, “Ursula S. Bright,” and one who has a right to speak on this subject. She said—

“Some of us would be glad to know on what grounds Mr. Forsyth proposes to exclude those married women who have freehold property or other qualifications for exercising the right he wishes to confer on unmarried women in the same position. The various societies for women's suffrage are united for one object, which is to obtain for women the right to vote for Members of Parliament on the same conditions which entitle men to vote. Mr. Forsyth's Bill, therefore, does not meet their case, and unless suitable Amendments should be carried in Committee, the agitation will go on after the Bill is passed, without any more interruption than will be necessary to enable the societies to congratulate each other on their partial success.”

Now, that is a pretty fair declaration of war on the subject; and after reading that, and looking to the natural consequence of passing the Bill, need I trouble the House by answering the statements of my hon. Friends when they say—“Be blind as to the results; read its four corners only, and do not trouble?” Let me take the four corners as it stands, and what is the result? If you pass this Bill, when the time comes, which many hon. Members—especially on this side of the House—anticipate, when the property qualification necessary for exercising the franchise will be abolished, and when every citizen of the State will have a right to take part in electing those who govern, we must let women have an equal share with their husbands in the franchise, and give them the same full electoral rights, and under such circumstances those who support universal suffrage must either be prepared to postpone it indefinitely, or to admit women to that equal share. There are, as we are told, upwards of 900,000 more women than men in this country. It is not, probably, too much to say that 500,000 more women than men will be put upon the register, and under those circumstances how is this nation to be governed and to endeavour to hold its own among the nations of the world? As to the flimsy protection the property qualification would afford, there are many hon. Members on both sides of the House who are anxious to alter the law affecting the right of married women to hold property; and I will say, let that law be altered as you desire, and let married women have the same right to property as men, and they also will get the right of voting without one word being added to our Statute Book. Such being the effect of the measure, it is admitted to be a great and a radical change. I do not tarry here to talk of the “burden of proof.” That is a lawyer’s term, and is not worth consideration here; but if this alteration is to be effected, we ought to be quite certain that it will do good. I will refer shortly to the arguments mentioned this afternoon. The word “right” has been used more than once, and there have been allusions to the right of property and to the right of individuals. Can we seriously say for one moment that there is a right in property to be represented? We shall go back to the old saying used long ago, that it is the house which holds a man and not the man who holds the house that has the right to vote. If, then, you do not say property is to be represented, you come to the question whether a woman has an absolute right to claim the franchise. On what terms? She can claim to be a citizen only, if she is willing to bear the burdens as well as accept the advantages of the position. As was said in that most able speech of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Leatham)—delivered, I am sorry to say, when the House was not quite so full as it is now—when you are discussing the question of a woman who says—“Give me this, because I demand it as a right,” you must ask if she is content to be classed on an equality with men. What are the primary obligations of citizenship? Will women accept the first and very natural one of enrolling themselves in defence of their country? Are they willing to accept a conscription, if one should be enforced in case of the invasion of the State? Are they willing to assist in maintaining internal peace by acting as special constables? Are they willing to sit on the magisterial bench? Are they willing to accept the obligation of jurors? If they admit, on the one hand, their inability to bear these burdens while they say, on the other, “Give us equal rights and privileges,” surely their claim of right cannot be supported, and they must make it on other grounds. But, abandoning this claim of right, you say that it is well for the State that this should be. How is it to be supported? It is an exceptional question, and it must be supported by clear argument that the State would be benefited. I have heard to-day much that appears to me to be a concession—in, for instance, the admission of women’s inferiority for a political career. It is only carrying out that which has been said, strongly enough, by my right hon. Friend, as to the view of Nature. It is only carrying out the mere corollary of physical weakness under which for some purpose Nature has assigned that women should suffer. I know that in the work of Mr. Mill there is an argument addressed very much to the point that there ought not to be a weaker sex. That question, however, I must decline to enter into. It is, in fact, too late to argue whether there ought to be a weaker sex or not, and therefore hon. Members must excuse me if I do not engage in that contest. They must argue, not with me, but with Nature; and, as Mr. Squeers says, “you will find Nature a very awkward customer to deal with.” If there is this physical weakness—and I presume it is admitted—it cannot be an accident, or the result of training or education. It is a weakness found in the human kind as well as in every other form of animal life, a weakness that causes us to spare the hind in the forest and the hen in the covert—it is given to women with an object and for a purpose; it is given to them in order that they may adapt themselves to a different description of life from that of men. As has been expressed by one who read human nature, and wrote of it perhaps better than any Englishman who ever existed, where he makes Katharine, at the conclusion of a struggle in which she endeavoured to take the position of man, acknowledge the errors of her ways—

“Why are our bodies soft, and weak, and smooth,
Unapt to toil and trouble in the world;
But that our soft conditions and our hearts
Should well agree with our external parts?”

We need not, however, discuss this consideration further. My right hon. Friend with strange frankness, has said—“I admit women are weaker than men for the purposes of a political career:” it is a political career we are discussing at this moment. If they are not fitted to sit in this House—if, as it is admitted by my right hon. Friend, they are not fitted to take their fair part in the burdens of political life, how do you establish that they are competent to give a vote in the return of Members of Parliament? What is this career of politics composed of? What is that we have to deal with here in the course of our political career? We ask for the practical experience of men. We listen with attention to men in particular professions when they speak on special questions. We ask for men in the Army and Navy to guide us in matters military and naval; we ask for commercial men and lawyers to assist us in other directions; and from every one of such pursuits women are practically shut out, and, to a certain extent, ever must be shut out. When you speak of the unfitness of women for political life it is not because their minds are somewhat different, it is because their habits and instincts prevent them from acting in those particular occupations which alone can give political knowledge. The effect of the Bill, if passed, will be to drive women to consider subjects connected, I will not say with sentiment, but at all events not always with the good government of the people. Were female franchise introduced into France, what would be the question affecting the elections in every department of that country? The question would be whether there should be war with Italy to restore the temporal power of the Pope. As to what would be the question in this country, we need not speculate. We have had practical proof of that. Of all questions more immediately affecting the law, we hear little of women's influence or interest. If the hon. Member for the Border Burghs (Mr. Trevelyan) were to hold a meeting on the county franchise, or the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Dixon) were to have one on the 25th clause of the Education Act, they would find but few women to attend them. But we find that the effect of women only hovering on the very threshold of political life has been that that has occurred now which would not have occurred a few years ago. We find this class of political women willing to lead these “simple maidens in their flower,” who we have been told, “are worth a hundred coats of arms,” and to go and hear from gentlemen the details of the Contagious Diseases Acts. We learn from their Petitions and their statements that they “thoroughly understand the subject,” and know the effect it has alike on the physical and moral health of the community. That is one of the effects of the entrance of women on political life. The question is, whether you would wish to see it extended; and, if so, to what extent, for to what it might lead us no one can tell. The hon. and learned Member (Mr. Forsyth) does not attempt to do so; but he does tell us that it will remedy injustice, and will cause justice now, for the first time, to be afforded to women. What charge is it that the hon. and learned Member brings against us? What is the injustice of which he speaks? Has the hon. and learned Member done his part, if he has not brought forward proof of the injustice these injured women have endured? What proof has he that other hon. Members are not equally inclined to remove their grievances if they only knew them? It is odd enough for him to say that this House is so unjust that women cannot obtain fair legislation for themselves, and at the same time to tell us that, so confident is he in the justice of his case, that he is certain he will carry it by a large majority. If this House is so just as to pass this Bill, it might be relied on to be equally so to remedy these grievances. May I venture now to say one word in regard to a personal matter, and I beg to apologize to the House for referring to it? My hon. and learned Friend has claimed from me the performance of a promise it is alleged I made some time ago. He claims my vote. I reject his claim: I shall not vote for the Bill; I shall cheerfully give my vote against it. In claiming my vote for the measure, he says that, in the heat of an election contest, I stated that if half the women in my constituency asked me to vote for it, I would do so. The recollection I have of the words I used—though I do not care to raise any question as to what these were precisely—is that I said that if I thought half of the women in the borough—who, I supposed, would be fairly representative of the women of the country—showed themselves in favour of the Bill, I would reconsider my very definite opinion. Now, however, my hon. and learned Friend tells us, that because in a town where there are 8,000 or 9,000 females—the proportion of adults I do not know—a Petition was signed by under 300, I am to vote for the Bill. That, surely, is not the half of the women of my constituency; and I do not recognize that it is a Petition of even 300 women. We have heard a good deal lately about the way Petitions are got up; and when you pay so much for signature, it is an easy matter to get Petitions up upon any subject. My hon. and learned Friend also suggests that I ought not to have referred to the female supporters of the Bill as women who endeavoured to become political successes, because they had been social failures. If that statement gave pain or annoyance to any one, I deeply regret it, and I would even apologize for it to those to whom I more immediately applied it. Let me, however, remind those who have gone through the heat of a Parliamentary Election that they may never have had two ladies dogging their steps and entering after them into the habitations of the electors, and telling their wives that they were oppressed by a tyrant, and that I was one of the oppressors. Under those circumstances, if I did use strong language, I think there was some little excuse for the inadvertence. My hon. and learned Friend has read a long list of aristocratic names—with which he is better acquainted than I am—and asks if these are the women I want to insult. [Mr. FORSYTH: I did not say “insult.”] But surely it would have been an insult, if I had applied the language to them. As I have said, I did not know the majority of the names; but there was one which I did recognize, and as he read it, I could not help thinking he read a strong and conclusive argument against the Bill. I refer to the name of Miss Nightingale, and in regard to her I venture to say that if her early years had been passed in preparing for a political life and her maturer years spent in party strife, Miss Nightingale would never have been the Florence Nightingale she has been to us—that tender ministering woman, “gaining more than a hero’s glory, winning more than a statesman’s renown.” I would only add one word, and that is how earnestly I join in the hope and belief that this subject will never be made a party question. But if it should be, with what confidence might I not appeal to every party in this House. I will ask those who sit on this side of the House, and desire to offer the exercise of a free vote to every citizen on the political action of the country, do they wish to see the franchise given to a class ever influenced by others—dependent upon the counsel whether of clergyman, priest or friend—a class violent in time of outbreak, and timid in the time of panic? If the measure is opposed to the Liberal views of those who desire the progress of the Constitution, with what greater confidence may I appeal to those who, now proud in their majority, have accepted the duty of maintaining and preserving the Constitution, founded and based upon its integrity and strength, and upon that home-life in England which is ever influenced by woman’s power. Mr. Speaker, you who sit in that Chair without care of political struggle, and without regarding the success of either party, you whose only object is to regulate the peaceful performance of our duties within this chamber, are but the type and representative of a very great power and class in this country. Between the two great conflicting parties of the State, there are those who are careless alike of which succeeds, which is in power, and which has the greater strength. They merely demand that our laws should be framed by us so as to preserve them in peaceful enjoyment of their domestic life, and ere this Bill passes into law, with a voice ever clear, because it will express the instincts of a people, they will demand that it should be cast from this Table, lest by the acceptance of it in a fitful moment we should endanger the prosperity of the people and imperil the greatness and stability of the Empire.

MR. FORSYTH said, that being unable to reply at so late an hour, he would content himself, as a lawyer, with assuring the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite (Sir Henry James), that he was entirely wrong in assuming that the measure would enable married women to vote. He had in the strongest legal terms he could use provided against that being the case; but if the Bill was not satisfactory in that respect, he would, if the second reading was agreed to, introduce an express Proviso in Committee.

ARMY—SALE OF COMMISSIONS—THE ROYAL WARRANT, 1870.—QUESTION.

COLONEL EGERTON LEIGH asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether he will take into his consideration Clause 84, section 1, of the Royal Warrant (Dec. 27, 1870) which prevents an officer from selling his commission till after the lapse of six weeks (should the surgeon's certificate declare such officer to be in a delicate or dangerous state of health), with a view to its being struck out of the Queen's Regulations?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY, in reply, said, the object which the hon. and gallant Colonel had in view would not be effected by touching the Queen's Regulations, which were made under the existing Act of Parliament respecting the Abolition of Purchase. It would require a new Act of Parliament, and the saving of £1,106,910, taken credit for in estimating the cost of abolishing Purchase, would be seriously diminished.

AUSTRALIA AND NEW GUINEA—IMMIGRATION.—QUESTION.

MR. WHALLEY asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether his attention has been called to the prospect of a large immigration from Australia to New Guinea consequent on the discovery of gold, as reported by Captain Moresby, R.N.; and, whether for this or other reasons it is the intention of the Government to establish a British settlement on that Island?

MR. J. LOWTHER: Sir, the attention of the Colonial Office has not been recently drawn to any immediate prospect of a large immigration from Australia to New Guinea, although I am, of course, aware that the subject has been a good deal discussed from time to time in Australia. As to the latter part of the Question of the hon. Gentleman, he will no doubt agree with me that, under the circumstances I have mentioned, it would be premature to form any opinion upon the subject.

UNIVERSITY EDUCATION (SCOTLAND)—CHAIRS OF TEACHING.—QUESTION.

MR. DALRYMPLE asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, What is the present position of the proposed endowment of the Chairs of the Theory and Practice of Teaching in the Universities of Edinburgh and Saint Andrews?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: In answer to the Question of the hon. Gentleman, I have to state that last summer I received deputations from the representatives of the Universities of Edinburgh and Saint Andrews, and they were accompanied by a body of Trustees. I was informed that the then Trustees had a certain sum of money at their disposal for various purposes, and that they proposed to apply a portion of that money to founding a new Chair, one in the University of Edinburgh, and the other in the University of Saint Andrews, for the purpose of teaching what they call the science of pedagogy, or the science of teaching. I was further informed that the University authorities were willing to accept the donation on the part of the Trustees, but that the amount would not be sufficient, in their opinion, to endow the Chairs, and they therefore came to the Government for a grant from the Treasury to add to the endowment of the Trustees. Looking at the matter from a purely financial point of view, I stated that I was not at that time prepared to entertain the question of the grant. Subsequently, in the course of the winter, the application was renewed, and I then considered, looking to various considerations which presented themselves, that I need not insist upon the objections which I had taken in the summer, and therefore I informed them that it would be within the competence of the Government to grant the sum which they asked for—namely, £200 for each Chair. I understood the money was to be for the purpose of teaching the theory and science of teaching, and not connected with any practical work and I certainly never supposed that the Chairs would interfere with the system of primary education in the normal schools in Scotland. Subsequently to that announcement, and after directions had been given for the grants, representations were made that these Chairs might in some way injure and interfere with the normal schools throughout Scotland. Now there was not the slightest intention on the part of the promoters, and there never was any on the part of the Government, that any such consequence should result from the foundation of the Chairs. I have put myself in communication with the Secretary of State for the Home Department and the Lord Advocate, and have requested them to consider whether any conditions ought to be enforced in order to prevent any interference with that system, which we do not desire to interfere with. We consider the Chairs ought to be of a purely scientific character. We have given Notice of the Vote for Edinburgh University; but by some accident the like Vote for Saint Andrews has been omitted from the Estimates. That is a pure accident, and it will be rectified.

CRIMINAL LAW—INDEPENDENCE OF JURIES.—QUESTION.

MR. WHALLEY: As the hon. Member for Stoke (Dr. Kenealy)—[Laughter]
—perhaps I may be permitted to explain that on a former occasion, when I intended to put this Question, also in his absence, I found myself on being called upon to read it not equal to the task; and I therefore postponed the Question until this day. [Cries of "Read, read."]

MR. SPEAKER: Does the hon. Gentleman propose to put the Question?

MR. WHALLEY: I do so; but perhaps I may be allowed a word of explanation. [Cries of "Read" and "Order."] The hon. Member for Stoke is a young Member, and possibly being ignorant of the practice of the House, is not here to put the Question himself. I not having communicated to him what took place on a former occasion—["Read, read"] —may have led to this misapprehension. This remark, I think, is due in justice to him, as the reason why he is not here to put the Question himself. I beg, therefore, on his behalf, to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether his attention has been called to the two following cases of alleged interference by Judges at the present Assizes with the province and independence of Juries:—

1. Extract from the "Dublin Daily Express" of what took place at Limerick Assizes on March 6th, before Mr. Justice Lawson, at the trial and acquittal of two men charged with homicide:—

"After an hour's deliberation the jury returned into court.

"The foreman handed down the issue paper.

"The Clerk of the Crown: Gentlemen, have you agreed to your verdict?

"Foreman: We have, my lord.

"Clerk of the Crown: And you say the prisoner is not guilty. (Sensation in court.)

"His Lordship: Gentlemen, is that your verdict?

"A Juror: It is, my lord.

"His Lordship: Is it possible, after hearing the evidence of the various witnesses examined, that you can arrive at such a verdict?

"Foreman: We have done our best, my lord.

"His Lordship asked counsel upon each side if they had anything to suggest.

"Sir Colman O'Loughlen, Q.C.: Well, my lord, the only suggestion I would venture to make to your lordship is that; the jury having agreed to the verdict, may now be discharged.

"His Lordship: Very well, Sir Colman. I must, however, observe that in the whole course of my experience I never witnessed a more wilful and distinct violation of an oath than has been illustrated by the jury in this case. It is beyond anything I could have imagined or believed. This is strong language for me to use, but I feel that in the discharge of my duty, sitting here as a judge, I am bound to use it.

"Subsequently,

"Mr. De Moleyns appeared in court, and, addressing his lordship, said: My lord, in consequence of the extraordinary verdict of the jury, and the observations which your lordship has felt bound to make, I beg that your lordship will postpone further action in the case until Monday, in order to afford the law officers of the Crown an opportunity of consulting upon the subject.

"His Lordship: Certainly.

"The prisoner was then removed in custody, and the jury were discharged."

2. "A man having been tried and acquitted at Brighton Assizes on the 18th of March, the Lord Chief Justice Cockburn, the presiding judge, immediately directed another jury to be sworn, and, addressing the prisoner, told him he ought to consider himself very fortunate, for he did not believe twelve other human beings could be found, except the jurors in the box, who would have returned the verdict they had done upon the evidence before them;"

and, whether it is his intention to introduce any measure which shall have for its object the better maintenance of the rights of jurymen to deliver verdicts according to their conscience, to the best of their ability, without censure from the Bench?

MR. DISRAELI: Mr. Speaker, the hon. Gentleman has made an appeal to me whether it is my intention to introduce any measures which shall have for their object the control of Judges in reference to conduct similar to that which he has detailed. I do not know why the appeal is made to me. It is not their business, happily, for the Ministers of the Crown to exercise jurisdiction over the Judges. If a Judge does anything to lose the confidence of the public, it is the privilege of Parliament to address the Crown to remove him from the Bench. Therefore, the hon. Gentleman should not have made his appeal to me; but, of course, I do not shrink from that appeal. I should be as unwilling as any Member of this House to interfere with the free expression of opinion on the part of the Judges as I should be to interfere with the free expression of opinion by the jury in delivering their verdict. There may be occasions on which the exercise of that freedom of opinion on the part of the Judges is for the public welfare. In civil cases it is often — perhaps not often, but occasionally — that the verdict of the jury is refused by Judges, and they are asked to re-consider it. In criminal cases, again, a jury may be so stupid or factious that a Judge may rightly and conscientiously believe that he is only doing his duty in expressing his opinion on the conduct of the jury. I hope — indeed, I feel sure — that no person in this House estimates more highly the institution of trial by jury than myself. I know its value, how much it conduces to the security of property and person, and not merely the freedom of the subject, but the liberties of the country. But I do not believe that juries are infallible; and from what I have observed of the sayings and doings of the hon. Member for Stoke, who originated this Question, and the hon. Member for Peterborough, who has adopted it, I believe that is an opinion which in some degree they share with me. I beg the House to observe that this Question has been felicitously introduced to-day in the absence of the hon. Member for Stoke, by the hon. Gentleman the Member for Peterborough who has just presented a Petition calling on the Crown to appoint a Royal Commission to impugn the verdict of a jury.

MASTER AND SERVANT ACT—CASE OF LUKE HILLS.—QUESTION.

MR. P. A. TAYLOR asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether it is true that Luke Hills, sentenced by the Cuckfield Bench of Magistrates to three months' imprisonment without hard labour for non-payment of damages for breach of contract, was for three weeks subjected to hard labour; and, if so, by what authority?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: Sir, the sentence of the magistrates was three months' imprisonment without hard labour. He regretted extremely to state that in the warrant of commitment the words "hard labour" had been inserted. The prisoner was received at the prison on the 1st of February under the commitment with hard labour, and accordingly he was placed to "hard labour" till the 17th, when the commitment was amended, leaving out "hard labour." The clerk who made the mistake deeply regretted the error committed.

IRELAND—AGRARIAN MURDER IN KING'S COUNTY—ATTACK UPON A PRISONER.—QUESTION.

MR. SULLIVAN asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, If his attention has been called to the following statements in the Dublin "Daily Express" of the 27th ultimo:—

"When the six prisoners (charged with the murder) arrived from Tullamore Jail, there were more than four thousand persons in the street, who, as the car passed up the village, made several fierce attempts to wrest Peter Claffey, the principal prisoner, from the hands of the police. The air was rent with cries of 'Lynch the murderer,' 'Blood for blood,' and other yells of a similar description. The house where Claffey resided was wrecked, and the windows and doors broken. The prisoner's name was erased from the sign-board, and that article was then painted one half red and the other half black. . . . Claffey's effigy was dragged through the place on a cart, and hanged opposite his own door. . . . Two men who expressed sympathy with the prisoners were set upon and only saved from death by fifteen of the constabulary who succeeded in bringing them to the barracks;"

whether this is the same case as that recently referred to by him, in which a man named Regney, who had served an ejectment, was shot while attending a wake; and, whether any information has been received at Dublin Castle corroborating the above statements of the

"Daily Express" as to the state of popular feeling in King's County in reference to this agrarian murder?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH, in reply, said, the case alluded to in the Question was the same to which he had recently referred in the House. His attention had been called to the statement and also to another paragraph of the report which the hon. Gentleman had omitted, from which it appeared that on this occasion the Crown Solicitor enjoyed what he feared had been the exceptional satisfaction of being on the popular side. The account was exaggerated in some points, very much so in the number of the crowd collected on the occasion; but undoubtedly a demonstration of the people was made in favour of the murdered person and against the man who was supposed to have committed the murder. How far that demonstration was due to the fact that the murdered man was very popular among his friends he was not in a condition to state; but he hoped, if it arose from detestation of the crime committed, the best proof of the existence of that healthy feeling would be that what had happened would afford sufficient encouragement to persons able to give evidence to come forward and aid in securing the conviction of the offender.

PUBLIC WORKS LOAN COMMISSIONERS—LOANS FOR LABOURERS' DWELLINGS.—QUESTION.

SIR SYDNEY WATERLOW asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether he is aware that, in consequence of the state of the funds at the disposal of the Public Works Loan Commissioners for the purposes of the Labouring Classes Dwellings Act, 1866, the Commissioners are unable to entertain applications for Loans to assist in the erection of Dwellings for the Labouring Classes; and, whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to provide the Commissioners with the funds necessary for carrying out the purposes of the said Act?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in reply, said, that the funds at the disposal of the Public Works Loan Commissioners were not inexhaustible. The amount that was granted on the passing of the Labouring Classes Dwellings Act, 1866, for the purposes of the Act was £250,000, and that money had been either actually lent or promised; therefore, the Commissioners had no more money in their hands applicable to this purpose. It was the intention of the Government in a short time to introduce a Bill to raise more money, in order to supply the Public Works Loan Commissioners with funds for this and other purposes. There were a great many calls upon these funds, and the introduction of the Bill had been delayed a little time, until it had been ascertained what was the amount that was required.

POLLUTION OF RIVERS—LEGISLATION. QUESTION.

MR. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether he can inform the House when he proposes to introduce the Bill for the prevention of the Pollution of Rivers promised in Her Majesty's Most Gracious Speech?

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH, in reply, said, he was not prepared at that moment to answer the Question put by the hon. Gentleman; but next week he should, he hoped, be able to name the day when it was his intention to bring in the Bill.

ARMY—MILITIA RECRUITING DEPOTS, DUBLIN.—QUESTION.

MR. SULLIVAN asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether any decision has been come to by the Government in reference to the required removal of the Militia Recruiting Depôts from the locality of the King's Inns in Dublin?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH, in reply, said, the decision on the subject did not rest with the Irish Government, but with the War Office. There had been a Correspondence between the two Departments, and the matter was still under the consideration of the Secretary of State for War. He hoped to be able in a short time to give the hon. Gentleman an answer to his Question.

INTOXICATING LIQUOR (IRELAND) ACT —DUBLIN LICENSING SESSIONS.

QUESTION.

MR. SULLIVAN asked Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland, If the attention of the Government has been called to the fact that, notwithstanding section 12 of the Act 37th and 38th Vic. c. 69, under which the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland was empowered, by Order in the Dublin Gazette, to appoint one of the ordinary quarter sessions to be the annual licensing sessions, and, notwithstanding such order having been made, fixing the Michaelmas Sessions, held in October, as such annual licensing sessions, the clerk of the peace for the City of Dublin has issued a notice for the ordinary quarterly licensing sessions to be held for the City of Dublin on the 10th April next; and, if the Government intend to take any steps to ensure that the provisions of the Licensing Act in this respect shall be complied with?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. PLUNKET): Sir, I am informed that the only public document issued by the Clerk of the Peace for the City of Dublin, as to the granting of licences at the April Quarter Sessions, is a list of persons intending to apply for licences on that occasion. By the 12th section of the Intoxicating Liquors (Ireland) Act of last Session, an authority is reserved to the Recorder to grant provisional licences at any General Quarter Sessions, in such cases as shall seem fit to him. I am certain that the learned Recorder of Dublin will exercise this discretion in accordance with law, and it is not the intention of the Government to interfere.

ARMY STAFF APPOINTMENTS—RETURN.—QUESTION.

SIR PATRICK O'BRIEN asked the Secretary of State for War, When the Return relative to Army Staff Appointments, ordered on the 30th of July last, will be laid upon the Table?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY, in reply, said, the branch of the War Office which had to make out the Return was so pressed with business that it could only be prepared gradually, and he was afraid it would not be ready before the end of May.

RAILWAYS—THE GREAT WESTERN RAILWAY.—QUESTION.

SIR PATRICK O'BRIEN asked the President of the Board of Trade, If his attention has been directed to two letters in "The Times" of Wednesday March 31st. and Saturday last respectively, one stating that trains on the Great Western Railway, when approaching Wednesbury, travel at a walking pace, in consequence of the ground in the neighbourhood being undermined by coal-pits; the other letter in some degree contradicting this assertion; and, whether he will direct an official report to be made upon the subject?

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY: Sir, my attention has been directed to this subject. The portion of railway referred to has been inspected by Colonel Hutchinson, of the Board of Trade, in conjunction with Mr. Baker, Inspector of Mines to the Home Office, and I have laid their Reports on the Table this evening. I have communicated these Reports to the Railway Company and to the owner of the mine, and I am taking advice as to my power to take further steps, if necessary, for the safety of the public.

POST OFFICE SAVINGS BANK DEPARTMENT.—QUESTION.

MR. GOLDSMID asked the Postmaster General, Whether the Report of the Committee which he had previously informed the House, in answer to a Question, had been appointed to inquire into the state of the Savings Bank Department of the Post Office has been presented; and, if it has, whether he will lay it together with the evidence upon the Table of the House; and, whether he has yet reinstated the sorters who were dismissed on account of alleged communications with agitators outside?

LORD JOHN MANNERS, in reply, said, the Report alluded to by the hon. Gentleman had been presented; but it was a strictly departmental document, which ought not to be laid on the Table of the House. The five sorters who were dismissed during the winter had not been re-instated.

GLEBE LOANS (IRELAND) ACT, 1870. QUESTION.

MR. R. SMYTH asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether he can conveniently communicate to the House the intentions of the Government with reference to the continuance of "The Glebe Loans (Ireland) Act, 1870?"

SIR MICHAEL HICKS - BEACH, in reply, said, he had communicated with the Lord Chancellor of Ireland and with the Treasury on the subject, and he was able to announce that it was intended to propose the continuance of the Act for three years.

MERCHANT SHIPPING ACTS—UNSEAWORTHY SHIPS.—QUESTION.

MR. PLIMSOLL asked the President of the Board of Trade, At whose instance Board of Trade inquiries as to the seaworthiness of merchant ships are or have been held, say upon the last twenty cases: if on the motion of the department itself, upon what principle of selection they proceed; if upon requisitions from outside, then upon whose requests in those instances?

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY: Sir, there is an ambiguity about the Question, whether it refers to Surveyors' Reports of unseaworthy ships or inquiries into wrecks. Whichever is meant it would be better answered by an actual Return, which, if the hon. Member will move for unopposed, I will take care shall be immediately presented to the House. It would be difficult to give such information in the form of an Answer to a Question.

THE ARCTIC EXPEDITION—APPOINTMENT OF A CHAPLAIN. QUESTION.

MR. HANBURY-TRACY asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, If he will appoint a chaplain, specially selected with scientific attainments, to accompany the Arctic Expedition?

MR. HUNT, in reply, said, he was sorry it was not possible to appoint a chaplain for want of cabin accommodation. There had been great difficulty in providing for the crews selected.

FOREIGN LOANS COMMITTEE— SIR HENRY JAMES. QUESTION.

SIR LAWRENCE PALK asked the honourable and learned Member for Taunton, If it is true that he appeared as Counsel in December 1874, and again in January 1875, before the Lord Chancellor in a legal proceeding relating to the Paraguay Loan; and, whether that is the Paraguay Loan to which he alluded in his speech this Session as one of the Foreign Loans to be investigated by the Select Committee obtained by him on Foreign Loans?

SIR HENRY JAMES: Sir, on the 15th of December, 1874, I had to appear as counsel on an interlocutory motion before the Lord Chancellor and Lord Justice James, sitting as the Appellate Court in Chancery. I believe the main object of the suit was to enable certain persons to recover a certain sum of money from other persons for work and labour done in relation to bringing out the Paraguay Loan; and the interlocutory proceeding in which I appeared was for the purpose of determining whether certain witnesses should be examined in private or should be examined in public; that was the only matter in which I was concerned—the only proceeding in which I had to take any share or part. With the main purpose of the suit I had nothing to do. At the time I had no intention of moving for a Select Committee on Foreign Loans. Before the sitting of Parliament, when I had determined to bring the matter under the cognizance of this House, I caused the retainer I had received in that suit to be returned, and I have since taken no part or share, as advocate or counsel, in that suit, or any other connected with it. I take no exception to the hon. Baronet putting the Question, for since I have had the honour of a seat in this House, I have felt it was very necessary that every member of my profession should carefully guard against allowing his Parliamentary conduct to be in any way influenced by professional considerations. I trust the course I have taken on this occasion will be satisfactory to the hon. Baronet, and that I shall always shape my conduct in accordance with that opinion.

INDIA—BANDA AND KIRWEE PRIZE BOOTY.—QUESTION.

MR. RYDER asked the Under Secretary of State for India, When the further Correspondence, 18th February last, relative to the Kirwee Booty would be produced; and, whether there is any objection to produce the Despatch, omitted in the recent Return, calling for the information from Calcutta, ordered by Her Majesty in July 1873, to be furnished to Parliament with reference to the realised amount of Indian spoil?

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON, in reply, said, an application from the prize agents on the subject was under

on this side of the House, I rise to second the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman. He has on more than one occasion gracefully, but at the same time justly, recognized the services rendered to the State by the House of Russell. That House will always occupy a foremost place in the history of the Party to which I am proud to belong, and I hope it will occupy no insignificant place in the history of the country. Of that house the noble Lord who has just resigned his office is no unworthy Member. There are, Sir, at the present moment but few Members who can recollect the time when he assumed the duties of his office; but I am glad that his resignation has been deferred sufficiently long to enable a number of new Members of this House to add their testimony to that of us who are better acquainted with him as to the invariable dignity and courtesy with which he has discharged his duties.

Resolved, Nemine Contradicente, That Mr. Speaker be requested to acquaint Lord Charles James Fox Russell, that this House entertains a just sense of the exemplary manner in which he has uniformly discharged the duties of the Office of Serjeant at Arms during his long attendance upon this House.—(Mr. Disraeli.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY, in rising to move that the Bill be now read a second time, said, he was fully sensible of the importance and delicate task he undertook. It would add another statute to too many already existing, affecting one of the most vital interests of the country, and which was most sensitive of any Government interference. The Bill arose from a just claim on the Legislature that it should do all in its power to diminish the perils to which the gallant seamen who manned our merchant service were, to some extent, unnecessarily exposed. Under such an impulse, the House might easily run into inconsiderate and mistaken legislation, which might inflict the most serious injury upon the shipowners who were honourably engaged in a great enterprize, and which, so far from securing the safety or improving the condition of the seamen, might supplement the necessary perils of the sea by the graver perils of a Government protection still more treacherous and disastrous than the sea itself. He had, therefore, in recommending legislation to the House, approached the subject with the deepest anxiety and sense of responsibility. He had not intended to say a word in moving the second reading of this Bill, because he had fully explained the objects of the Bill on its introduction. He had, however, since given Notice of his intention to substitute a new clause for Clause 41, relating to the liabilities of shipowners, and to introduce a voluntary load-line clause into the Bill; and he should, therefore, best consult the convenience of the House by making a preliminary statement to show how the Bill would then stand. If the House would read it a second time, he would move for its committal pro forma that these insertions might be made, together with such Amendments on the Notice Paper as he could wholly or partially adopt. The object of the measure was to secure increased safety at sea and a diminution of the unnecessary perils to which seamen were now exposed, while avoiding at the same time any mischievous interference with shipowners in carrying on their business. A pamphlet had been just received by Members of the House, circulated by the hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. MacIver), in which the two principles were fairly placed in direct antagonism—that of making shipowners answerable for the safety of their ships; and that of Government undertaking to be answerable for them. He gave his preference to the latter principle, on the ground that shipowners were not necessarily experts, and their ships often came to grief with no criminal intention on their part, or even knowledge of the cause. He therefore thought that, alone of all trades, the shipowner should have guaranteed to him the profits arising from his trade, while the Government should be responsible for supplying him with the requisite knowledge for conducting it. The hon. Member hoped that the day would come when the Government would include within itself a representative marine department—that was to say, a department to represent shipowners, the head of which would be a sort of Controller General of Mercantile Marine, as the First Lord of the Admiralty was at the head

the Act 37th and 38th Vic. c. 69, under which the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland was empowered, by Order in the Dublin Gazette, to appoint one of the ordinary quarter sessions to be the annual licensing sessions, and, notwithstanding such order having been made, fixing the Michaelmas Sessions, held in October, as such annual licensing sessions, the clerk of the peace for the City of Dublin has issued a notice for the ordinary quarterly licensing sessions to be held for the City of Dublin on the 10th April next; and, if the Government intend to take any steps to ensure that the provisions of the Licensing Act in this respect shall be complied with?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. PLUNKET): Sir, I am informed that the only public document issued by the Clerk of the Peace for the City of Dublin, as to the granting of licences at the April Quarter Sessions, is a list of persons intending to apply for licences on that occasion. By the 12th section of the Intoxicating Liquors (Ireland) Act of last Session, an authority is reserved to the Recorder to grant provisional licences at any General Quarter Sessions, in such cases as shall seem fit to him. I am certain that the learned Recorder of Dublin will exercise this discretion in accordance with law, and it is not the intention of the Government to interfere.

ARMY STAFF APPOINTMENTS—RETURN.—QUESTION.

SIR PATRICK O'BRIEN asked the Secretary of State for War, When the Return relative to Army Staff Appointments, ordered on the 30th of July last, will be laid upon the Table?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY, in reply, said, the branch of the War Office which had to make out the Return was so pressed with business that it could only be prepared gradually, and he was afraid it would not be ready before the end of May.

RAILWAYS.—THE GREAT WESTERN RAILWAY.—QUESTION.

SIR PATRICK O'BRIEN asked the President of the Board of Trade, If his attention has been directed to two letters in "The Times" of Wednesday March 31st and Saturday last respectively, one stating that trains on the Great Western Railway, when approaching Wednesbury, travel at a walking pace, in consequence of the ground in the neighbourhood being undermined by coal-pits; the other letter in some degree contradicting this assertion; and, whether he will direct an official report to be made upon the subject?

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY: Sir, my attention has been directed to this subject. The portion of railway referred to has been inspected by Colonel Hutchinson, of the Board of Trade, in conjunction with Mr. Baker, Inspector of Mines to the Home Office, and I have laid their Reports on the Table this evening. I have communicated these Reports to the Railway Company and to the owner of the mine, and I am taking advice as to my power to take further steps, if necessary, for the safety of the public.

POST OFFICE SAVINGS BANK DEPARTMENT.—QUESTION.

MR. GOLDSMID asked the Postmaster General, Whether the Report of the Committee which he had previously informed the House, in answer to a Question, had been appointed to inquire into the state of the Savings Bank Department of the Post Office has been presented; and, if it has, whether he will lay it together with the evidence upon the Table of the House; and, whether he has yet reinstated the sorters who were dismissed on account of alleged communications with agitators outside?

LORD JOHN MANNERS, in reply, said, the Report alluded to by the hon. Gentleman had been presented; but it was a strictly departmental document, which ought not to be laid on the Table of the House. The five sorters who were dismissed during the winter had not been re-instated.

GLEBE LOANS (IRELAND) ACT, 1870. QUESTION.

MR. R. SMYTH asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether he can conveniently communicate to the House the intentions of the Government with reference to the continuance of "The Glebe Loans (Ireland) Act, 1870?"

SIR MICHAEL HICKS - BEACH, in reply, said, he had communicated with the Lord Chancellor of Ireland and with the Treasury on the subject, and he was able to announce that it was intended to propose the continuance of the Act for three years.

MERCHANT SHIPPING ACTS—UNSEAWORTHY SHIPS.—QUESTION.

MR. PLIMSOLL asked the President of the Board of Trade, At whose instance Board of Trade inquiries as to the seaworthiness of merchant ships are or have been held, say upon the last twenty cases: if on the motion of the department itself, upon what principle of selection they proceed; if upon requisitions from outside, then upon whose requests in those instances?

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY: Sir, there is an ambiguity about the Question, whether it refers to Surveyors' Reports of unseaworthy ships or inquiries into wrecks. Whichever is meant it would be better answered by an actual Return, which, if the hon. Member will move for unopposed, I will take care shall be immediately presented to the House. It would be difficult to give such information in the form of an Answer to a Question.

THE ARCTIC EXPEDITION—APPOINTMENT OF A CHAPLAIN. QUESTION.

MR. HANBURY-TRACY asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, If he will appoint a chaplain, specially selected with scientific attainments, to accompany the Arctic Expedition?

MR. HUNT, in reply, said, he was sorry it was not possible to appoint a chaplain for want of cabin accommodation. There had been great difficulty in providing for the crews selected.

FOREIGN LOANS COMMITTEE—SIR HENRY JAMES. QUESTION.

SIR LAWRENCE PALK asked the honourable and learned Member for Taunton, If it is true that he appeared as Counsel in December 1874, and again in January 1875, before the Lord Chancellor in a legal proceeding relating to the Paraguay Loan; and, whether that is the Paraguay Loan to which he alluded in his speech this Session as one of the Foreign Loans to be investigated by the Select Committee obtained by him on Foreign Loans?

SIR HENRY JAMES: Sir, on the 15th of December, 1874, I had to appear as counsel on an interlocutory motion before the Lord Chancellor and Lord Justice James, sitting as the Appellate Court in Chancery. I believe the main object of the suit was to enable certain persons to recover a certain sum of money from other persons for work and labour done in relation to bringing out the Paraguay Loan; and the interlocutory proceeding in which I appeared was for the purpose of determining whether certain witnesses should be examined in private or should be examined in public; that was the only matter in which I was concerned—the only proceeding in which I had to take any share or part. With the main purpose of the suit I had nothing to do. At the time I had no intention of moving for a Select Committee on Foreign Loans. Before the sitting of Parliament, when I had determined to bring the matter under the cognizance of this House, I caused the retainer I had received in that suit to be returned, and I have since taken no part or share, as advocate or counsel, in that suit, or any other connected with it. I take no exception to the hon. Baronet putting the Question, for since I have had the honour of a seat in this House, I have felt it was very necessary that every member of my profession should carefully guard against allowing his Parliamentary conduct to be in any way influenced by professional considerations. I trust the course I have taken on this occasion will be satisfactory to the hon. Baronet, and that I shall always shape my conduct in accordance with that opinion.

INDIA—BANDA AND KIRWEE PRIZE BOOTY.—QUESTION.

MR. RYDER asked the Under Secretary of State for India, When the further Correspondence, 18th February last, relative to the Kirwee Booty would be produced; and, whether there is any objection to produce the Despatch, omitted in the recent Return, calling for the information from Calcutta, ordered by Her Majesty in July 1873, to be furnished to Parliament with reference to the realised amount of Indian spoil?

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON, in reply, said, an application from the prize agents on the subject was under the consideration of the Secretary of State. When a reply to that application had been sent the Correspondence would be produced. So little objection was there to the publication of the despatch to which the hon. Gentleman attached importance, that he would read it at once. It was—

“I forward herewith a copy of an order of the House of Lords, dated the 10th of July, 1873, and I request that you will furnish me with the information therein required.”

EAST AFRICAN SLAVE TRADE. QUESTION.

MR. HANBURY asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, When the Papers relating to the East African Slave Trade, which have now for some time been in the hands of the printers, will be issued to Members; and, if he would state to the House what changes have been made in the Consular Service on the East Coast of Africa and on the Coasts of the Red Sea since the Report of the Slave Trade Committee of 1871, and what further changes are now contemplated?

MR. BOURKE, in reply, said, the Papers alluded to would probably be in the hands of Members to-morrow, and as to the second Question, relating to the Consular Service, that subject would be soon brought under the consideration of the House, and it would be his duty then to make a statement upon the subject.

NAVY—EAST AFRICAN SLAVE TRADE —CRUISERS.—QUESTION.

MR. HANBURY asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, What was the number and nature of the vessels actually employed last year in suppressing the Slave Trade upon the East Coast of Africa; and, what is the number and nature of the vessels this year employed in the same service?

MR. HUNT, in reply, said, that the number varied very much, but at the beginning of the year there were five ships, and at the end seven. Of these, the London, depôt ship, was specially furnished with boats in order to assist in the suppression of the traffic; the flag ship Glasgow had also visited the East Coast during the latter part of the year; there were two surveying ships employed on this service, so far as compatible with their other duties, one of which, the Shearwater, was ordered home; but another vessel would be sent to replace her. No alteration had been made this year, but an additional vessel would be sent in the course of the summer to strengthen the squadron.

THE SERJEANT AT ARMS—RESIGNATION OF LORD CHARLES JAMES FOX RUSSELL.

RESOLUTION OF THIS HOUSE.

MR. DISRAELI: I beg to move, Sir, that the letter addressed to you by Lord Charles Russell, the late Serjeant at Arms, be read by the Clerk at the Table.

Letter [5th April] read.

MR. DISRAELI: Mr. Speaker, we have listened to the resignation of his office by one who has long and ably served this House. The office of Serjeant at Arms is one which requires no ordinary qualities; for it requires at the same time patience, firmness, and suavity, and that is a combination of qualities which is unfortunately more rare than one could wish in this world. The noble Lord who filled the office recently, and whose resignation has just been read at the Table, has obtained our confidence by the manner in which he has discharged his duties through an unusually long period of years; and we should remember, I think, that occasions like the present are almost the only opportunity we have of expressing our sense of those qualities, entitled so much to our respect, which are possessed and exercised by those who fill offices attached to this House, and upon whose able fulfilment of their duties much of our convenience depends. Therefore, following the wise example of those who have preceded me in this office, I have prepared a Resolution which expresses the feeling of the House on this occasion, and I now place it, Sir, in your hands.

MR. SPEAKER read the Resolution, as follows—

“That Mr. Speaker be requested to acquaint Lord Charles James Fox Russell, that this House entertains a just sense of the exemplary manner in which he has uniformly discharged the duties of the Office of Serjeant at Arms during his long attendance upon this House.”

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Sir, on behalf of the Members who sit on this side of the House, I rise to second the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman. He has on more than one occasion gracefully, but at the same time justly, recognized the services rendered to the State by the House of Russell. That House will always occupy a foremost place in the history of the Party to which I am proud to belong, and I hope it will occupy no insignificant place in the history of the country. Of that house the noble Lord who has just resigned his office is no unworthy Member. There are, Sir, at the present moment but few Members who can recollect the time when he assumed the duties of his office; but I am glad that his resignation has been deferred sufficiently long to enable a number of new Members of this House to add their testimony to that of us who are better acquainted with him as to the invariable dignity and courtesy with which he has discharged his duties.

Resolved, Nemine Contradicente, That Mr. Speaker be requested to acquaint Lord Charles James Fox Russell, that this House entertains a just sense of the exemplary manner in which he has uniformly discharged the duties of the Office of Serjeant at Arms during his long attendance upon this House."—(Mr. Disraeli.)

MERCHANT SHIPPING ACTS AMENDMENT BILL—[BILL 4.]

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY, in rising to move that the Bill be now read a second time, said, he was fully sensible of the importance and delicate task he undertook. It would add another statute to too many already existing, affecting one of the most vital interests of the country, and which was most sensitive of any Government interference. The Bill arose from a just claim on the Legislature that it should do all in its power to diminish the perils to which the gallant seamen who manned our merchant service were, to some extent, unnecessarily exposed. Under such an impulse, the House might easily run into inconsiderate and mistaken legislation, which might inflict the most serious injury upon the shipowners who were honourably engaged in a great enterprize, and which, so far from securing the safety or improving the condition of the seamen, might supplement the necessary perils of the sea by the graver perils of a Government protection still more treacherous and disastrous than the sea itself. He had, therefore, in recommending legislation to the House, approached the subject with the deepest anxiety and sense of responsibility. He had not intended to say a word in moving the second reading of this Bill, because he had fully explained the objects of the Bill on its introduction. He had, however, since given Notice of his intention to substitute a new clause for Clause 41, relating to the liabilities of shipowners, and to introduce a voluntary load-line clause into the Bill; and he should, therefore, best consult the convenience of the House by making a preliminary statement to show how the Bill would then stand. If the House would read it a second time, he would move for its committal pro forma that these insertions might be made, together with such Amendments on the Notice Paper as he could wholly or partially adopt. The object of the measure was to secure increased safety at sea and a diminution of the unnecessary perils to which seamen were now exposed, while avoiding at the same time any mischievous interference with shipowners in carrying on their business. A pamphlet had been just received by Members of the House, circulated by the hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. MacIver), in which the two principles were fairly placed in direct antagonism—that of making shipowners answerable for the safety of their ships; and that of Government undertaking to be answerable for them. He gave his preference to the latter principle, on the ground that shipowners were not necessarily experts, and their ships often came to grief with no criminal intention on their part, or even knowledge of the cause. He therefore thought that, alone of all trades, the shipowner should have guaranteed to him the profits arising from his trade, while the Government should be responsible for supplying him with the requisite knowledge for conducting it. The hon. Member hoped that the day would come when the Government would include within itself a representative marine department—that was to say, a department to represent shipowners, the head of which would be a sort of Controller General of Mercantile Marine, as the First Lord of the Admiralty was at the head of the Navy. The Bill was drawn on a directly opposite principle. It proposed that the Board of Trade should continue to watch over public safety and enforce the legal consequences of negligence or recklessness in private enterprise, violating its public responsibility. The Bill would provide—first, for improvement in the discipline and condition of seamen; second, for a better equipment of ships. Its third object was the prevention of unseaworthy ships going to sea. Then it proposed to deal with and improve the system of inquiry into casualties at sea; and, lastly, to amend the law as to the liabilities of shipowners. The first proposal to which he had referred included the abolition of advance notes, which had been freely canvassed as a needless interference with the freedom of contract. It was, in fact, quite the reverse. The effect of allowing advance notes to be given was an unparalleled licence to enable the most improvident of our fellow-citizens to anticipate their wages and get into extra debt. No other class of workmen in the Kingdom had any such specially recognized power—he would not call it privilege—and in the case of sailors the result was simply a handing them over to the mercy of crimps. The advance note was altogether different from the allotment note, by which a seaman could provide for his family in his absence, and no interference with the allotment note was proposed. The simple result of abolishing advance notes would be that a seaman arriving at a port with a certain amount of wages would, as now, be cleared of all his property; but he would not be trusted any further, and would be obliged to engage himself to sea again. It was said that there might be cases where the sailor arrived at a port destitute of money, and that then the advance note was necessary. Of all kinds of relief the worst was to enable the seaman by some extraordinary process to live upon anticipated earnings. There was a provision introduced into the Bill to enable the master to grant the seaman any necessary clothing at a reasonable price. The second object to which he had referred—namely, the better equipment of ships, had regard, among other things, to the supply of boats which ships would be obliged to carry. The existing law on this point was, by the Bill adapted to present circumstances. The hon. Member for Pembroke (Mr. Reed) proposed, also, on the subject of equipment that the iron used in shipbuilding should be subjected to a Government test, and the proposal was worthy of consideration—the fact not being lost sight of that a severe test would materially increase the cost of shipbuilding. With respect to the third object to which he had alluded—namely, the stoppage of unseaworthy ships the question was what was the most effectual means of preventing unseaworthy ships going to sea; whether by the Government dealing only with particular cases, or undertaking to guarantee the condition of all ships, at all times, in the Mercantile Navy. The Bill maintained the principle of the existing law, which he considered a far more effectual provision against carelessness and negligence than if the Government were to attempt to do the shipowners' work. The principle which the Bill followed was the right mode of dealing with the matter; it prevented men doing wrong rather than undertaking their work for them; it was a terror to evil doers without harassing those who did well, while the contrary plan would be a terror to well doers, and a screen, and impunity for those who did ill. Both plans were preventive in theory, but the one was effective practically, the other a delusion. That Government officers should undertake the survey of every ship, with any real effect, or justifiable pretence of giving a certificate of seaworthiness on every voyage, would be a delusion. Even the present survey which the Legislature had imposed on the Board of Trade was more than the present staff of surveyors could satisfactorily perform. His opinion was confirmed by what he had seen the other day upon the Tyne, crowded with ships, loading with great celerity, and going to sea at all hours of the night and day. It was not to be supposed that the officials would be able even to know the draught of water of all the vessels which so went out, and if the principle of survey which had been proposed were adopted it would probably be found necessary to quintuple the number of surveyors, and the end of it would be that a sort of bill of safety would be given by the Government without any adequate security to every ship screening their owners from all liability. It was proposed, on the contrary, to increase that liability, and to strengthen the office for the purpose. The Government intended not only to increase the staff of surveyors, but to establish a higher class of officers as superintendents, who, posted at the principal ports of the Kingdom, might be trusted to act upon their own responsibility, without in all cases referring, in the first instance, to the Board of Trade. If the Government were to attempt to carry into effect a general survey it would be out of their power to provide a sufficient staff of surveyors, and still more to get this higher class of superintendents without whom the proceeding would be a simple sham. An incomplete and unreal survey would be more dangerous than the present defective police, and would be attended with the worst possible consequences. The House must consider, in weighing the proposition of the hon. Member for Derby (Mr. Plimsoll), how far he had found it tenable himself. That hon. Gentleman had repeatedly found it to break down under him. His first proposal was that the Government should undertake a universal survey—a survey of the whole Mercantile Marine, comprising about 26,000 ships, and that this survey should be repeated from year to year, as would be necessary if it were to be of any use. The hon. Member found this proposal utterly impracticable, and he tried to free it from obvious objection on that score by agreeing to except from that survey the best lines of ships, such as the Cunard, which would not need it. In his Bill of this year the hon. Member extended the exception—he proposed now that the Government should undertake to survey only unclassified ships. But what did that mean? Why that the Government should enter into partnership with private registry associations with classified ships. But, in the first place, a Government survey must be very different from a private classification, not only different in its actual meaning and value, but still more different in the way in which it would be understood throughout the country. On that ground alone it would be impossible that Government could enter into partnership with private associations. In the second place, it would be a difficult question what associations in partnership with Government survey, to recognize. Of course, Government would recognize Lloyd's and the Liverpool Association, and it would be difficult to refuse American registration, and the Veritas, and private clubs. The hon. Gentleman said that the Board of Trade should decide what associations should be recognized. That would be a very delicate function he would throw on the Board of Trade. But supposing the Board of Trade, with greater sagacity than the hon. Member generally gave it credit for, made a wise selection, what then? Classification and terms of registry varied perpetually and must vary. Competition led to constant change and lowering of standard. The Government would either have to adopt some sort of average standard among all the associations, or it would have to dispute every standard which differed from its own. At all events, the Government would get implicated in a most uncertain and capricious influence on the insurance of ships and the liability of owners. In fact, the hon. Gentleman himself had made a complete exposure of the unsuitableness of his own proposition. But even if we could get a test of seaworthy construction and state of repair, there were other elements which would have to be taken into consideration when deciding on the seaworthiness or unseaworthiness of a ship on every voyage. The lading and equipment of the ship, and the character of the crew, among other things, would have to be taken into account. What to his mind was the worst part of the hon. Member's plan was that it would remove the last check upon the carelessness and negligence of shipowners, and he had found, generally speaking, that the best shipowners did not want this survey, but that the worst were ready enough to accept it. The object of the Government in framing their Bill had been to interfere as little as possible with private enterprise while taking security of the owners for the safety of vessels and for the lives of those who were on board of them. This was the principle of all our laws. We sought to stop crime, but we do not search everybody's pockets from time to time to ascertain they contained no stolen property. If we interfere in reference to sanitary arrangements we did not search every house, but only those which were suspected; and in reference to public health the Government had generally kept to the line that they should remove nuisances only. The Government had never contemplated guaranteeing the seaworthiness of all ships, but only stopping unseaworthy ships; and they had found the greatest difficulty in doing this without injury and mischief, and their attempts had not been so satisfactory as they could have wished. It was a very difficult and delicate task for an officer at a distant port in England, however honest and sagacious he might be, to report to London that a ship that was about to sail was unseaworthy, and the delay occasioned might entail the gravest loss and injury to the shipowner without justification, and without benefit to anyone. Surveyors frequently differed in their judgment as to the seaworthiness of ships, and any attempts at laying down rules for their guidance, was full of hazard, and might occasion the gravest consequences to the mercantile community. He had himself found the subject a most difficult one, and the duty he had to discharge in connection with it was not the most satisfactory part of the work he had to perform. The question was brought prominently before the consideration of the Royal Commission; and it was proposed that there should be a load-line fixed so that there might be no uncertainty, because everybody could see the line. But there occurred the insuperable difficulty of how the load-line was to be fixed, because it would have to be based upon half-a-dozen kinds of variable data. There was the question of the construction of the ship. One kind of cargo also would require a different load-line from that which would be required by another kind of cargo. A ship which was going across the Atlantic or the Bay of Biscay would require a totally different load-line from the same ship going only to the Baltic or about the coast. The seasons of the year required different load-lines. The Royal Commission, therefore, said that they were not prepared to recommend a fixed load-line; they were not ready either to recommend an elastic load-line; and they thought it a most reasonable mode of proceeding not to come to any decision until the provisions of the recent Act had been tried for, at all events, a year or two. The experience of the Acts of 1871 and 1873, he confessed, had not been very satisfactory, the judgment and the reports of the various surveyors made to the Board of Trade having about them so much uncertainty as in itself amounted to a very grave evil. The general proposition he intended to make in Committee upon the Bill was, that shipowners should upon every entry for clearance of their ships make a declaration stating the maximum figure in scale of feet on the sides of their ships beyond which they did not intend to load them. This declaration should be made at the Customs, and entered in the log and articles of agreement with the seamen. He should, however, modify that proposition to this extent—that the declaration in question need not be made for every entry for clearance when the ship continued in the same service and carried the same kind of cargo. The shipowners might if they chose send a notice of such declarations to the Board of Trade, and if the Board of Trade made no objection to the terms of those declarations it should have no power to stop any ship which had the declared load-line above water. He thought that this proposition would meet the difficulties of the case as well as was possible. The remaining class of clauses related to the liability of the shipowners. He had already given Notice of a clause which he should propose to substitute for Clause 41 in the draft Bill. Under the Act of 1862, which formed the existing law on the subject, the liability of the shipowner for damage done on board his ship without his fault was limited to £8 and £15 per ton, and where he was in fault his liability was unlimited—that was to say, he was thrown back upon his common law liability to the full extent of the damage done. It appeared to him that the words “unlimited liability,” as used in the draft clause, had been introduced unwisely, as it meant no more than the existing liability to the full extent of damage. The only novelty proposed had been the extension of liability to the act of an agent. He proposed to substitute a clause that would merely render the shipowner liable to the extent of the damage his own act had caused, and that he should not be able to contract himself out of this liability by any bill of lading. It was ascertained that it had not been the view of the Commission that the owner should be liable for unseaworthiness caused by the acts of his agent done without his knowledge at a distance, the draft clause had, therefore, been withdrawn as [too severe and stringent. The new clause to the effect that no shipowner should be able by his bill of lading to contract himself out of the limited liability to which he was now exposed for damage caused by unseaworthiness, as far as he had been able to ascertain, there would be no objection to. He was deeply interested in the success of this Bill. He did not take any credit to himself for the draft, for he was indebted for, what he was sanguine to hope would be a satisfactory and permanent measure, to the very eminent ability and industry of the officers of the Board of Trade; and he believed that there was no Department of the Government the head of which was more ably supported. For his own part, he had carefully investigated and tested the merits of the Bill to the utmost of his power, and had taken every means by communication with all the different classes interested to ascertain that it was the best proposition that could be submitted by the Government to Parliament on this most important subject.

MR. T. E. SMITH: May I ask whether it is obligatory to insert the draught of water in the declaration?

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY: Yes; it is obligatory to make the declaration, but not to send notice to the Board of Trade. All he could say, in conclusion, was that in the discussion of this Bill, he hoped the House would bear in mind that they had all the same object in view, and that the only question between them was, which was the best way of accomplishing that object. He hoped the discussion would not be apparently divided between sailors' friends and shipowners' friends, for there was no such division among them in this debate. He was sure that there was no one in that House who did not wish to guard the seamen from all unnecessary risk—it went to the heart of Englishmen that everything should be done to effect this. All that the Government asked to-night was that the Bill should be discussed on the second reading with the view of determining whether it was based on a principle which would most effectually carry out that object. With that feeling he moved the second reading.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Sir Charles Adderley.)

MR. GRIEVE: Will the right hon. Gentleman state what he proposes to do with the first Schedule?

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY: I propose to retain that Schedule, but to make alterations in it.

MR. NORWOOD begged to assure the right hon. Gentleman who had just sat down that in moving his Amendment he was actuated by no feelings of factious opposition. It was true that he had, on more than one occasion, in that House, expressed the opinion that, so far from requiring more legislation, the Merchant Marine suffered from an excess of Parliamentary and Departmental supervision; but he frankly admitted that it was impossible for the Government, on the Report of the Commission on Unseaworthy Ships, not to endeavour to carry out its suggestions; and if his objections to the Bill were confined simply to its provisions, it was probable he would not have troubled the House at this stage, but would have endeavoured to alter clauses in Committee. The right hon. Gentleman, in his opening remarks, expressed the feeling of responsibility which he, as head of the Board of Trade, entertained in introducing this important Bill. He (Mr. Norwood) trusted the House would allow him, an humble Member of the House, to say that he participated, in some degree, in that feeling of responsibility. He felt that, on the present occasion, the House had a right to expect from a practical shipowner a candid expression of his views upon the main questions involved in the Bill; and he would therefore endeavour to divest from his mind the thought that he was speaking on behalf of any class of his constituents, and recollect above everything the great national importance the measure assumed. The right hon. Gentleman entered at some length into the details of the Bill. He deprecated too close an examination of those details, because he said the proper time to consider them was in Committee; but when he informed the House that it was his desire to commit the Bill, after the second reading, in order that he might reprint it with Amendments, he (Mr. Norwood) thought it was reasonable that those who had suggestions to make should have an opportunity of doing so, and he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would think it desirable to accept some of them. The Bill was virtually built upon the Report of the Commission on Unseaworthy Ships, and as that was his first opportunity of addressing the House on the matter since the reception of the Report, he thought it only right that he should pay a tribute of gratitude on behalf of the shipping interest to those who sat on the Commission. They conducted their investigations during two Sessions. A more laborious, and a more independent Commission never sat, and their Report contained a complete analysis of the matters brought before them. When hon. Members examined the Bill of the right hon. Gentleman, they would be scarcely surprised that he (Mr. Norwood) was somewhat disappointed with its contents. He did not think the drafting of the clauses had been so well considered as it ought to have been; and he saw in it too much of the hand of the lawyer—perhaps, he might say the criminal lawyer. There was a part of the Bill he could not agree with, though it followed the recommendations of the Commission. He alluded to the preremptory abolition of advances to sailors. He admitted that some evils did arise from the abuse of them; but, as a practical man, he doubted whether it was possible, in the present condition of their seamen, at once to do away with those advances. It was a growing custom in the Baltic and other short trades for seamen to supply themselves with provisions. Now they were not a class possessing capital. Their earnings were small and precarious, and he doubted their being able to lay in a stock of provisions without obtaining an advance. As to giving a captain the power to deduct a portion of a man's wages for provisions or clothing, in course of time it would degenerate into "Truck." It was impossible to do without advances in foreign ports. The desertion of British seamen from their ships in ports where wages were high, was such that many ships were almost denuded of sailors. The only way to obtain men was to make a considerable offer in the way of advances. The advance given in British ports, he thought might be limited to a certain sum. He ventured to suggest £1; but he was of opinion that there should be no limit at all to the right of giving advances in foreign ports. The discipline clauses, from 9 to 24 of the Bill, were practically re-enacting clauses, which the Schedule repealed. They were the original clauses in the Act of 1854, though in one or two instances offences were enlarged and punishments were increased. He gave the right hon. Gentleman credit for his intention; but, as a shipowner he objected to meddling with those discipline clauses. They had caused irritation to the sailor, and, as a practical man, he should have been quite content to have had recourse, as he could now, to the clauses of the Act of 1854. One objection to the Bill was that it was too much a Bill of Pains and Penalties. It contained too much in the shape of coercion, and too little in the shape of encouragement. The next important clause he would refer to was the one with reference to training ships. He was much disappointed with that clause. He thought the shortcoming of the Bill was, that the Government had not sufficiently considered the recommendations of the Commission with reference to the necessity of some steps being taken to secure properly qualified seamen. The Government proposed to take from the Mercantile Marine Fund a certain sum for the education of boys. The surplus on that Fund was entirely derived from light dues, and it was not right that they should take what was contributed to, and belonged to a certain extent, to foreigners for a purely national object. Only three years ago a great reduction was made in light dues from those profits, amounting to about £80,000, to the relief of shipping. He was one of those who went so far as to say that it was the duty of a great country like England to light its own coast, and that light dues ought not to be charged on merchant ships. The Royal Navy and yachts paid no light dues, nor did foreign ships sailing round our coast, but which did not enter into any of the English ports. He objected then—distinctly and emphatically—to the proposal to divert this surplus from its legitimate application to the reduction of light dues, but he objected further to the inadequate nature of the proposal. The surplus of the Fund last year was only £22,000, and if £15 was allowed for each boy, as suggested, there could only be 1,200 boys assisted; as they required 2 years' training they would only get 700 or 800 each year. There was another branch of the Bill which would require a considerable amount of attention when they got into Committee, and that was the proposed change in inquiries into Wrecks and Casualties. He was willing to admit that the proposal of the Government was a decided improvement upon the present law, which was certainly in a most unsatisfactory condition. He did not, however, intend now to go into the details of the subject, because he trusted that the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade (Sir Charles Adderley) would see his way to accepting the Amendments which would be placed on the Table of the House. The right hon. Gentleman had withdrawn the unlimited liability clause. He was exceedingly glad to find that he had done so, and as it had now disappeared from the Bill, he need say nothing about it, further than to remark that the Government raised much opposition and had given much trouble and anxiety to shipowners by its introduction. The right hon. Gentleman had made an important statement with reference to the load-line, and so far as regarded the general principle laid down he fully agreed with him; for he contended that it would be dangerous to relieve shipowners, to any considerable extent, from the responsibility of managing their own affairs. But the argument would be stronger if there were less Departmental and Government interference than at present. The wonder was, that the Mercantile Marine of this country had assumed such large proportions under the burden of 10 or 12 statutes containing some 1,300 clauses. The proposal of the right hon. Gentleman was one which he could not object to, inasmuch as it was very similar to that embodied in his (Mr. Norwood's) own Bill and Amendments. The line should be placed in the first instance by the owner himself, who ought to be the best judge of the capabilities of his ship, and its principal object should be to remove the complaint that under the present system the seamen had no opportunity of knowing beforehand the extent to which the loader intended to immerse the ship. He intended the load-line to be a notice that to that extent and no further, the owners claimed the right of loading the ship; and if the ship should be immersed beyond it, from that moment the seamen's liability to serve should cease, and his articles should be discharged. If the Government adopted that suggestion they would require few surveyors at the outports to enforce the law, for the seamen themselves would look well after it. He objected to the Government undertaking a general survey of ships. They were not dealing with the mercantile value of ships, but the saving of life at sea. The classification of ships was no guarantee for security of life, for it was possible that the oldest collier in the Tyne might be more seaworthy than the most costly-built ship. For a ship might be surveyed and passed to-day, and she might be unseaworthy to-morrow. The principle of classification and survey ought to be rejected by the Government. If it was adopted, the public at large would be depending upon a broken reed. He now came to his chief objection to the Bill—on which he based his Amendment—that it virtually ignored the recommendations of the Royal Commission for improving the condition of our seamen and ensuring an adequate supply of qualified men. That was a subject of national importance, for it was admitted on all sides that our seamen were deteriorating, and their condition becoming more and more unsatisfactory. The Commissioners, in the opening paragraph of their final Report, called attention to its important bearing on the loss of life at sea by pointing to the fact that a ship might possess the highest class at Lloyds, be well fitted and stowed, and yet be unseaworthy from the want of skill and care in the master and officers and of an efficient and sufficient crew. They supported that statement by a Return showing that out of 1,096 Board of Trade inquiries, excluding collisions, there were 60 casualties, involving the loss of 86 lives, arising from defect in the stowage or construction of the ship; and that in 711 casualties, 1,371 lives were lost from the neglect of the crew or the bad navigation of the masters. The magnitude of this subject would be seen from the fact that on the 31st of December, 1873, our registers contained 21,421 sailing ships and 3,662 steamers, together 5,681,963 tons of shipping, and, excluding masters, employed about 203,000 men. He did not refer to the fishermen round the coast—a class of men whose condition was satisfactory—and he trusted that the Government would look after them for the reserves. Of the above 203,000 men, he regretted to say, there were 20,591, or 11½ per cent of foreigners, and only 15,000 boys—of whom about half were apprentices—to supply the constant waste of seamen from various causes. He gladly admitted that the greater number were well conducted, hardworking men, who understood their business, but unfortunately there was a considerable residuum of inferior men, whose moral condition was very unsatisfactory. A large number of them had little experience at sea, and were, in fact, impostors, for they shipped as A.B.'s when they had not the slightest claim to the title, had gone through no apprenticeship, and had little acquaintance with the working of a ship. The causes of this evil were two-fold. One was the great expansion of our merchant shipping, and the extent to which steamers had supplanted sailing ships. The demand of late years had exceeded the supply of trained seamen, and masters were often compelled to complete their crews with almost any men that offered. It was very difficult to make good seamen on board a steamer, and space being so valuable there was little room to accommodate a number of boys; consequently steamers, as a rule, did not carry boys. There was no doubt that in physical condition a considerable proportion of our seamen were certainly not A.B.'s. Dr. Leach, the able and experienced medical officer of the port of London, informed him that disease of various kinds existed among these men to a large extent. Vessels were leaving port continually, and when they got into blue water one-third of the crew were found incompetent as A.B.'s, either from disease or want of proper knowledge, and the work was inefficiently performed. The result was loss of life at sea. He (Mr. Norwood) could adduce evidence of the most important character from Constantinople and from China to show the serious deterioration as to conduct and physique of our seamen, while the investigations of the Liverpool Committee, and the evidence before the Royal Commission were to the same effect. There was also an argument which he would address to the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Not less than £33,000 a-year, taking the average of the last few years, had been paid out of the Consolidated Fund to bring home seamen who, having been placed in hospitals abroad, were brought back at the expense of the nation, and who too often re-shipped to perform duties for which they were incompetent. The other cause of the deterioration of our seamen was the abolition of apprenticeship. In the five years, when compulsory apprenticeship existed, no less than 58,700 boys were apprenticed to the Mercantile Marine; whereas in the last five years there were only 21,370, or about one-third of that number; and it was a well-known fact that a majority of those apprentices left the service and did not remain at sea. The whole question as to the cause of the deterioration of seamen, and the means by which that evil could be remedied, lay in the fact that a good sailor could only be made by training from a boy; a man in middle life rarely made a good sailor. It was, in his opinion, impossible to revert to the system of compulsory apprenticeship; but he thought the Government might indirectly do much to encourage the carrying of boys in merchant ships, and to enforce the duty of every shipowner to bring up boys for the service. Some large steam shipowners took this view of the case. They said—"We know and care nothing about the deterioration of the men; we can obtain them by our extra pay, and we care not who suffers." That was an attitude with which he had no sympathy. He thought, therefore, that the suggestion of the Royal Commission was a good one—that if a shipowner did not choose to train boys he should pay a certain sum upon his tonnage as a contribution towards training ships and schools. Now, provided that they got a good supply of seamen by a system of training-ships and schools, and that they could induce shipowners to train boys for the sea in greater numbers, the question remained—how to keep them contented and efficient? Without doubt, one great source of discontent amongst sailors was that they had to associate on board ship with a class of men who, while receiving the same wages, were no better than, and whom he ventured to call, impostors. Nothing could be more disheartening to a respectable sailor, with a thorough knowledge of his business, than to find that on board ship he was doomed to associate with men who were physically and nautically incompetent to do their share of work. What was the meaning of A.B.? It was able-bodied. It meant not only that a man should have sufficient nautical skill, but that he should be physically able to do the work required from him on board ship; and he thought it would be well if all A.B.'s were required to produce a certificate at the time of engagement as to their nautical and physical capacity. Some hon. Members would probably object that it would tend to increase the rate of wages to able-bodied seamen; but, if they could get the article required, most shipowners would be happy to pay a higher rate of wages. If the Government would take the matter in hand in a discriminate manner, commencing with the A.B.'s, and show men that by proving themselves competent to do their work in a seamanlike manner that they would get 10s. or £1 a month extra, a great benefit would be conferred not only upon sailors but upon shipowners. No doubt a medical examination presented difficulties which would have to be surmounted by judicious arrangements, and he would suggest that a Government surgeon should inspect the men at their own houses if desired; but he believed that the moral and social position of the A.B.'s would be raised, and the effect would be to keep together a first-class body of men in their Merchant Marine. With respect to training ships, he was not satisfied with their present state. They were managed at a very considerable cost to the country. The double system of industrial school ships, and the sending of two classes of boys into them, was not satisfactory. There was no guarantee that the boys would remain in the service. Many of them did not enter the sea service, and he doubted whether one-third of those paid for by the country remained in that service. He hoped the Government would not encourage these quasi-criminal schools, but would encourage the humble and honest parents of children at our ports in preference. He considered the statement of the right hon. Gentleman opposite was, upon the whole, a satisfactory one, though he hoped to receive some assurance that the Government would grapple resolutely with that most fruitful of all causes of maritime disaster—the carelessness and incompetency of the crews. He did not look upon the present state of affairs as regarded casualties as being permanent; on the contrary, he believed they were going through a very abnormal period, and he had a strong hope and belief that before two or three years had elapsed they would find their shipping casualties very much less in number. For himself and his hon. Friends who represented seaports, he could say that they recognised their duty and protected the interests of those whom they employed. He protested against the manner in which shipowners were branded as men incapable of those proper feelings which actuated every Englishman; and he declared their sincere desire to improve the condition of those who rendered such important services to the country as our seamen, and their willingness to co-operate with the greatest cordiality with the Government to that end. He begged to move the Amendment of which he had given Notice—

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "any measure purporting to amend the Law affecting Merchant Shipping is insufficient and unsatisfactory which does contain provisions for securing a supply of properly qualified Seamen by encouraging the carrying of Apprentices on board Ships, and the establishment of Training Ships, and which does not provide for a Medical Examination of Seamen upon their engagement at a Shipping Office," — (Mr. Norwood,)

—instead thereof.

MR. T. BRASSEY said: The hon. Member for Hull (Mr. Norwood) has done well to invite the attention of the House to the supply of seamen for the merchant service. When we are assured that our seamen are declining in efficiency, it is most important to ascertain how far that opinion is supported by the facts of the case. Several witnesses before the Commission on Unseaworthy Ships spoke strongly to the deterioration of our seamen; but the most important evidence in support of this view of the case was furnished by the Committee of shipowners formed at Liverpool in 1870. This Committee not only investigated the actual condition of the merchant service, but they undertook the far more difficult task of contriving a remedy for the evils of which they complained. They suggested that seamen, before being rated as A.B., should obtain a certificate of competency; that advance notes should be declared illegal; that sailors' boarding-houses should be licensed and under inspection; that the Government should invite foreign Powers to put down the crimping system abroad; that there should be additional training ships; and that a compulsory benefit fund for seamen should be established. Turning from the dark to the brighter side of the picture, it is to be observed that shipowners are not unanimous in condemning the seamen of the present day. As a rule, the owners of steamships are satisfied with their men. There is, however, great difficulty in procuring good crews for sailing ships. Mr. Beazley, of Liverpool, whose interest in the question has never flagged, made the same complaints to the Committee of 1860 on Merchant Shipping. Then, as now, the disparaging statements made on the one side were refuted by the more favourable opinions of other witnesses. Again, we are assured that our ships are manned by foreigners. Undoubtedly many foreigners are employed under the British flag; but their number does not increase. In the year 1872, the percentage of foreigners to British seamen was 11·24; but the corresponding figure for 1864 was 12·6. The introduction of foreign seamen into the national Mercantile Marine is not confined to British ships. In the United States a large proportion of foreigners are employed, not only in private but in public vessels; although the tonnage of that country has not, like our own, been rapidly increasing. The same difficulty is experienced in Germany. Such is the scarcity of seamen on the coasts of the German Ocean and the Baltic, that ships, when ready to go to sea, are sometimes detained for weeks from the impossibility of obtaining a crew. It is said that there is a growing distaste for the sea among the population on the German sea-board, and that the desertions among the ships sailing from Bremen last year amounted to 15 per cent. In our own case, the scarcity of seamen may be explained, not so much by the abolition of apprenticeship, as by the rapid increase in the tonnage of our shipping, and, especially during the last three years, by the great augmentation in the number and size of sailing ships. There is another aspect of the case, which deserves consideration. If seamanship had decayed as much as it has been supposed, would it have been possible to make continuous reductions in the number of hands required to navigate the ships? The proportion of men to 100 tons, in sailing-ships engaged in the foreign trade, has fallen from 3·93 in 1854 to 2·70 in 1870; and this reduction has not been confined to the most modern type of vessels. I have spared no pains to acquaint myself with the facts of the case, and the many widely differing opinions which prevail on this subject; and it is my firm conviction that, on the whole, the falling off in the quality and character of our seamen is confined chiefly to the long voyage sailing ships. Assuming, however, that their proportion is not greater than it was, there can be no question as to the fact that there are a large number of foreigners employed in British ships, and that among our seamen there are tens of thousands of ill-disciplined and incompetent men. When therefore a proposal is made by the shipowners for the substitution of a system of training in special vessels for the old plan of carrying apprentices, and when, too, we have reason to believe that the State and the shipowners may advantageously work together for a common object, I maintain that it is the duty of the Government not to neglect the opportunity afforded by a happy combination of circumstances. In the view of the shipowners, the training system is now, and always has been, advocated chiefly as a means of enabling them to man their ships with less difficulty than they experience at present. It would clearly be contrary to public policy to entertain the proposal from their point of view. The supply of seamen is, after all, a question of wages, and a proposal to establish training ships at the public charge could not be sustained, if it were made solely for the purpose of enabling a privileged section of employers to obtain skilled labour at a rate below the market value. The Commission of 1859 recommended that training ships should be established solely with the object of recruiting seamen for the Naval Reserve, and their proposals for the attainment of this object were approved by the recent Commission on Unseaworthy Ships. As to the precise amount to be given in view of the service to be rendered in recruiting for the Naval Reserve, it is a question in which the Admiralty and the Board of Trade must work together. It is for the officers responsible for the naval defence of the country to determine the standard of strength at which the Naval Reserve shall be maintained. The necessary number of the Reserve having been fixed, it then remains for us to ascertain how far we may rely on the merchant service in its actual condition to supply the men we require. Considerable progress has of late been made in recruiting for the Reserve; but we are still far short of the numbers indicated in the Report of Lord Cardwell's Commission. Since the date of that Report, great events have occurred, which should tend to increase rather than to diminish our requirements for national defence. There is no reason to doubt that the Reserve would be found, in the hour of need, a valuable support to the Navy. The opinion of Sir Cooper Key, who commanded the fleet on the only occasion when a large body of these men have been embarked, the Reports of the Admirals who have annually inspected the force, the opinions of those who have been recently in command of the drill-ships—I would specially refer to the Paper recently read by Commander Brent—all tend to establish a favourable impression of the value of this force. Up to this point we have been able to show that an almost unbroken unanimity of opinion exists in favour of the training system; but the same unanimity is no longer to be found when we come to consider the best means of providing the funds required for carrying out the plan. Certain it is that if shipowners desire that a large number of boys should be trained, in excess of the requirements of the Naval Reserve, they must bear their share of the expense. Proposals for granting money from the public funds towards the maintenance of training ships have recently been approved by the Congress of the United States. American shipowners have experienced the same difficulty that we have encountered in obtaining seamen. A recent Act of the Legislature of New York has authorized the Board of Education of that city to maintain a nautical school, to be conducted under the supervision of the Chamber of Commerce; and, under an Act of Congress of June, 1874, authority has been given for the use of certain national vessels for training purposes, and officers are to be supplied by the Navy to act as superintendents in these school ships. There is a special provision that no person shall be received at such schools as a punishment for crime. The discipline and routine of the Navy are to be observed as far as practicable. The boys are to be trained for a period varying from 18 months to two years, and they are to be awarded certificates of rating and general character, or leaving the training ship. Having made one voyage, boys desirous of continuing their studies in navigation, so as to qualify themselves as mates or captains, can be again received on board the school ships. Under this Act the Navy Department has fitted out for the State of New York a vessel of the United States Navy, and it is intended to establish similar vessels at Boston, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Norfolk, and San Francisco. While I trust that the Government will yield to the force of argument and to the seductive influence of a good example, by giving their cordial approval to our propositions, I am well aware that it is in vain to expect, by any plans for their improvement, that we can overcome entirely the force of the adverse circumstances under which our seamen, from the nature of their calling, are compelled to live. The sailor boy must quit his home at a tender age, and must pass his youth amid the temptations to be found in every seaport. How much, of whatever there is of good, in human nature—frail it must be at the best—is derived from home influences.

In proportion as we value these blessings for ourselves, we shall sympathize with the sailor in his moral and social privations, and rejoice that among his class there are to be found so many who have escaped the contaminating influences to which they are exposed. No provision seems to have been made in the Government plan for a seaman's pension fund. I presume, therefore, that it is intended that seamen belonging to the Naval Reserve shall alone become eligible for pensions. Unless there be some tie to bind the British seaman to his native country, it is idle to incur expenditure in training up lads for the sea. Two conditions are necessary to prevent desertion. First, the wages must be adequate; and this is a shipowners' question. Secondly, we must establish, in accordance with the recommendation of the Manning Committee of 1860, a voluntary, self-supporting pension fund for seamen, under the encouragement of the Board of Trade.

LORD ESLINGTON apprehended that the Amendment was intended to be rather in the nature of a "rider" to the Bill, than as anything of a hostile character. The spirit in which the measure dealt with the question of the training of seaman was right; but the method in which it dealt with it was extremely inadequate for the purpose. The Amendment might, however, have taken the form of an Instruction to the Committee, and with this advantage—that the Government would have been left free in their course of action; and no one, at least on that side of the House, wished to hamper the Government in this matter. There was one great fact that should be carefully borne in mind in those discussions, which, though they might not promise at that moment to be very animated, would be considerably prolonged. That great fact was the state of public feeling on that question. Whenever the account of a shipwreck reached this country the heart of the nation was very much stirred, and it was only natural, when feeling and sentiment entered into such a matter, that a certain amount of exaggeration should arise, and with it, also, no small amount of misconception as to the cause of the disaster. Due respect must be paid to that feeling, which they admired, because it originated in the natural impulses of men. But, further, they must be prepared to sacrifice some opinions, possibly of long standing, in deference to that state of public feeling, provided, of course, they did not allow that sacrifice to go beyond the limits which reason and common sense assigned to it. The shipowners of this country had lately shown that they were prepared to make some concession to the state of public feeling on that subject, and great credit was due to them for the action they had taken in that respect. He was very sorry that the means did not exist for bringing to the actual test of fact the amount of loss sustained at sea, because the older records of such casualties were so imperfectly kept that it was impossible to apply to them the only true test—namely, the relation and proportion they bore to the amount of tonnage at present employed; to the number of persons at any one time on the sea; and to the number of voyages the ships made, which were now, of course, largely increased by the substitution of steam power for sails. But the public were apt to be carried away by the bare statement of the loss of life, which, however painful in itself, was, in a national point of view, a very uncertain guide indeed. They were prone to forget the vast increase of our commerce, and the unconquerable nature of the elements in the face of which it was carried on. They would presently have to consider the question of classed and unclassed ships, as to which the figures were very instructive, and also consolatory to some extent. An analysis of loss of life by shipwrecks in the six years from 1867 to 1872 showed that the whole number of lives lost was 12,048, or about 2,000 per annum; and of that entire number 6,105 were lost in classed ships, while 5,943 were lost in unclassified ships. That was a curious state of things, when it was said it would be a great preventive of loss of life at sea to have a compulsory classification of ships. With regard to our coasting trade, the Returns were so accurate, that the calculation of the loss of life could be made to a nicety. In 1856 the tonnage entered and cleared in the United Kingdom was 10,970,000 tons; and in 1872 it was 25,714,270. In 1856 the number of lives imperilled on the coast of the United Kingdom was 2,764. The lives saved were 2,243, and the lives lost were 521. In 1872, when their tonnage had increased by 15,000,000 of tons, the number of lives imperilled upon their coast was 5,224. The number of lives saved was 4,634, and the number of lives lost was 590; so that only 69 lives were lost more than in 1856, though the tonnage had increased by 15,000,000 of tons. He did not quote these figures as a reason why they should not take every possible precaution to save life at sea, because that noble institution the Life Boat Association, played a mighty part in the saving of life, and no praise which the House of Commons could bestow upon that institution was too high for its noble and successful efforts, but to show that on our coasts at least loss of life did not increase largely with the increase of trade. In seeking to guard by every possible means against loss of life, there were two distinct policies which presented themselves. One was, in effect, to put the shipowner's business in commission. It said—"We will fix his load-line, we will insist upon compulsory classification, we will certify the iron which he uses in building his ship." This was a policy which weak men and some careless men would gladly embrace, for it would relieve them from a responsibility which rendered them timid, and which, indeed, was more than some minds could bear. But strong men, who were conscious of a capacity to transact their own business, would reject that policy, and the result of its adoption would be to drive many of the most competent shipowners to other pursuits. Moreover, it was not a policy which was likely to serve the object they had in view—namely, the saving of life and property at sea. The second policy—and it was that of the present Bill—was to leave the shipowner free to build his ship, to equip his ship, to stow his ship, and to send her to sea as he pleased, subject to the condition that he must send her to sea in a seaworthy condition, and that heavy penalties would be incurred when this requirement was infringed. This was an intelligible policy and was an honest endeavour to carry out the recommendations of the Royal Commission. That Commission and its Report had met with a good deal of criticism, particularly at the hands of the hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. MacIver), who objected to the constitution of the Commission and asserted that its Members were so constituted, and had adopted such a course, that they could find out very little. He said they had found out very little; but it was wonderful they had found out anything at all. One thing, however, they had found out and promulgated—namely, that it was a very unwise course to hamper British shipping with unnecessary trammels, and that was a considerable discovery, if judged by past experience.

In 1849, when the Navigation Laws were repealed, the shipowners went to Mr. Labouchere, who was then at the head of the Board of Trade, and said—"If you sweep away these laws, you must improve the condition of the seamen." The Board of Trade was struck by the force of their statement, and the result was that in the great commercial Code of 1854 there were many provisions passed bearing on the welfare of seamen. But it was not foreseen that by establishing shipping offices under the superintendence of representatives of the Board of Trade a great doubt would be created in the seaman's mind as to whose servant he really was. He was led to feel that he owed a kind of double allegiance, and this fact had a very material bearing on the question of the deterioration of the class, for the result of that legislation had been extremely prejudicial to the maintenance of discipline on board ship. The Royal Commission not only found out the inefficacy of the past policy, but ascertained also that if good seamen were wanted they must be trained. It was strange that a Royal Commission should be required to teach Parliament that self-evident fact. He should have thought the experience of the Royal Navy was sufficient to have told Parliament that if they wished to have good seamen they must train them. They might build the best ships, stow them in the best manner, and have them owned by the best of men, but unless they were sent to sea with seaworthy crews all their efforts would be in vain. The discipline clauses of this Bill, which were very severe, were re-enactments of the existing law with increased penalties, but that law had been a considerable failure as regarded the improvement of seamen, and he would ask the House to consider whether, if they imposed heavy penalties and treated seamen with severity, they were not in duty bound to listen to seamen's grievances when presented to them, with the view of applying a remedy. The inevitable effect of harassing legislation would be to drive our ships under foreign flags. He once remarked that it was a dangerous thing to encourage foreign competition, and he was told that British workmen were not afraid of it. The surveys carried on under the Act of 1873 had been in some cases irritating, oppressive, and very expensive. He should like to know from his right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade why the cost of surveys carried out by the Board of Trade should be treble, quadruple, and sometimes five times as much as surveys conducted by Lloyd's? He would not mention the names of ships, though he would give them privately to his right hon. Friend; but in one case, while a Lloyd's survey cost £3 15s., a Board of Trade cost £16 12s.; and in another case, while a Lloyd's survey cost £4 5s., a Board of Trade cost £12 19s. The fact had been communicated to him from a small port which he represented, that since the passing of the Act of 1873, 9 per cent of its shipping had been transferred to foreign flags, and 150 of its best seamen had gone to work in mines and manufacturing. He quoted that fact as a warning against harassing legislation. A third discovery was made by the Royal Commission. They ascertained that the Board of Trade, as at present constituted, was—he would not use so strong a term as incompetent—but utterly inadequate for the performance of the duties which Parliament imposed upon it. He was disappointed that, when they were going to legislate anew, a reconstruction and strengthening of the Board of Trade did not precede this new legislation. Would it be believed that, up to a few weeks ago, this public Department, charged with the supervision of the two mightiest interests in the world—the railway and the shipping interests of this country—notwithstanding the mass of legislation it had to administer and watch, was compelled to beg, borrow, or steal legal advice from the Department of the Customs whenever it required it? His right hon. Friend had now supplied that defect, and for the first time in the history of the Board they had got a legal adviser of their own. He (Lord Eslington) said, without fear of contradiction, that the position of his right hon. Friend was not a proper one. He said distinctly that the President of the Board of Trade, charged with the supervision of these gigantic interests, ought to be a member of the Cabinet. He could not bring forward his measures or command the time and attention of Parliament with that authority which he ought to do, unless he was a member of the Cabinet. He ought to fill a higher position than that of being occasionally examined as a witness before the Cabinet. We had got into the extraordinary habit of passing a Merchant Shipping Bill once a year. The great Code of 1854 imposed enormous duties on the Board of Trade in relation to lights, signals, compasses, pumps, and other matters, and the Act of 1873 gave it power to inspect a ship's machinery. It was remarkable that in the matter of coloured lights science had not produced a light which came up to the standard required by the Board of Trade. Recently a shipowner ordered the most improved boilers, of economic construction, from a most eminent firm, and the pressure was to be 70 lbs to the square inch. The Board of Trade Surveyor at first refused to pass them at a greater pressure than 48; after three months correspondence he rose to 60, and finally he rose to 70; but supposing the owners had been wanting in pluck they would have agreed to 48; they would then have lost a third of their motive power, and they would have navigated the ship at a greatly increased cost. He had said that the shipowners had shown of late a praiseworthy spirit of concession and compromise in this matter. They had many of them sacrificed a long-entertained opinion against a load-line. He confessed he did not like a load-line, because when once established there would always be a disposition in the charterer to insist on the ship being loaded to that line, whatever the nature of the weather, the cargo, or the circumstances of the voyage. Moreover, the establishment of a load-line necessarily tended to lessen the responsibility of the shipowner. The idea of a fixed load-line applicable to all ships was utterly absurd; but to fix a load-line with the consent of the builder, the owner, and a competent surveyor of the Board of Trade was in the nature of a compromise that had been thought of, and a good deal might be said in its favour. He entirely disagreed with his hon. Friend the Member for Hull (Mr. Norwood) as to the abolition of advance notes. It was abroad their effect was most injurious. If wages were high in the port at which the ship arrived, there was a tendency in the seamen to desert to get higher wages, and with these higher wages the advance note immediately got into the hands of the crimp. If, on the other hand, wages were low, some captains would rather connive at desertion, so that they might ship their men at easier rates. The advance note abroad was a direct stimulus to desertion. On the abolition of the advance note the opinion of the Commissioners was unanimous, and he was glad to see that that recommendation was adopted by his right hon. Friend. The Government Bill presented a sound basis, and the present moment was very favourable for legislation on the subject. His right hon. Friend had mastered the subject; he had not shown great pertinacity in sticking to his own ideas, but had acquainted himself with the opinions of the shipowners; and perhaps he would have done still better if he had taken them into his counsels somewhat earlier. In conclusion, he would remind the House that the eyes of the maritime nations of the world were at this moment fixed upon what England would do in this matter. Foreign nations had no jealousy on such a subject, but would gladly follow in our wake, if the House should be able to frame a sound working measure, which would combine the utmost security to life with the minimum of interference with the conduct of shipping and mercantile enterprise.

MR. A. PEEL said, he was during 1872-73 Secretary to the Board of Trade, and he mentioned that fact because it was during that period that the hon. Member for Derby (Mr. Plimsoll) commenced his agitation, wrote his book, and enlisted his services in the cause of the merchant seamen of this country. He was able to say with some authority what was the amount of influence the hon. Member exercised upon the legislation of the country. He was willing freely to admit the services that the hon. Member rendered to the cause of the merchant seamen, and that he was actuated by disinterested motives on their behalf; and if the hon. Member did not wake up the Department—which he (Mr. Peel) should be sorry to admit he did—he supplied that stimulus of outside feeling which was necessary to enable the Department to carry out the measures they were resolved upon. Without that feeling among the public outside, the legislation of that period would in the then state of the House of Commons have been impossible. The noble Lord (Lord Easington) had alluded with some feeling to the plethora of legislation on the subject of the Mercantile Marine. He quite agreed with the noble Lord. He trusted that the Bill would be read a second time, and that it would be the means, not, perhaps, of finally settling the matter, but, at all events, of securing stability of legislation for some years to come to an interest that had been too much harassed by constantly recurring schemes of amendment of the law. His first impression was that the Bill bristled with penalties, and that although it was to a considerable extent a mere reproduction of existing legislation, yet that where it proposed to amend the existing law, it did so in the direction of increased stringency. He doubted whether it was good policy to introduce new penal clauses of such stringency. The existing provisions directed against the same offences were not carried out, and if the penalties were increased there would be no guarantee that they would touch the offenders. By the Bill mutiny at sea was made a penal offence, and it was also penal for a seaman to be found asleep at his post. Under the existing law, however, a seaman could be proceeded against penally, who by his neglect directly affected the life and safety of those on board his ship. He did not know whether the new Bill would be more efficacious than the present law. The Bill also made the shipowners liable in response to the public feeling that life was unsafe at sea, and that it might be made more safe if penalties were attached to offences which the law could not now punish. The existing law, however, made shipowners liable for acts of negligence leading to loss of life at sea. He was glad that the right hon. Gentleman had modified the stringency of the clause as it originally stood.

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY said, that the liability of the owner was not increased, but he was made liable for the act of his agent.

MR. A. PEEL said, that however that might be, a seaman who neglected to keep a proper look-out was punishable at present; but the instances were so rare that one of the witnesses before the Royal Commission said he did not remember a single case of prosecution for this offence. What was the use, therefore, of increasing the penalties when not a single man had been brought to punishment for breach of the present law? At the same time, should like to know from his right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade why the cost of surveys carried out by the Board of Trade should be treble, quadruple, and sometimes five times as much as surveys conducted by Lloyd's? He would not mention the names of ships, though he would give them privately to his right hon. Friend; but in one case, while a Lloyd's survey cost £3 15s., a Board of Trade cost £16 12s.; and in another case, while a Lloyd's survey cost £4 5s., a Board of Trade cost £12 19s. The fact had been communicated to him from a small port which he represented, that since the passing of the Act of 1873, 9 per cent of its shipping had been transferred to foreign flags, and 150 of its best seamen had gone to work in mines and manufacturing. He quoted that fact as a warning against harassing legislation. A third discovery was made by the Royal Commission. They ascertained that the Board of Trade, as at present constituted, was—he would not use so strong a term as incompetent—but utterly inadequate for the performance of the duties which Parliament imposed upon it. He was disappointed that, when they were going to legislate anew, a re-constitution and strengthening of the Board of Trade did not precede this new legislation. Would it be believed that, up to a few weeks ago, this public Department, charged with the supervision of the two mightiest interests in the world—the railway and the shipping interests of this country—notwithstanding the mass of legislation it had to administer and watch, was compelled to beg, borrow, or steal legal advice from the Department of the Customs whenever it required it? His right hon. Friend had now supplied that defect, and for the first time in the history of the Board they had got a legal adviser of their own. He (Lord Eslington) said, without fear of contradiction, that the position of his right hon. Friend was not a proper one. He said distinctly that the President of the Board of Trade, charged with the supervision of these gigantic interests, ought to be a member of the Cabinet. He could not bring forward his measures or command the time and attention of Parliament with that authority which he ought to do, unless he was a member of the Cabinet. He ought to fill a higher position than that of being occasionally examined as a witness before the Cabinet. We had got into the extraordinary habit of passing a Merchant Shipping Bill once a year. MR. A. PEEL said, that however that might be, a seaman who neglected to keep a proper look-out was punishable at present; but the instances were so rare that one of the witnesses before the Royal Commission said he did not remember a single case of prosecution for this offence. What was the use, therefore, of increasing the penalties when not a single man had been brought to punishment for breach of the present law? At the same time, he fully agreed that a man who slept at his post was deserving of punishment. For his own part, he congratulated the Government upon what the Bill did not contain, quite as much as for what it did contain. A great deal of courage and determination had been shown by the Board of Trade in resisting the attempts made to introduce two things which he thought would be fatal to the Mercantile Marine, and those were compulsory survey and a compulsory load-line. The policy of a compulsory survey had been completely exploded by the evidence furnished before the Royal Commission. The result would be to reduce the responsibility of the survey to five or six public bodies or private companies, and finally to reduce the responsibility to a single head, which the Board of Trade would eventually cut off, and thus simplify the process of arriving at a Government survey. As to the load-line, it varied according to half-a-dozen different data, or even more. It could not possibly be fixed, and it must be variable according to a great many different conditions. He was certain that the Board of Trade would not attempt to make a compulsory load-line. What the right hon. Gentleman proposed amounted to this—that a shipowner, before clearance, was to state the maximum figure beyond which he did not intend to load, and he might, but was not compelled to, send notice to the Board of Trade, and if they did not object the Board of Trade would not be afterwards competent to stop the vessel on the ground that it was overladen. [Sir CHARLES ADDERLEY: That it is laden above that line.] He (Mr. Peel) saw a very serious danger in this clause—namely, the germ of Government inspection and supervision in the matter of load-line, as in the case of an universal survey. The shipowner was to fix the line, and might send it to the Board of Trade. But suppose he did not send it? There would then be two sets of ships, one having a Government guarantee by having a load-line, sanctioned by the Government authorities, and the other vessels sailing comparatively at their own risk. The latter class, however, would naturally like to have some kind of Government guarantee of their condition, and hence he was afraid of drifting into a system in which the Government might attempt to fix the load-line, but under such various conditions that they would often “make the word of promise to the ear, and break it to the hope.” There remained the still more grievous danger of where to stow the cargo, and where the centre of gravity should be. He confessed he should like to have some further guarantee that this load-line would not be supervised or supplemented by the Government, but that the shipowner would be left to fix it on his own responsibility, and that the Government should not be called upon to guarantee the load-line or to free the shipowner from his proper responsibility. The course he had taken with respect to that Bill was based upon a thorough conviction of the fact that there were two lines of policy distinctly before the House, and that the House was now called upon at this crisis of Mercantile Marine legislation to decide definitely between them. The two lines were not parallel, but divergent. One was the policy adopted by the Board of Trade in 1871, further acted upon in 1873, and now supplemented by the Bill of the present year. The other was the policy advocated by the hon. Member for Derby. The House must make up its mind as to which course it would follow. The hon. Member in his speeches had alluded to the questions of survey and load-line; but under which of the surveys the hon. Gentleman had advocated were they to live for the future? The hon. Gentleman had constantly changed his ground as to the load-line he should adopt. In one of his speeches the hon. Gentleman said that the policy he had recommended, and which was carried out by the Board of Trade, had already borne its fruits; that less lives were lost, and that the number of grossly overladen ships sent to sea had diminished. It appeared from a Return to the Board of Trade that in the five months ending the 30th of September last, the number of vessels reported as defective in hull, machinery, or equipment was 118, of which 101 were found to be unseaworthy. On the other hand, the cases of overloading were few, amounting in all to 10. These were proofs that the policy inaugurated in 1871, carried further in 1873, and now sought to be extended, had worked well, and that they ought not to be asked to retrace their steps. Even if that policy was supposed not to be effecting the amount of good that was expected of it, it was too soon to say that it had failed. He thought that the Government had taken the best course in abolishing the system of advance notes. There would be difficulties, no doubt, but they would right themselves; and, at any rate, the evils arising from the crimp system would receive their death-blow. As to apprentices, there could be no guarantee that when they had entered the service they would remain in it, for the rate of pay was small as compared with what they could earn in other occupations. He contended that though they could not adopt any particular load-line, yet it must be the wish of all to guard seamen against all unnecessary perils; but, on the other hand, there was no desire to make martyrs of ship-owners by constantly harassing them by legislation year after year. He had no desire whatever to shield the few guilty shipowners from the consequences of their malpractices; but he warned the House against embarking in the policy recommended by the hon. Member for Derby, which, though it was prompted by the best, the purest, and the most disinterested motives, might, if carried out, cripple and strait-waistcoat the Mercantile Marine of the country, and stand in the way of that which was an essential condition of its well-being and success—namely free and unshackled action and enterprize.

MR. BENTINCK most cordially endorsed the views of the hon. Member for Hull (Mr. Norwood). He did not think there was anything in the Amendment that was antagonistic to the principle of the Bill; and, should the hon. Member be driven to a division, he would vote for his Amendment; but he trusted that his right hon. Friend (Sir Charles Adderley) would suggest a course which would obviate the necessity of a division. The question before the House involved the actual commercial supremacy, and therefore the very existence of this country, and went much further than any consideration of the well-doing or otherwise of one of our great branches of commercial enterprize. No Government or Board of Admiralty would think of entering upon a great European war unless the Mercantile Marine of this country was in a sound and prosperous state. In his opinion, the whole tendency of recent legislation, since the repeal of the Navigation Laws, had been antagonistic to the well-being of our commercial and Mercantile Marine. Without entering into the question of the expediency of the Navigation Laws, he asserted that to them was to be attributed not only the welfare of our Mercantile Marine, but the great maritime supremacy of this country for centuries, and when they were repealed a blow was dealt to that service which inflicted injuries upon it that it was high time should be remedied. Turning to the Bill as it now stood, he felt bound to state that in consequence of what he had learnt from the highest authorities on the subject, he had altered his opinion with regard to the policy of advance notes. Although the principle of advance notes was indefensible in theory, they were indispensable in practice, because it was found that without them it would be impossible to man our mercantile Navy. He would suggest that by extending the time for the payment of the advance notes until the man who received them had rendered service for the period for which they were given, the inconvenience arising from this most objectionable practice might be somewhat diminished. It was absolutely necessary, seeing how greatly the present law had been abused, although, perhaps, only in a limited number of cases, and in view of the strong public feeling that existed on the subject, that the question of the load-line must be dealt with, and less inconvenience would result from it by requiring a definite load-line to be marked upon the outside of the ship than by leaving the matter to be determined according to the caprice of the surveyors of the Board of Trade. Steps should also be taken to ensure greater discipline in the Merchant Service, which recent legislation had tended greatly to relax, while there was a tendency on the part of the magistrates to view the misdoings of sailors with a degree of leniency that was altogether fatal to discipline in the Mercantile Marine. There was no greater cause of loss of life at sea than want of discipline, and it was not right that the man by whose negligence on the watch a ship was run into and lost with all hands should be punished merely as though he had committed some trifling fault. The Bill contained some serious omissions. He had heard with great pleasure from his right hon. Friend (Sir Charles Adderley) that one of the great objects of the Bill was to diminish the risk of loss of life at sea; but in this Bill all reference to some of the more important and paramount causes of loss of life at sea had been omitted. They had heard a great deal about bad ships. No doubt, bad ships led to a great loss of life; but he believed that the number of lives lost in ships badly built and not fit to send to sea was infinitesimally small compared with the loss of life arising from other causes, among which none was greater than bad manning of ships. A bad crew would lose the finest ship that ever went out of harbour. The Bill entirely omitted the subject of the manning of ships. Some means should be provided to secure a proper manning of our merchant ships. At present men who did not know the commonest duties of seamen presented themselves to be engaged as A. B.'s. Our merchant ships were not over-manned, and if out of a small ship's company one or two hands were black sheep, that ship's company was inefficient. An act of one of those black sheep might lose the ship. Frequently after a ship had left port the master found that one-half of his men were drunk and the other half incompetent. Could we wonder at the many casualties at sea? We gave no security whatever to the owner or master of a vessel as to the character or qualifications of the men whom he shipped. In a Bill of this kind, having for its object to decrease risk, should not one of the first things to be dealt with be the furnishing of some guide to the owners and masters of merchant vessels as to the class of men whom they were shipping? Nobody would believe the sort of rubbish that was picked up to serve as seamen. Many of them did not know the meaning of "starboard" from "port," and could not be trusted at the helm. If they were sent to the helm before their competency was tested, the result might be the loss of the ship with all hands. He trusted his right hon. Friend would lend a favourable ear to any suggestion that might be made to enable those who were charged with the selection of men to ascertain their qualifications. There was another question of still greater importance. One of the most prolific causes of the loss of life was the present state and condition of what was called the "rule of the road at sea;" but its proper designation would be the misrule of the road. The best proof that he was not vilifying the regulations known as the rule of the road was that all the most important countries in Europe had in various shapes addressed the Government to induce them to alter the rule of road at sea, but no impression was made on the Government. His right hon. Friend could not escape dealing with the question without incurring the responsibility of the loss of life which might hereafter occur. There was another question which had been entirely ignored, and perhaps it was the most important one of all. He would ask hon. Gentlemen who were conversant with the subject whether one of the great causes of the loss of countless iron steamers at sea without apparent cause was the disproportion of the length to the beam of those vessels, which rendered them unmanageable in bad weather? One of the first objects to which the attention of his right hon. Friend ought to be directed was the mode of measurement. He appealed to his right hon. Friend not to be afraid of dealing with the whole of the details of this great question, which affected not only the property of a large and wealthy portion of the community, but even the very existence of a maritime country, as well as the saving of life. Unless he dealt with these matters in a broader spirit, he would fail in the objects which he was so desirous of attaining.

MR. PLIMSOLL said that, feeling ill, and being desirous to proceed home, he would only make a few remarks. He did not oppose the second reading of the Bill; on the contrary, he should be glad to have it read a second time. The President of the Board of Trade said he introduced it in the hope that the Board of Trade would assist him to make it what it ought to be; and he hoped that the Bill would be improved by Amendments he desired to propose in Committee. He wished to introduce three things and to get rid of two. The three things he wanted were—first, a compulsory survey of all unclassified ships; secondly, the establishment of a maximum load-line; and thirdly, the adoption of a test for the quality of iron to be used in the building of future ships. The two things he wanted to get rid of were deck-loading, except under special limitations, and the practice of carrying grain cargoes in bulk. The survey he asked the House to enact was a survey by either

Lloyd's or the Liverpool Board. The right hon. Gentleman objected to recognizing private associations, and pointed out several which might claim to be included; but, for himself, he proposed to recognize only the two he had named. The hon. Member for Warwick (Mr. A. Peel) said, that private clubs would seek to be included, but private clubs did not class ships. There would be no difficulty on the score of precedent in recognizing the two associations he named, because Parliament had already recognized private societies in relation to ships. For instance, chain cables and anchors were tested by such societies and firms as might be licensed by the Board of Trade to do that work, and what he proposed was merely an extension of that principle. He need not go outside the Bill for a case in point, because the Bill proposed that the Board of Trade might licence such persons as it might deem qualified to examine and test ship's compasses. It was said, to recognize a survey by either of the two societies he had named would be to destroy the responsibility of shipowners. He did not think their responsibility at present amounted to much; he had never heard that anybody but the Quins and somebody at Waterford was ever made responsible. Be that as it may, responsibility would not be destroyed, because two-thirds of the ships now afloat in the Mercantile Marine were already surveyed by these societies, and to include the other third would clearly be to place them in the same position as the two-thirds that were surveyed. Nobody denied that the owners were responsible because the ships were classified, or alleged that the owners were harassed on that account. The survey he proposed would reach the unclassified ships, and would include a great number of very good ships and a greater number of very bad ships. To meet the case of the good ships he would propose to give the Board of Trade power to exclude from the operation of the Act such classes as they might deem fit; so that it did not seem to him that any other ships would be meddled with than those which stood in need of interference. One of the Appendices to the Report of the Royal Commission gave a list of 104 in various stages of decay, and that list indicated the class of ship that would come under the operation of a clause like this. The need of such a survey would not be disputed by anyone who reflected on the fact that, under the very imperfect Acts of 1871 and 1873, 440 ships had been stopped and surveyed, and only 16 were found fit to go to sea. He did not suppose the House would be content to reduce this inspection; we must assume that the practice would remain as it was, unless, indeed, we improved it. Suppose it remained, what became of the objection that it was difficult to say suddenly that a vessel was unseaworthy? He said so, too; and that being so, we had better hand the work over to persons who were specially qualified, to do it, and give notice that at regular intervals, the work would be done deliberately and carefully, instead of leaving the question to be decided in an emergency on the judgment of an officer of the Board of Trade. Admitting the difficulty of the case, was not his mode of dealing with it far more rational than that of the right hon. Gentleman? He was glad to see to-day that the London Shipowners Association had withdrawn their opposition, and had agreed that when ships had passed through all the classes at Lloyd's and were no longer fit to be classed, it was high time somebody looked after them. The difficulties in the way of adopting a load-line were not insuperable. If a competent Board composed of the best men to be found were empowered to survey all ships separately and ascertain for each what would be a proper maximum load-line, they would take into consideration her age, the material of which she was built, her strength, any peculiarity of dimensions, whether she had full lines or fine lines, and whether she had any deck structures, an awning deck, or a spar deck; all these circumstances would be taken into account by a commission of the best practical men who could be found, and they would then determine the maximum load-line under favourable circumstances. Outside the conditions named there would be only three disturbing considerations, which would be the season of the year, the nature of the cargo, and the nature of the voyage. For instance, a winter voyage across the Bay of Biscay with a cargo of pig iron would be very different from a summer voyage across the North Sea with a cargo of coke. He proposed that the maximum load-line should be the centre of a large disc, and that the disc should be of such a diameter that the bottom line would be the load-line under unfavourable circumstances. This brought the whole case into a nutshell; in this way any modification could be made by practised and experienced men. The centre line would be the maximum load-line, and the line at the bottom of the disc would be the guiding line under unfavourable circumstances. No doubt, it was difficult to fix a load-line, but was not this a more rational way of dealing with the difficulty than leaving it to be decided on the spur of the moment, perhaps at night, when a vessel was going to sea? The officer who stopped a vessel and required 120 tons to be taken out practically established a load-line. He had understood the President of the Board of Trade to concede this point; but he had little idea it was to be done in such a fashion, and that the owners of ships were to fix the load-line. Many ships were owned by three or four small tradesmen, chiefly men who—and it might be said without any disparagement to them—had clubbed their money to buy a second-hand and nearly worn-out ship, and they had not the special knowledge which would enable them to fix a load-line. A man who had recently lost a large ship under distressing circumstances, and who had lost three steamers out of seven in a short time, began life as a clerk in a shipbroker's office, and had worked his way up; but he had acquired no technical knowledge of ships, and he put 2,000 tons of cargo into a ship registered to carry 957 tons. When the tailor was left to decide how much cloth he would sell for a yard, the grocer how much tea for a pound, and the spirit dealer how much brandy for a pint, then, and not till then, should he expect the House to allow shipowners to decide upon load-lines. He was glad the London shipowners acknowledged that a load-line was desirable; and he thanked them for saying so. The third point was that the iron used in ship-building was to be tested. Much of the iron that was now used was little better than cast iron, and, although calculated to bear a strong pull or a tensile strain, it was so brittle that the slightest accident caused a ship to break up like earthenware. The hon. Member for Hull (Mr. Norwood) said, that that was beneath the consideration of Parliament; but surely if, when a woman bought a silver teapot, Parliament provided that she should be able to ascertain whether it was silver, it was not beneath their attention to see that when a man bought iron to build a ship he should have what he paid for. Deck loads were a source of great danger, and he proposed to abolish them as a matter of principle, leaving the Board of Trade power, however, to sanction them under circumstances where they might be inevitable, as in the case of vessels carrying fruit. He thought the House would admit that, although it might sometimes be desirable to carry a couple of thrashing-machines on deck when the vessel was going across the North Sea, it would not be advisable for her to carry seven or eight, especially as there was no necessity for it now that the hatchways were made so large. With regard to the importation of grain in bulk he found that up to the fall of 1872 there was a great fatality among vessels loaded with grain coming from Montreal and Quebec, shipowners preferring to pay the penalty of $40 which attached to the practice rather than forego their profits. But in the beginning of 1873 a law was passed requiring shipowners to stow their cargoes to the satisfaction of the port authorities, and since then—in the words of a Member of the Canadian Government—"Not one single vessel sailing from those ports with grain has met with any accident whatever." Now, that he regarded as a very strong proof not merely of the necessity for such legislation as he proposed, but of the probability of its efficiency when put into operation. The hon. Member, in conclusion, stated that in Committee he would give the House the opportunity of voting on the following points:—The survey of unclassified vessels, the adoption of a load-line, a test for iron, the prohibition of deck loads except within certain limits, and the prohibition of grain cargoes in bulk.

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK thanked hon. Members on both sides of the House for the very flattering terms in which they had alluded to the Bill of the Government. There were only two principles at stake, one urged by the hon. Member for Derby (Mr. Plimsoll) and the other supported by the Government. The question had been carefully considered before a Royal Commission—a body eminently qualified to test the merits of such a question, because it could sit at any time of the year, and this Royal Commission sat for two years, and thoroughly investigated the question. The Commission heard at length the hon. Member for Derby, and all the witnesses he brought, and finally decided every point against him. Under these circumstances, the Government had no alternative but to base the present measure on the recommendations of the Royal Commission, and that had been done with certain variations which had been explained. What was the objection to the system of classification proposed by the hon. Member for Derby? In the main, it was that they would be delegating powers which ought to be exercised by Her Majesty's Government to a certain number of companies which were more or less in the nature of commercial speculations. Was there any great advantage in handing over this power? The next point was, the testing of the iron. His right hon. Friend (Sir Charles Adderley) had referred to the Amendment of the hon. Member for Pembroke (Mr. Reed), which would no doubt be duly considered when the proper time should come, and it was quite possible that then statements might be made which would give entire satisfaction to the country. The next question was as to the load-line, in which the hon. Gentleman differed from his right hon. Friend. This matter could be considered carefully in Committee, and then they might have a chance of arriving at a satisfactory result. But he might point out that the Commissioners whom the hon. Member proposed to entrust with the settlement of that great question were hardly in agreement on any one point, judging from the evidence given by them before the Royal Commission, and there would, therefore, be no reasonable probability of their arriving at a satisfactory decision. A recent case had established the difficulty of deciding the point. A ship started on her voyage, but was stopped. The question of the load-line was raised. The surveyor of the Board of Trade viewed the ship, but no agreement could be come to as to the load-line, which the shipowner was asked to fix. The hon. Member for Derby had stated correctly that since the Act of 1873 came into operation 440 ships had been reported to the Board of Trade, and that of these 404 had been found to be unseaworthy. The fact showed, in the first place, that the Board of Trade surveyors did their work extremely well. It was a fact, too, which he considered creditable to shipowners, for whom he had the greatest sympathy. He was glad to have heard them that evening so highly spoken of as a class, as from an intimate acquaintance with many of them he believed them to be a high-minded and honourable body of men. Considering the enormous number of ships which left our ports, the fact that after all the complaints that had been made only 440 ships had been stopped since the passing of the Bill of 1873 spoke well, indeed, for the efficiency of the British Mercantile Marine. On the part of Her Majesty's Government, he had to thank the hon. Gentleman the Member for Hull (Mr. Norwood) for the very kind manner in which he had expressed himself with regard to this Bill; and, indeed, he did not find fault with any of its most material parts. As to advance notes, and discipline clauses, those questions would be better discussed in Committee. As to the support of training ships the funds must come from somewhere, and they could hardly ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer to consent to a Vote for that purpose. He did not see where a fund more available for the purpose than that proposed could be found; but any suggestion upon the subject should receive proper attention. The question, however, was a mixed one, and no satisfactory settlement of it could be come to, unless the Education Department, the Home Office, and the Admiralty concurred upon it. As regarded the apprenticeship question, the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Norwood) knew that compulsory apprenticeship had been abolished, and that hence there was a great difficulty in reviving it. For his own part, he regretted that it had not been retained not only in the Mercantile Marine but also in every trade; but, still, when a thing was once abolished, it was extremely difficult to resuscitate it. The next point to which the hon. Gentleman referred was the necessity for seamen passing an examination in seamanship before they could get employment; but in a voluntary service it would be very difficult to enforce any such thing. Representing, as he did, a seaport town, he knew the difficulty there was in getting crews together; but that difficulty would be increased under such a provision as that of which the hon. Gentleman was the advocate. In the Act of 1867 there was an enactment that the Board of Trade might appoint medical officers to inspect seamen in order to see if they were fit to go to sea. No doubt the Act was permissive, but what the result? In 18 ports where local Marine Boards existed its provisions were a dead letter; and in the remaining 130 ports, where medical inspectors were appointed, the examinations had been infinitesimal in proportion to the number of seamen. The Government, therefore, could hardly legislate further in this direction, unless there was a very strong expression of public opinion in favour of such legislation. Most of these things, however, were matters of detail, and he hoped that the House was prepared to accept the principle of the Bill.

MR. WILSON observed, that when the Bill of the hon. Member for Derby (Mr. Plimsoll) was before the House last year he voted in what turned out to be the majority against it; but that majority was so small that had he and his hon. Colleague (Mr. Norwood) voted the other way the second reading of the Bill of his hon. Friend would have been carried. There had occurred since that time a considerable change in public opinion upon the question under discussion, and the change could not be more strikingly manifested than it was by the speech of the hon. Member for Derby himself. Nearly every speaker who had addressed the House on this subject had announced the fact that there were two principles before the House—the principle of the Government Bill, which was to throw the responsibility upon the shipowners, and the principle of the hon. Member for Derby, which was to endeavour by surveys and load-lines to prevent accidents at sea. But there was another point which had been entirely overlooked, and that was, that they did not allow any passengers to go to sea without their being protected by a Government survey; and it was only when it came to a question of the lives of seamen that the Government stopped short, and said it was not necessary to take any steps in the matter, and they would leave the seamen to take care of themselves. That Bill, with its penal enactments, treated seamen as persons who were not only to be drowned without consideration, but to be punished without mercy and almost without consideration. The hon. Member for West Norfolk (Mr. Bentinck) said, the whole tendency of legislation since the repeal of the Navigation Laws had been antagonistic to our Mercantile Marine; but it was a remarkable fact that the shipping tonnage of the United Kingdom since 1852 had increased during 20 years from 4,400,000 to 7,200,000 tons. Who were they dependent upon for this increase in the Mercantile Marine? They were dependent upon the seafaring population of the country; and it appeared to him the first duty of the Legislature was to protect the lives of our seamen with the same care and caution that it exercised with respect to passengers. When this Bill was launched before the House, he brought it under the notice of the Chamber of Commerce at Hull, and other institutions, and all with singular unanimity condemned every clause. The greater portion of the loss of life which annually took place at sea was in connection with the small coasting ships and the merchant steamers employed in carrying grain from America and the Black Sea. Owing to the manner in which many of these vessels were constructed, with double bottoms for water ballast, the centre of gravity was so displaced when they were loaded, that when getting into the trough of the sea they overturned and went to the bottom. Their steering gear, too, was often of such a character that it frequently broke, and the vessel thus disabled, was left to the mercy of the sea and often perished. It was to these two causes, far more than to overloading, he attributed the greater number of casualties of this description at sea. The proposal to render illegal the practice of giving advance notes to seamen had been condemned by all the local Marine Boards and Chambers of Commerce which had considered it, while the discipline clauses were such as no shipowner would think it worth trying to enforce, and few magistrates would convict upon them. Then came the question of safety, and how that was to be effected by calling upon the shipowner to make certain marks on the side of his vessel he was unable to understand. As the clause dealing with the question of liability had been altered, he would not now offer any observation upon that point. What the hon. Member for Derby wanted was that there should be a load-line fixed for each ship, and that unclassed ships should be passed by some satisfactory system of survey. Perhaps, with the present constitution of the Board of Trade, it would be impossible to carry out those two objects to the satisfaction both of the shipowners and the public; but he thought a means might be found of obviating nearly all the difficulties which had been raised in connection with that subject. At present in each marine district there existed a local Marine Board, but it was practically without any real power. He would suggest, however, that each large maritime district should have its local Marine Board re-constituted; that it should be allowed to manage its own maritime affairs; and that questions as to survey and load-lines should be settled in each particular district, but, of course, with an appeal to the central authority at the Board of Trade. He would suggest that these local Boards should consist of the stipendiary magistrate, the collector of Customs, and one representative each to be selected by the Chamber of Commerce, the local underwriters, the Board of Trade, the shipmasters, the seamen, the shipowners, and the Admiralty. A Court so constituted would, in his opinion, do all the necessary work in a satisfactory manner, and at the same time save much of the delay which now arose from the necessity of referring all matters to the central authority. He saw no insuperable difficulty in the way of deciding upon a form of load-line which would be simple and easily understood, but which, at the same time, would answer all practical purposes. With regard to deck-loads and grain cargoes, it would, he thought, be necessary to make some new regulations; but he trusted that, in addition to being efficient, they would be such as not unduly to tie the hands of English shipowners. Towards the end of 1872 there were about 500,000 tons of steamers and ships building in this country. In 1873 it was reduced to 300,000 tons, and in 1874 it was reduced to about 160,000 tons. They were handicapped to a great extent by foreign competition, which was daily increasing. In 1873 about 18,900 tons of British sailing ships cleared out from the United Kingdom and 23,000 tons of foreign shipping, and if it had not been for a large accession of strength to our steam marine we should not have been able to boast of our marine supremacy. Considering the concessions that had been made by the President of the Board of Trade, the support the Bill was likely to receive from the hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby, and that the tendency on both sides of the House and shipowners generally was to make mutual concessions, he should withdraw the Motion of which he had given Notice for the rejection of the Bill.

MR. MAC IVER expressed regret that the Circular he had issued had been misunderstood. The case which the President of the Board of Trade had so effectually demolished was not the case which he (Mr. MacIver) had endeavoured to set up. He was glad to see the earnest desire shown by the House to second the honest endeavours of the right hon. Gentleman to bring about a better state of things with regard to maritime legislation. He hoped the question would not in any way be put aside, and thought that if hon. Gentlemen would continue to treat the Bill in the same fair spirit they had already evinced, that it could be made a really effective measure, such as would answer the purpose which they all had at heart. Reference had been made by the President of the Board of Trade to certain proposals of his with regard to the constitution of the Department. What he (Mr. MacIver) meant by these proposals was merely to point out that the circumstances of to-day were very different from those of 20 or 30 years ago; and that he (Mr. MacIver) thought the increasing duties of the Board of Trade would, before very long, render it necessary for Parliament to consider what ought to be done in order to deal with those increasing duties. Questions affecting shipping would, no doubt, form an important element in such consideration. He (Mr. MacIver) could not see that there was any real antagonism between the proposals of the hon. Member for Derby (Mr. Plim-soll) and those of the Government. The rightness or wrongness of "load-line" and "survey" depended entirely upon what was meant by load-line and survey. Certainly, some system of survey was possible which would not be liable to the objections that had been raised. The very best vessels in the country were surveyed; and, so far as he (Mr. MacIver) was aware, without any evil results. He (Mr. MacIver) could not believe that liability to survey had any effect whatever in lessening a proper feeling of responsibility on the part of shipowners. The Peninsular and Oriental Company's, and the Royal Mail Company's vessels were all surveyed; the Inman Company's vessels, those of the White Star Company, and the many other fine steamers carrying emigrant passengers were subjected to a still more perfect form of survey; but one which, of course, was inapplicable to ordinary trading vessels. Still, something might reasonably be done in that direction. He knew what survey meant, and spoke from some experience on the subject, having the year before last been legally responsible for the conveyance of 72,000 passengers under the provisions of the Passengers Acts. The House could not but be struck with the fact that all vessels were not equally liable to disaster. The vessels of many companies, in many trades, were navigated with comparative safety; while others, sailing alongside of them, were as conspicuously unfortunate. There was generally a reason for it. Occasional disasters might occur to the best of ships; and, in steamers, the connections between the machinery and the sea were such that hidden imperfections might easily arise, and, notwithstanding the greatest care, such vessels might sometimes unaccountably go to the bottom. If a man lost a ship, therefore, it did not necessarily follow that he had been to blame; but while accidents here and there might thus have occurred, it was impossible so to explain away the foundering of ten or a dozen steamers in the Bay of Biscay within the last few months. No other explanation was possible than that some, at least, of these vessels had gone to the bottom from causes which might have been prevented; and, as he (Mr. MacIver) thought, from causes preventable by legislation such as might fairly be held to be in harmony with the principle of the Government Bill. To meet such cases he would suggest, not merely the marking of a load-line, but that survey, going as far as was reasonable in the direction of the survey carried out with respect to passenger vessels, should be adopted. It had been alleged that the emigration survey had failed, and instances like the loss of the London had been cited. It was said—"Here is a ship surveyed by the Board of Trade and by the Emigration authorities, in which everything was done, yet it has gone to the bottom;" and this particular case was not unfrequently used as an argument against the principle of survey. It seemed to him that the occasional failure of survey was no argument for its abolition, but rather for its improvement. As well might the prevalence of crime be used as an argument for the abolition of the police. He (Mr. MacIver) did not bring any charge against the officers of the Board of Trade. The Act of 1873 had, no doubt, been applied with as much care and judgment as was practicable; but its only good results were from the survey clauses. Even the bad form of survey which the Act of 1873 represented, had been the means of detaining many unseaworthy vessels; but he knew that there were many instances where vessels had been needlessly stopped, and their owners put to great trouble. The Act of 1873, besides being of irregular and uncertain application, was open to the further objection that; it dealt only with vessels sailing from British ports; while it was to vessels returning to British ports that preventable disasters had most frequently occurred. But disasters to homeward-bound vessels might, he (Mr. MacIver) considered, to some considerable extent, be prevented by such legislation as he understood was now contemplated by the President of the Board of Trade. There was no real difficulty in regard to load-line. Every shipowner of his acquaintance had a load-line, and there was no difficulty whatever on the subject, other than want of the will; and want of the will existed to a larger extent than the House would readily believe. He did not mean that people wished their ships to go to the bottom—they wished them to go safe. But profit often depended upon deep loading. Some people were ready to run greater risks than others, and others again ran risks ignorantly; but both might, too often, be found united in their objections to load-line and survey. They preferred legislation on the principle of responsibility; and very naturally they meant a responsibility which amounted to nothing. He would remind the House of the old proverb that "to cook your hare you must first catch it." It was right enough to punish wrong-doing ship-owners; but there was not merely the difficulty of ascertaining the facts, there was also the difficulty of ascertaining against whom to proceed. In all the years in which he (Mr. MacIver) had been a shipowner, it would have been impossible to prove that he was legally a shipowner at all. His name was not on the register. Again, how were they to enforce personal responsibility, as against the partners in limited liability companies? It was not the fact that legislation on the principle of load-line and survey would necessarily relieve shipowners from their proper responsibilities; certainly, not from responsibilities that were worth anything. The Board of Trade gave certificates of competency to masters, officers, and engineers; but that did not relieve shipowners from liability for the doings of their certificated servants if, in the result, those servants proved to be incompetent. And so with regard to the ship herself. Neither the marking of a load-line, nor even a certificate of survey from the Board of Trade need necessarily relieve the owners from any responsibility whatever. The Bill of the Government had many good points; but it was open to improvement, and he hoped in Committee to be able to suggest some Amendments which he thought would tend to better carry out the great objects which the President of the Board of Trade had in view.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, the President of the Board of Trade had told the House that he and the Government sympathized with the shipowners of this country. That was a sentiment which everybody would be ready to endorse; but he had missed in the right hon. Gentleman's speech any allusion to provisions for another class of persons deserving attention, and that was the seamen. He was not going to enter upon subjects with which he was totally incompetent to deal—which were nautical questions with reference to load-lines and surveys. But the President of the Board of Trade said that this Bill was divided into various parts—one having reference to wages and another to surveys; but there was one great chapter of this Bill which began at the 9th clause, and which had to do with discipline. That chapter of discipline re-enacted—and in some respects made worse than it was before—by far the most severe and barbarous criminal code which was known to this country, and which he believed was unexampled in the law of any other country in the world. It was to that criminal code that the seamen of this country were subjected—the code under which they had suffered, and at this day were suffering, the most cruel and the most indefensible injustice. The proposal to re-enact this code would give the House an opportunity of reviewing this legislation and reflecting whether they would or would not endorse it. The character of this legislation was of a most extraordinary kind. It began with the officers of the ship; and it said with respect to them, that if they were guilty of gross acts of misconduct, of drunkenness, tyranny, or negligence, proceedings might be taken against them, and if the case was proved they might lose their certificate or be reduced to a lower grade. That was the only punishment. But when the Act came to deal with the men—not for gross misconduct, drunkenness, or negligence, but for offences of a minor character—we then came to such severe penalties as in no other case had ever received the sanction of Parliament in our time. He would ask any Member to look at the 17th clause. That clause stated that—

"Where any person was guilty of desertion or a kindred offence, the master or any mate, or the owner, ship's husband, or consignee of the ship to which the offender belonged, or any person specially authorized in writing by the owner or master of the ship, might arrest the offender, without warrant, in any place in Her Majesty's dominions, and also in any place out of Her Majesty's dominions, if and so far as the law of that place so permitted; and every constable should give to the person making the arrest such assistance as he may require. The person arresting the offender might, and in case the offender so required and it was practicable, should, convey him before some court having cognizance of the offence, and for that purpose might detain him in custody for such period not exceeding twenty-four hours as might be necessary."

Then there was this extraordinary provision—

"If any such arrest appeared to the court to have been made on improper or insufficient grounds, the person who made the same or caused the same to be made should incur a penalty not exceeding twenty pounds; but the infliction of that penalty should be a bar to any action for false imprisonment in respect of the arrest."

That a seaman illegally arrested should not have the remedy which was open to every other subject of Her Majesty—that of bringing an action for false imprisonment—but should be limited to a penalty of £20, was a disgrace to our legislation, and would be a disgrace to the legislation of any land. It was said that what they wanted was to elevate the character of their seamen, and to attract men to the merchant service; and yet they were going to enact against them laws to which no other of Her Majesty's subjects were liable—laws worse than existed in the worst days of crimping; yes, they were asked to enact what he would call this barbarous, this brutal legislation against the seamen of this country. The hon. Member for Hull (Mr. Norwood), in his very interesting speech, told the House that shipowners did not wish for legislation of this severe character, and that it was a pity the Government had introduced these clauses into the Bill. Hon. Gentlemen on the other side of the House had expressed a wish that something might be done to attract seamen rather than to drive them away. He hoped that when they got into Committee on the measure this Bill of pains and penalties of the most aggravated character would be considerably modified. The fact was that the 16th clause provided that men might be imprisoned for a period of three months in cases of desertion. It might be said that this 16th clause was practically a consolidation of several clauses of the Merchant Shipping Act of 1854. That might be so, but was no excuse for the clause. Before that Act the law was of a mild character, and how it was that the Act of 1854 could have passed sub silentio through the House of Commons he could not understand, except it was that at that time there was a great attraction at the gold diggings, and sailors were in the habit of deserting to them. But the consequence was that under it men were frequently being sentenced to six, seven, eight, and ten weeks' imprisonment with hard labour at Cardiff, Liverpool, and other ports for absenting themselves—sometimes unavoidably—from their ship. In one case at Liverpool a man had been sentenced to six weeks' imprisonment with hard labour because he had been drunk over night and had overslept himself, and had not, therefore, joined his vessel. It was legislation such as that they were called upon by the Government to re-enact. A Return which had been presented to Parliament on the Motion of the hon. Member for Derby (Mr. Plimsoll) brought some curious facts to light. One man had been imprisoned for three weeks because he had refused to sail in the Elizabeth Knowles—a vessel which had subsequently to put into Milford Haven in a leaking condition, and which, on being surveyed by the surveyor of the Board of Trade, was reported to be utterly unseaworthy. There was another case. The Sir Robert Macdonald put into Weymouth for repairs. She was surveyed by the Board of Trade and found perfectly unseaworthy. At that time her crew were imprisoned in Usk Gaol for refusing to go to sea in her. The Home Secretary having been written to, replied that "under all the circumstances of the case" he would recommend their release. They had been sentenced to 10 weeks' imprisonment, and perhaps "under all the circumstances of the case" any Government would have recommended their release. Such was the state of the case under the law in its reformed state, and the question was, whether they were to re-enact a law which had such a practical application as this? Some mitigation of the matter was attempted by the legislation of 1873; but the survey was to be granted under this condition—that one-fourth of the crew must complain of the unseaworthiness of the ship. But why was one man to be sent to prison because he did not wish to lose his life in an unseaworthy ship, if it was perfectly possible he was right and able to prove his case? Of course, it was desirable that there should be some protection against malicious complaints; but this was a point with which it would not be difficult to deal. In the Act of 1873, however, there was another provision which gave a seaman who had been sent to prison for refusing to proceed in an unseaworthy ship compensation; but such compensation was to be granted to him by the very men who wished to send him to sea. This was the character of a chapter of the Bill which had not been discussed that evening, and he hoped the House would consider that he was justified in drawing attention to it. He was quite sure that if they were to get the merchant seamen of the country to join cordially in action with the shipowners, it would only be by treating them as men who deserved to be respected. The amendment of the existing law would be very much facilitated by the proposal of the Government to do away with advance notes, which had been regarded by many persons as justifying proceedings of the kind he had referred to; but he was at a loss to understand how the President of the Board of Trade had reasoned himself into the opinion that that abolition would not be an interference with the freedom of contract. If the Bill should be the means of enabling them to revise legislation in this respect he should think himself fully justified in supporting the second reading. He could not sit down without expressing regret at many remarks which had been made with reference to the hon. Member for Derby. He thought the House ought to reflect that if it had not been for the patriotism and benevolence of that hon. Member they would probably not have seen this Bill at all. It was to the hon. Member's labours that they owed the Bill of 1871; to his benevolent exertions that they owed the Bill of 1873; and to his exertions that they owed the fact that both the shipowners and the Board of Trade had become alive to the absolute necessity of remedying the existing condition of things; and he felt that the hon. Gentleman might view with satisfaction the manner in which public opinion had been ripened on the question. He trusted that the Bill would be amended so as to make it worthy of the objects it sought to accomplish.

MR. RATHBONE: I share with every hon. Member of this House in the indignation which has been aroused by the revelations which have been brought to light by the exertions of the hon. Member for Derby (Mr. Plimsoll); but I am most anxious that the remedies we propose for these evils should be effectual, and that they should not take a direction in which they would aggravate the very evils and crimes which we so anxiously seek to put an end to. Therefore, representing as I do the largest shipowning port in the world, I venture earnestly to ask the attention of the House for a short time; for I have reason to know that some hon. Members of this House are quite unaware of the serious consequences that will ensue both to the lives of our sailors and to the maritime power and greatness of England, should any false steps be taken in dealing with the management of the merchant shipping of this country. I have heard hon. Members—and clever men too—speak as if it really did not much matter what was done. I have heard it said—"I suppose the 'right thing' is to vote for both Bills," as if the measures advocated by the hon. Member for Derby and the Government Bill did not proceed on diametrically opposite principles, or that to give a popular vote on the question can do much harm. But I venture to say that this is not the opinion of any of the statesmen who have given attention to this subject; and it is not the opinion of the great bulk of those shipowners who have in practice been successful in avoiding loss of life and property at sea. I presented to the House this evening a Petition from a body of men whose practical experience I conceive is entitled to some weight in the House, for it represents the deliberate opinion of the Steam Shipowners' Association of Liverpool, whose members own 779,258 tons, being about one-third of the whole steam tonnage of Great Britain. The Association has been in existence 15 years, and, as I am advised, no one of its members has ever had a single vessel detained by the Board of Trade, or a single case of unseaworthiness made out or rightfully imputed against a single one of his ships. These men have, by their practical success in avoiding disasters at sea, established a right to speak with authority when they come forward to point out how these disasters can best be avoided, and, at the same time, to give warning of the danger of increasing those disasters, and destroying our mercantile prosperity by injudicious legislation. They have given to this matter, as they state, prolonged and careful consideration. They have called to their assistance some of the ablest, and on this subject the most experienced lawyers in the kingdom, and the result of this practical and legal experience is embodied in the Petition against the Bill of the hon. Member for Derby, which I have presented, and in the Amendments on the Government Bill, of which I have given Notice. These men state, as the result of their practical and successful experience, that the legislation proposed by the hon. Member for Derby is not only based on an erroneous principle, but would fail utterly to reach the small number of disreputable ship-owners aimed at; that it would tend to transfer the responsibility from the ship-owner to the Government, or Association, and surveyors acting under Government authority, to remove inducements for improvement, to discourage the enterprize which has created the British Mercantile Marine, and to reduce all vessels to the comparatively low standard of efficiency which must necessarily be adopted as the Government test. They point out how, by amendments in law and administration which shall not violate the principles of English legislation, the increased safety sought can alone be attained, and the dangers they give warning of avoided. Now, I am quite aware that there are many shipowners who disagree with my constituents on this subject. Many of them, terrified at the prospect of unlimited responsibility, are joining in the cry for futile or injurious interference, in order to escape the penalties and liabilities with which they are threatened. The reason of this has been well stated in a single sentence by one of the best legal authorities on this subject. Mr. Squarey, formerly legal adviser to both the Steamship Owners' Association and the American Chamber of Commerce, and who, as such, had very great experience in shipping matters, but being now legal adviser to the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board, he is entirely out of private practice and able to give an independent and impartial opinion, writes—

“Mr. Plimsoll's Bill is a real, though, as I think, a mistaken effort to accomplish the end he has in view. Looking at it from a mere selfish shipowners' point of view, I should decidedly prefer Mr. Plimsoll's Bill to that of the Government, because the latter will certainly place the shipowner under liabilities for sending unseaworthy ships to sea which he is not now subject to, whilst the former—so far as it is in any degree a practical scheme, will, I am afraid, relieve the shipowner from liability, without securing the object sought—viz., the preservation of life at sea. But, in truth, I do not believe Mr. Plimsoll's Bill to be practically workable at all.”

I will, if the House will allow me, try to give practical reasons for what I have stated. And first let me point out the magnitude and importance of the interests with which you are dealing. Mr. Henry Jeula, in a table forwarded to Lloyd's, shows that more than 57 per cent—the exact figures being 57·70—of the whole steam tonnage of the world is British, and 37 per cent of the whole sailing tonnage of the world is British; and when you consider how much more work a steamer does than a sailing vessel, it may be stated that more than one-half of the world's maritime work is done by British shipowners and British sailors. Our proportion was even larger a few years since. But, by the opening of the Suez Canal—and this is a matter for the most serious consideration of the House—this country has lost the vantage-ground which it once possessed, especially with regard to the trade from the East, for when that went round the Cape, England was the natural depôt for that commerce. Now, however, the vessels bringing the produce of the East, have to pass near Venice, Trieste, Marseilles, and other ports which are situated near to the districts in which much of their cargoes are consumed. It is not, therefore, surprising to find that the percentage of British sailing vessels to the total tonnage of the world has fallen from 43 per cent in 1870, to the 37 per cent in 1874, and that of steamers from 59 per cent in 1870, to the 57 per cent in 1874. Now it is only the energy and enterprize of our shipowners who, the moment the Canal was opened, set to work to build numerous vessels peculiarly fitted for its trade, that has enabled us to retain as much as we have retained of the carrying trade and commerce of the world. But I wish particularly to guard myself from being supposed to advocate the promotion of the prosperity of our Mercantile Marine, or even the maintenance of our naval supremacy at the expense of the lives of our seamen. If we are called upon to maintain the prosperity of our Mercantile Marine at the cost of tolerating criminal or negligent disregard for the lives of our British seamen, then the House would say, and the country would say, let our maritime prosperity go, even though our marine supremacy should go with it. But what I maintain is, that the same measures which contribute to the prosperity of our Mercantile Marine contribute to the safety of our seamen. There is no real conflict between the interests of the sailor and the interests of the shipowner.

Mr. Rathbone

Really sound legislation will ultimately benefit both. To this point I shall address myself. There are three modes of dealing with this question, which are now practically before the House. First, that proposed by the hon. Member for Derby, and those who agree with him in their Amendments on the Government Bill, and the hon. Member has also embodied his proposals in Bill No. 2. That mode is practically to direct the shipowner how he is to manage his business, and to interfere with his management of it. Then there is the proposal of the Government, in the Bill now before us, to strengthen previous legislation, leaving the shipowner free to carry on his business with the same liberty that is afforded to other traders, but, as in other trades, holding him responsible for his misdeeds. This Bill, even with the modifications proposed by the Government, would materially increase the liability of the shipowner, and this, with the appointment of a legal officer of the Board of Trade, whose duty it will be to put the law in force, would, I have no doubt, very much tend towards the diminution of disasters at sea. But, after the most careful consideration, we have come to the conclusion that it would be possible to make the law stronger and even more effective than either the proposals of the hon. Member for Derby, or the Government Bill would make it. At the same time, our proposed Amendments avoid the very great dangers which we foresee would result from the adoption of Mr. Plimsoll's proposals—dangers of creating a false sense of security on the part of all those whose vigilance is absolutely necessary for the security we seek to attain. We propose, then, a different course—to impose a scale of punishments for attempts to send unseaworthy ships to sea, varied and graduated so that they will in practice and reality be inflicted, and therefore practically deterrent; and if our Amendments are adopted, together with efficient machinery for putting them in force—and without this no law that you can pass will be of any use—we venture to say that our proposals would, as far as the law is capable of contributing towards that end, reduce the loss of life and property at sea. Now, it is urged upon the Government by the hon. Member for Derby, and many kind-hearted people, who are naturally indignant at the unnecessary sacrifice of life which the conduct of some—comparatively very few—unprincipled shipowners inflicts upon our sailors, that Government should undertake by a system of surveys applied to everything connected with a ship—to the iron of which she is built, to her build, to her loading, to her equipment—to avoid these dangers. But I maintain—and what is more to the purpose, the Royal Commission, after hearing evidence on all sides maintains, in its most able Report—that if you attempt by Government machinery to do that which the shipowner alone can do, you will utterly fail. You may—nay, I admit that you will—in occasional instances, prevent a few more unseaworthy ships from going to sea; but, in order to do this, you will so diminish the responsibility felt by the great mass of shipowners that a greater number of lives will be lost, and a greater amount of property destroyed than if you adhere to those principles of government, to which I maintain the order and prosperity of this country are mainly due. That principle I take to be that the Government will not interfere at every turn to make it impossible for people to do wrong—that is in itself an impossibility; but that it will take care that, if people do wrong, or attempt to do wrong, the law shall punish them, and thus mark that to do wrong, or attempt to do wrong, is infamous and dangerous also. Every respectable shipowner is interested in having unseaworthy ships stopped. A badly-found overloaded vessel, sailed on “overscrewing” principles, is just the most mischievous competitor a respectable shipowner can have. Such vessels pull freights down in some trades to such a point that well-found vessels can hardly live in them, and besides lessening the profits of first-rate shipowners, they bring discredit on their common calling. But what we contend is, that those principles of English law, which experience has shown to be most successful in dealing with other crimes, should be applied to the crimes of a negligent shipowner. You may make it very dangerous and infamous for shipowners to send unseaworthy ships to sea, by attaching proper penalties to such a breach of the law, and providing for their enforcement; but you never can put every British ship—in this country, at sea, and in foreign ports—under efficient minute supervision. But I do say this, that the hon. Member for Derby, and those who agree with him, are so far right when they say that it is not enough to attempt to punish the criminally negligent shipowner when he has sent an unseaworthy ship to sea, and when, perhaps, she has gone to the bottom with those on board who might have given evidence of her unseaworthiness. Any clearly proved, deliberate, or negligent attempt to send an unseaworthy ship to sea—whether she actually goes to sea or not—should be severely punished; and those who are interested in the matter will have seen that I have placed on the Paper an Amendment calculated to carry this out. My great desire is, that we should devote our attention and efforts in this matter to what is practicable, and not attempt what is impossible. The tendency of recent legislation has been sadly too much in the direction of substituting Government inspection for individual responsibility—and there is no trade in which such mistaken interference will be more fatal than that of a shipowner. Any one who is at all practically acquainted with the subject, knows that a ship's seaworthiness depends upon a great number of complicated conditions, which it is almost impossible for an Inspector, upon a casual survey, to judge of. The Royal Commissioners say—

“The safety of a ship at sea cannot be secured by any one precaution or set of precautions, but requires the unceasing application of skill, care, and vigilance, from her first design to her unloading at the port of destination. She must be well designed, well constructed, well equipped, well stowed, or she is not seaworthy. She must be also well manned and well navigated, otherwise all precautions as to her construction and as to her stowage will be unavailing.

“Discretion as to the proper loading of his ship must be left to the shipowner, or, under his directions, to the manager, on whom the responsibility rests for sending the ship to sea in a seaworthy condition, which responsibility it is inexpedient to diminish. We have, therefore, come to the conclusion, though not without regret, that we cannot prescribe any universal rule for the safe loading of all merchant ships.”

It has been admitted by the hon. Member for Derby, and the universal reputation which British shipping enjoys proves, that these criminal, or criminally negligent shipowners, are an extremely small proportion of the large body of shipowners; and it is almost capable of arithmetical demonstration that, if by Government interference in the management of ships, you relax the vigilance and sense of responsibility of the large majority of shipowners, you will, on the general balance, increase the loss of life and property at sea. Besides, disasters will take place in a state of things under which you cannot bring legal or moral responsibility home to the shipowner. I wish that every Member of the House had read with care the Report of the Royal Commission. It will be remembered that, when that Commission was appointed, the shipowners complained loudly that they were hardly represented among its Members, and it is fortunate that such was the case, for the conclusions which the Commission has drawn from the ample evidence which it took, are, in consequence, above suspicion of bias in the direction of shipowners. Now, anyone who will read these Reports carefully must be struck with the increasing strength of the impression on the part of the Commission of the great danger of substituting Government management for the vigilance of those interested, and the responsibility of the shipowner. That which was an impression in their first Report becomes a clear and decided conclusion in their final Report. Now, I wish especially to call attention to the fact that any certificate of survey, or any load-line, can only deal with the lowest requirements consistent with safety; that the careless or dishonest shipowner will scheme to do as little as possible, and that it is the too common tendency of the minds of men in every profession, when the law interferes to lay down a legal requirement, to assume that what the law exacts is all that duty requires. Thus any low average of legal requirement has a tendency to shield the guilty, and to lower the general standard of the trade to which it has to be applied. I confess I am surprised that the severe Amendments of which I have given Notice have not been put upon the Paper by the hon. Member for Derby. They are so clearly those which are dictated by experience of the success of his efforts during the last eighteen months in preventing unseaworthy ships from going to sea. Even under the defective legislation, and with the defective machinery which the Board of Trade has had during that time for carrying the Act of

1871 into effect, from the 5th of August, 1873, to the 31st of January, 1875, 465 vessels were stopped by the Board of Trade for defective hull, equipment, &c.; of these 14 were found to be seaworthy, 421 were condemned as unseaworthy, while on 30 the surveys were pending. And, again, 36 ships were stopped for overloading or improper loading, were declared to be unseaworthy, and had to be lightened or trimmed; and, moreover, if I am rightly informed, the operations of the hon. Member for Derby have already caused to be broken up a large proportion of those ships which have brought so much scandal on our Mercantile Marine. But the hon. Member for Derby will say—"Though I have been able to stop so many ships, how many more have gone to sea overladen or unseaworthy? And where are your successful prosecutions under your criminal clause?" Well, I will tell the House why those prosecutions have not taken place. The eleventh section of the Act of 1871 enacted that, if any person having authority to send a ship to sea sent her to sea in an unseaworthy state, &c., he should be guilty of a misdemeanour, unless he proved that he used all reasonable means to make her seaworthy, and was ignorant of her unseaworthiness. Now, I am informed that when a prosecution was desired, one difficulty under this section was, whom to prosecute? In many cases a ship is fitted for sea by one owner or agent, but actually sent to sea by another who is wholly ignorant of her unseaworthiness. The one could not be convicted, because though he knew her to be unseaworthy, he did not send her to sea; the other could not be convicted, because though he sent her to sea, he was not responsible for her unseaworthiness, and did not know she was unseaworthy. But the hon. Member will say—How, then, do you propose to catch these gentlemen? I have taken the best legal and practical advice I could obtain, and with such aid an Amendment on Clause 31 has been drawn, which I have placed on the Paper, and which I believe will not only meet the difficulties I have pointed out, but will really catch the guilty parties. And if it be not yet sufficiently stringent, I do not suppose I shall be told that it is beyond the power of the Government or a Committee of this House to make whatever alterations may be necessary to render it completely effectual. The Board of Trade have already appointed a legal adviser to act as a public prosecutor in these matters, and as they have promised to appoint in the out-ports, where these offences are most frequent, responsible officers who may be trusted with discretionary powers to act in case of emergency, and when we have, as proposed, greatly increased facilities for detecting such offences, and fresh and easily enforced penalties for attempting to commit them, we may reasonably hope that these offences will be made so difficult that they will be practically abandoned; and this will be done by measures which will raise the standard of duty, and increase, instead of diminishing, the personal responsibility of the shipowner. And now let me just call the attention of the House for a few moments to the effect which will be inevitably produced on the future maritime progress of this country by any law which, as proposed by the hon. Member for Derby, would make classification compulsory, or which will practically give to a Government department responsibility for the construction and equipment of our ships. Perhaps the question will be best understood by those unconnected with shipping if I were to give an illustration. I shall first illustrate my meaning by the history of an individual case, and I shall then show the experience of a large body of men. I will take the well-known case of the Cunard Company—a company, the success of which is justly a source of national pride. Well, everybody whom I have heard speak upon the subject, able to watch the rise of that undertaking, and to estimate the causes of its success and immunity from disaster, I have found to agree with me in attributing that success, not wholly or even mainly to the enormous Government subsidies which it enjoys, but to the intense, pervading, never-resting, ever-watchful, concentrated sense of personal responsibility over every branch of its business in which Mr. Charles MacIver, its managing owner, lived and moved, and had his being while he was building up that concern. Now suppose the future Mr. Charles MacIver to contemplate the building up of a similar enterprize. What state of matters will he find, if we are to follow the advice of those who call thus loudly for Government direction and control? He will find, if this well-meant advice which is now offered by some of the Amendments before the House be adopted, the iron of which his ship is built, and every part of her workmanship and equipment, certified by Government. He will find, if this Bill passes, a certain person certified and inspected by Government to adjust his compasses. He will find another man, inspected and certified by Government, to examine his anchors and his chains; and he will find prepared to his hand, a captain, mates and engineers, inspected and surveyed by Government, as the proper parties and the only parties for him to employ. I would ask the House to consider whether the British character, with its hardihood, its energy, its self-reliance, its enterprize, and that pervading sense of duty which we claim as one of our national characteristics, has been created by such a system of minute interference, and whether it can possibly co-exist with it? I say it cannot. And, if it cannot, will not the lives of our British seamen be far more insecure under such a system than they are now? But I know I shall be met with this argument,—that you do not seek any such minute surveys; but I would point out that, if once you make a Government department or association responsible in any way for the build and equipment of vessels, they will inevitably, feeling their responsibility, be led by degrees to lay down rules for such build and equipment. Why, even the experience of our commercial associations shows that such rules have a tendency to become injuriously rigid and even unsafe; much more would this tendency prevail in a Government department. The hon. Member for Derby, feeling that this was the case, has, with an anxiety not to injure our maritime commerce which I frankly acknowledge, proposed, in substitution for a Government survey, classification at Lloyd's or some other similar association; and, certainly, associations like Lloyd's or the Liverpool Registry, would be less likely to be guilty of unnecessary interference than a Government department would be, these associations being much more under the influence of the mercantile and shipping communities, who are their customers, and for whose favour they are actively competing. But, fortunately, on this question we have actual and undoubted experience to warn us; and I must ask the attention of the House for a very short time longer, while I state the results of that experience. It is as I have said the experience of large bodies of men distinguished for their success in avoiding disaster. No doubt a very large proportion of the Members of this House are under the impression that, when people talk of unclassed ships, they are speaking only of those dangerous ships which have run off their class, and which are not classed because they cannot obtain a class at Lloyd's, or any other similar association. This is very far from the case. On the contrary, a very large proportion of the best ship-owners never class their ships at all. I have a list of these; and I find that the Peninsular and Oriental Company's ships are, as a rule, unclassed; that the Royal Mail Company's ships are unclassed; that the ships of the Cunard Line are unclassed. The ships of the Brazil Line, and of Holt's China Line, also appear on this list of unclassed ships. But without wearying the House by enumerating them, I may state broadly that the majority of those steamship owners who have standing and reputation sufficient to enable them to ensure their ships on most advantageous terms without Lloyd's classification, are not in the habit of classing their steamers; and I will tell the House why—because Lloyd's and the Liverpool Association, and other associations of underwriters, though, as I have said, they are much more open to representations from the shipowning community, who are their customers, than a Government department would be. Even they have from time to time laid down such rules for building ships as stood in the way of improvements—requiring strength to be put where, strength not being wanted, it diminished, instead of increasing, the buoyancy and safety of a ship; and enforcing forms of construction which were not only not economical, but were positively not as safe as other forms. Whatever fresh associations you form will always have a tendency to stereotype the improvements which they themselves have made; and as they get old and rich, to distrust and obstruct further change. I have tried to picture to myself how the best shipowners—the members of the Liverpool Steam Shipowners' Association for instance—would act under the provisions proposed by the hon. Member for Derby, and I will tell you at once that these men would form an association of their own, which would, of course, be recognized by Government; and, though they have been in their younger days among the most energetic and improving shipowners, they would be, in their turn, one of the most powerful obstructions I can conceive in the way of the Charles MacIvers or Alfred Holts of the future. Let me point out to the House by a practical example how utterly worthless such a provision would be to prevent the disasters we complain of. The hon. Member for Derby, in a letter to The Telegraph, of 18th March, gives a list of 28 vessels that were posted at Lloyd's since the 1st of January as missing, and which were supposed to have foundered at sea with all hands, together with the number of lives that were lost on board of them. Of these 28 ships only 6 very small ones were unclassified, of which only 3 of 34 tons, 40 tons, and 85 tons respectively—one being a fishing vessel—were British. Three of the largest vessels on the list, through which so many lives were lost, were not only classed, but were classed in both books in the highest class; while the sailing vessels were generally classed in the highest class in which at their age a vessel can be placed. I think, Sir, I have shown the danger and the uselessness of this compulsory classification, and I do not hesitate to say, had we been compelled to submit to a Government survey, or to Lloyd's classification, before all those great improvements which have been made in the building of our ships took place, that those improvements would have been delayed—to say the least—and we should not occupy the position which we now occupy in the Mercantile Marine of the world. Anyone who remembers the disastrous influence which even an erroneous mode of levying tonnage dues exercised on the model of our ships, and the wonderful improvement in their construction which followed the removal of that influence, would hesitate before he takes any part in compelling British shipowners to submit the construction of their ships to a Government survey. In conclusion, I hope the House will see that, of the two directions which it is proposed legislation shall take, the one is sound in principle, and will be effectual and safe in practice, while the other is unsound, and will be ineffectual and dangerous. The one is recommended by all the statesmen who have had experience in the Department to which this question belongs. It is recommended by the Royal Commission in their able Report. It is advocated by a large body of those shipowners who have themselves been most successful in averting disaster, and it is in accordance with the spirit and practice of English legislation. It proposes, while leaving the honest shipowner the same liberty enjoyed by other Englishman, of carrying on his trade without being subjected to minute Government interference with its details, to hold every shipowner sternly and strictly responsible not to expose to unnecessary danger the lives of his sailors. The other direction in which it is proposed to legislate would lead to the interference of Government in the management of shipping in consequence of the acts of a few careless and greedy men. But we contend that to treat men as helpless and immoral, is the most effectual way of making them so. We wish, therefore, to point out the danger of treating all concerned in shipping matters alternately, as children and criminals, and of hereby relaxing the vigilance, diminishing the sense of responsibility and duty, and lowering the standard of action of all concerned in the construction and management of our Mercantile Marine. I regret to have been obliged to detain the House so long; but I am deeply impressed with the responsibility that attaches to us, if by any mistaken legislation we should increase that loss of life, and those evils which it is the anxious wish of this House, as much as possible, to diminish.

MR. GOURLEY moved the adjournment of the debate.

MR. MACDONALD seconded the Motion.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
 "That the Debate be now adjourned."
 —(Mr. Gourley.)

MR. DISRAELI said, he thought the proposal was not in accordance with Parliamentary usage. The principle of the Bill had been accepted on both sides of the House, and the speeches which had been made in the course of the discussion, however interesting and ingenious, were, with very rare exceptions, Committee speeches; and even the hon. Member for Derby, whose general views might be supposed to form a system opposed to the policy of the Government, had announced it to be his intention to move Amendments at a future stage of the measure. He, therefore, trusted the debate would not be adjourned. Ample opportunity would be afforded to hon. Members to express their opinions on the Bill both in Committee and on other occasions, and it was therefore to be hoped that the House would proceed at once with the second reading.

Question put, and negatived.

MR. MACGREGOR said, he had been connected with a seaport town many years, and he remembered, 30 or 40 years ago, it was said the sailors of the time were inferior to those who had gone before them. They were now hearing the same story over again. His opinion, however, was that the seamen of the present day were a better set of men than those who had gone before them. They were more sober, more careful of their money, and more to be trusted in many ways. He regretted that it was proposed to do away with advance notes; he was not at all satisfied that they would get on without them. A comparison had been made between seamen and ordinary workmen, but ordinary workmen got their pay at home every week, and could spend it at home; whereas to the seaman, his pay was of no use when he was at sea, and he might be away for some years. Besides, there might be circumstances which rendered it necessary that seamen should have money before going to sea. They might have come from a sick bed; they might have had deaths in their families, and they might require a new kit to go to sea with. In the port with which he was connected, instead of giving advance notes, they were accustomed to give advances in cash to well-known men. He regretted that such advances were to be made illegal by this Bill. As to the provision to enable captains to carry a supply of clothing on board ship, he was afraid that it would degenerate into a very bad truck system, and there was nothing more to be deprecated. They had heard a marvellous speech by the hon. and learned Gentleman (Sir William Harcourt) as to the bearing of the criminal law on seamen, and he was sure every friend of the British sailor must be grateful to him for stating the case so powerfully. It was the same, however, with regard to the whole legislation relating to seamen. It was really extraordinary what facilities were afforded for getting sailors into prison. At Leith the other day, 22lbs of tobacco were seized, the man who had smuggled it slipped through the hands of the Customs House officers, but the whole of the remainder of the seamen, seven in number, who were on board the vessel were sent to prison for six months, although the magistrates, who were compelled to send them to prison, expressed their thorough belief that these men had not even any guilty knowledge of the smuggled tobacco. It would not be more absurd if an umbrella disappeared from the lobby of one of their clubs, and every member who happened to be present was sent to prison on suspicion of having had something to do with its theft. He hoped an Amendment would be introduced into the Bill to prevent the Customs authorities acting in such an extraordinary manner. They were told that the safety of sea-going ships could not be assured by any one or a series of precautions; therefore they were asked to believe that the proper way to manage their ships was not to adopt any precautions at all. He felt persuaded that if some such load-line as that proposed by the hon. Member for Derby was adopted, it would be more satisfactory to the shipowners of the country than the load-line proposed in this Bill. He therefore trusted means would be found by the President of the Board of Trade to adopt some such load-line.

MR. BATES believed the shipowners of Liverpool and other ports would admit that this Bill was in the right direction, although there were one or two points which might require revision in Committee; those referring to advance notes, for instance. Sailors, from their habits, really could not get on without advance notes; and many of our ships without these notes would be stopped for want of men. Iron used in the construction of ships should be subjected to the Government test No. 1 or No. 2. It had been recently found out that the iron in some ships—injured by a collision—was little better than cast iron. This would not have been the case if the Government test had been applied. He contended that no grain ought to be carried in ships in bulk, but half, at least, of the cargo should be in bags. As to the 25th clause, he submitted that it ought not to stand; for if it did it would be found that some of the provisions in the sub-sections, especially No. 4, held out a premium for the building of bad ships. With some alterations the Bill would be a good one, and he should therefore generally support it.

MR. NORWOOD begged to withdraw his Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Main Question proposed.

MR. D. JENKINS said, that as he had an Amendment on the Paper, he begged to move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion made, and Question proposed. "That the Debate be now adjourned." —(Mr. David Jenkins.)

MR. DISRAELI said, he hoped the hon. Gentleman would not persevere in the Motion, inasmuch as there was, he believed, an understanding on both sides of the House that the debate on the second reading should conclude that evening.

MR. SHAW-LEFEVRE trusted that, if the Bill were now read a second time, ample opportunity for addressing the House upon it would be given on going into Committee.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

CAPTAIN G. E. PRICE said, before the second reading was agreed to, he would support the clauses which had reference to discipline on board ship, and the imprisonment of seamen under certain conditions.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for To-morrow.

SUPREME COURT OF JUDICATURE ACT (1873) AMENDMENT (No. 2) BILL.

(The Lord Chancellor.)

BILL PRESENTED. FIRST READING.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR rose to call attention to the present condition of the Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1873, and to state the course which Her Majesty's Government intend to pursue in relation thereto, and said: My Lords, I have often experienced your Lordships' indulgence when bringing under your notice subjects which did not possess much interest in themselves; and I have no doubt that I shall receive your forbearance to-night when entering into some matters of detail which are familiar to many of your Lordships, but which, at the same time, I feel bound to bring before you in order that you may have a complete and adequate view of the present condition of the legislation as to the Judicature of this country.

My Lords, I must ask you to go back for a moment to the issuing of the Judicature Commission in 1867. My Lords, in that year the Speech from the Throne at the opening of the Session had called the attention of Parliament to the subject of Law Reform, and it had particularly noticed the delays and the pressure of business which were accruing in the Courts of Assize and at the sittings for jury causes in the City of London. My Lords, that notice of the arrears of business in those tribunals was followed in the issuing, by the Government of the late Lord Derby, of the Commission called the Judicature Commission. I have seen lately some observations which have been made on the composition of that Commission and on the manner in which it discharged its work. I had the honour of being Chairman of that Commission, and—speaking for those who were associated with me on it—I venture to say, after some experience of Commissions, that a stronger Commission never was appointed, and that no Commission ever devoted itself with a greater sacrifice of time and labour to the work intrusted to it than the Judicature Commission did from the time of its first meeting till the close of its labours. My Lords, it is said that the Commission did not adopt a proper course in not taking evidence. In reply, I will remind your Lordships that there were on the Commission Judges and members of the Bar who on the questions which it had to consider possessed in their own minds all that evidence could have supplied them with. Beyond the knowledge which they possessed all that evidence would have afforded them would have been matter of opinion. On the knowledge which they so abundantly possessed they made those recommendations which have been so often referred to in the first Report of the Judicature Commission. Their first recommendation was that all the Courts of Law and Equity and the Court of Admiralty and the Court of Probate should be consolidated into one Supreme Court, which should possess the authority and power of all those Courts, and should sit in several Divisions. They recommended, in the next place, that a uniform system of pleading and procedure should be adopted in the Courts constituting the Supreme Court. They recommended, again, that uniformity should be adopted as to the sittings of the Court and as to the vacations. They recommended, in the next place, that there should be a rearrangement of the Circuits and Assizes of the country and that arrangements should be made for the continuous sittings for jury trials in London and Middlesex. And they recommended that as to the administrative department of the law there should be consolidation and simplification of the offices with a view to economy of time and money. Those were their recommendations on the five heads I have mentioned.

But over and above these recommendations there was this further recommendation—that a Court of Appeal should be constituted which should take the place of the Court of Appeal in Chancery and of the Exchequer Chamber. To use the words of the Commission, they recommended that there “should be a Court of Appeal common to all the Divisions of the Supreme Court constantly sitting and easy of access.” They did not contemplate that there should be any change in respect to what is called “intermediate appeal.” They proposed that there should be two appeals—one intermediate and one final; and the recommendation to which I have just referred had reference to the intermediate appeal. The Commission contemplated that the Court of Final Appeal should remain as it then was. That was the Report of the Commission.

My Lords, I pass over the legislation which was attempted in 1871, and come at once to what was done in 1873. The measure introduced in this latter year followed the Report of the Judicature Commission as regards the five heads of recommendations which I have enumerated; but it departed from the Report of the Commission with regard to the subject of appeals. It provided a Court of Appeal which was to be the First and Final Court of Appeal. In other words, it abolished the intermediate Court of Appeal, and constituted a Court going altogether beyond what would be required for an intermediate Court of Appeal. Your Lordships will find it convenient to bear in mind the character of the Court of Appeal constituted by that measure. There were to have been in it five ex officio members—the Lord Chancellor, the Master of the Rolls, the Chiefs of the three Common Law Courts—nine ordinary Judges of Appeal; and, in addition to that judicial staff, persons who had filled high judicial office and were willing to sit as members of that Court of Appeal. My Lords, that Court of Appeal was intended for England only; and my noble and learned Friend (Lord Selborne), who in 1873 filled the place which I have now the honour to occupy, when introducing the measure to your Lordships' House, explained that he did not include Ireland and Scotland, because those countries had separate judicatures of their own, and both countries were satisfied with the arrangement which then existed for the final hearing of the appeals from their Courts. The Bill introduced by my noble and learned Friend passed into law, and the time fixed for its coming into operation was the 1st of November, 1874. But the duty was cast on the Judges of framing before that date a complete code of Rules, based on an outline contained in the Schedule of the Act, for the carrying out of the new system when it came into operation. It was in that state of things that Her Majesty's Government found legislation in regard to Judicature when they came into office at the commencement of last year. They found that one of their first duties was one in connection with these Rules which would be necessary for putting the Act in operation, and they found that it would also be necessary for them to consider what course it was desirable should be taken with respect to final appeals in causes coming from Ireland and Scotland—seeing that no provisions were contained in the Act for that purpose. As the time drew near for the coming in force of the Act, and as the preparation of the Rules was proceeded with, it was ascertained that there were a number of details in the measure in reference to which legislative amendment would be required. It was not to be wondered at that in a measure of such novelty and magnitude various points should arise which were not sufficiently provided for by the various sections of the original Bill. The Government ascertained that not only would the Rules require to be prepared, but that some alteration must be made as regarded the provisions in the Act referring to the position of the Judge of Admiralty and the business assigned to the Court of Admiralty; also with regard to Bankruptcy and with regard to the district registries which were to be established throughout the country. The Government in addressing their attention to the question of final appeal under this Act, and the final appeal which ought to be given in cases coming from Scotland and Ireland, resolved to be guided by three cardinal principles. I state this the more emphatically because to those principles Her Majesty's Government have throughout adhered, and from those principles they consider it to be their duty to not in any way depart. Her Majesty's Government considered in the first place that, though there might be cases where appeals would be so trivial or unimportant as not to deserve encouragement, still as a general principle, a double or second appeal should be granted. The second principle which commended itself to Her Majesty's Government was this—that there ought to be one and the same tribunal of final appeal for England, Ireland, and Scotland. The third principle was that whatever provision might be made for appeals, security should be taken that appeals should be heard before an adequate number of the most skilled and experienced judicial minds that you could at any time procure the service of. Applying these principles—which they conceived had already received the assent of Parliament, the Government considered it to be their duty to proceed on what I may describe as the lines pointed out by the Act of 1873. The manner in which the Government proposed to give effect to the principles which I have enumerated was this—They proposed that what may be called the First Division of the Court of Appeal established by the Act of 1873, should be the tribunal by which all appeals from Ireland and Scotland should be heard; and that it should be also the tribunal before which should be heard by way of second appeal any appeal from the English Courts in which the first Court of Appeal was not unanimous, or should have reversed the judgment of the Court below. If the Bill to which I am referring had received the sanction of Parliament there would have been a second appeal, subject to the check imposed against frivolous proceedings by way of appeal; there would have been one and the same tribunal of final appeal for England, Ireland, and Scotland, and in the constitution of the Court itself there would have been a security that no final appeal would be heard otherwise than before an adequate number of the most skilled and experienced judicial minds that you could at any time procure the services of.

Those being the propositions as regards the Court of Final Appeal, the Bill introduced by Her Majesty's Government contained those other provisions of detail in respect of which legislation was required in order that the Act of 1873 might be brought into operation. My Lords, I am not going through what occurred last Session—I will come to what has happened in the present one. To the Bill of Her Majesty's Government, so far as regarded the amendments which it might introduce in the Act of 1873, no opposition was offered. The opposition to it which arose in your Lordships' House—and I am not stating this for the purpose of raising any controversy, but merely that your Lordships should have a complete view of the case before you—the opposition was to the provisions in the Bill which raised the question of final appeal. The object of the opposition was to repeal the clauses of the Act of 1873 with regard to English appeals and to prevent the passing of the clauses of the Bill with regard to the Scotch and Irish appeals. Now, my Lords, if the proposal of those who took the view held by my noble Friend at the Table (Lord Redesdale) had been limited to the repeal of the sections of the Act of 1873 having reference to English appeals, possibly the Bill of the Government might have gone through this and the other House of Parliament; because, for the accomplishment of the object which the opposition would have had in view, the sanction of the two Houses of Parliament to the repeal of those clauses would have been required, and anything that might have been done here would not have affected the provisions of the Act of 1873 without the consent of the other House of Parliament: but in order to carry the provisions of the Bill relating to Ireland and Scotland the assent of both Houses would have been required. It was for this reason that Her Majesty's Government—adhering to one of the three principles which they had felt it their duty to propose—that there should be one and the same tribunal of final appeal for England, Ireland, and Scotland—when they saw it was obviously impossible to obtain the assent of your Lordships' House to the provisions relating to Scotland and Ireland, felt bound to withdraw the Bill.

My Lords, that being the history of the Judicature Act and the subsequent Bills up to the withdrawal of our Bill of the present Session, I now come to the position in which I found myself when the noble Earl (Earl Granville), on the withdrawal of the Bill, asked me what course the Government proposed to adopt with reference to the Act of 1873. That was a very natural question, and I promised to give it an early reply. I cannot deny that Her Majesty's Government have received a very considerable quantity of advice since that time as to the course which they ought to pursue. My Lords, we have been told that one course which we might adopt would be to allow the Act of 1873 to come into operation as it stands next November. The objections which Her Majesty's Government entertain to that course, and which have led them to decline to take it are these:—If the Act were left to come into operation as it stands on the 1st of November next, it would come into operation with those defects and those imperfections which it was the object of a large part of the Bill introduced during the present Session to remove. But in our minds there is this stronger objection to that course—if it were adopted, it would bring into operation a severance in our appellate system, the effect of which would be to send to one tribunal the final appeals from England, and to another the final appeals from Scotland and Ireland. I say that is a course which Her Majesty's Government naturally declines to take; and, speaking for myself, I will say that I can see nothing which would be so fatal to identity of interests between the three portions of the United Kingdom as to make the Court of Ultimate Appeal for England a different one from the Court of Ultimate Appeal for Scotland and Ireland. Then we have been advised to take another course—namely, to postpone the operation of the Act of 1873 for another year. Now, my Lords, those who offer us this advice seem to me to labour under a very important misapprehension as to the proposals for the amendment of our system of Judicature. They seem to me to look—I will not say merely, but certainly to look mainly—at the question of the ultimate tribunal of Appeal, and nearly, if not altogether, to overlook the great work which the Act of 1873 was in other respects intended to accomplish. My Lords, I have said in this House before, and I now say again—that it would be impossible to over-rate the magnitude of the Act of 1873. Beyond all question, it is the largest measure of law reform which I have ever known to be passed in this country. It covers the whole field of the Judicature of the country, and it pervades every nook and cranny of our judicial arrangements. If the measure were to be postponed, I would ask your Lordships to look at what the consequences would be. I will not say that in expectation of the operation of the Act the arrangements of the Courts are paralyzed; but I will say that in expectation of its coming into operation there is a complete want of the necessary arrangements for the development of our system of Judicature. It was only the other day I had occasion to read with some care the Report of a Commission on the administration of the Courts of Justice presided over by Lord Lisgar. That Report contains most valuable information and most valuable suggestions as to nearly all the offices of the Courts; but in almost every page the Commissioners felt obliged to state that until the Judicature Act comes into operation they will be unable to calculate exactly what will be the amount of work to be done, and what ought to be the changes and retrenchments in the staff of the officers of this or that Court. Almost invariably the Commissioners defer their conclusions till after the coming into operation of the Judicature Act; and finally they recommend that in six months after the date when it shall come into operation there should be a departmental Commission appointed to give effect to the general recommendations they suggest. Again, take the case of the local registries. In the Act of 1873 provision is made for the establishment of these registries. I know nothing which at this moment creates greater interest throughout the country. Applications have been coming from all parts of England during the last two years, asking for the appointment of local Registrars. Again, let me take the business of the Assize Courts. I can well remember what led to the issuing of the Judicature Commission. I remember the late Lord Derby stating that he had read a representation as to the state of things in connection with the Assizes for Lancashire, and he told me that he thought a strong case had been made in reference to the immense amount of business to be done at those Assizes and the deficient arrangements for its discharge. Well, my Lords, lately I myself received a deputation from Lancashire who came up to town to complain that the evils with regard to the business of the Assizes is entirely unredressed and asking that a remedy might be applied. I was obliged to say that although I entirely sympathized with their views, yet until the Judicature Act came into operation it would be impossible for me to say what would be our judicial strength or what could be done in the way of economizing time as expected under that Act, and therefore until then it was in vain to ask for any changes, whether in the way of more frequent Assizes or the sending down of a larger number of Judges. Then take the sittings for jury trials in London and Middlesex. I have not a list before me of the state of business at Guildhall when the time came for closing the sittings after last Term, but I believe I shall not be exaggerating when I say that not fewer than 100 cases remained untried—cases in the highest degree interesting to the mercantile community of that great City, and which are undisposed of from the want of greater judicial strength and the power to continue the sittings. I will not say that this is entirely owing to the fact that the Judicature Act has not come into operation; but I do say that until that Act does come into operation no effective remedy for such a state of things can be applied. Then there is the unsettled question of the exact boundary which ought to be drawn between the jurisdiction of the County Courts and the jurisdiction of the Superior Courts; and in this respect it is impossible to make any change until the Judicature Act is in operation. Besides all this there is the case of Ireland. The system of law and judicature in Ireland being almost the same as the system in England, it is proposed to introduce for Ireland a change similar to that which the Judicature Act will effect in this country; but it is idle to bring in a Bill for Ireland—though one is prepared and ready for introduction—until there is a certainty that, at all events within a limited period, the English Act will actually come into operation.

I now ask your Lordships to turn for a moment to that portion of the Act which is connected with the question of Ultimate Appeal, and in respect of which it appears to me considerations of urgency must be put on a very different footing. What is the case at the present moment with regard to the two great tribunals of Ultimate Appeal—the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council and your Lordships' House? I remember when, not many years ago—only four years ago, when the Act was passed for the appointment of four salaried members of that tribunal—your Lordships were informed that there were at that time in the Council Office in various stages of maturity for hearing upwards of 300 appeals from the Colonies and from India. Your Lordships and Parliament were struck with the magnitude of those arrears, and you passed the Act to which I have referred. My Lords, I find that at the present moment there are in the office of the Judicial Committee, instead of 300 or 400 appeals, about 100 cases as to which appeals have actually been lodged. But when I turn to see what are the arrears of cases waiting for hearing, I find from the official list that for their sittings which commence next week the whole number of cases ready for hearing amounts to ten—six from Bengal, three from the Court of Admiralty, and one from Canada. I think your Lordships will agree with me that the state of things as regards the Judicial Committee is most satisfactory. I now turn to the Business in your Lordships' House. It is somewhat remarkable that the state of legal business in this House is, I will not say without parallel in my remembrance, but I am told by the officers of the House that they do not remember such a state of things before. At the commencement of this Session your Lordships had standing for hearing 24 appeals. Before your Lordships adjourned for the Easter Recess, of these 24, 20 had been heard and decided; one of the remaining four is now under compromise, and one was heard and disposed of to-day. Between the commencement of this Session and Easter, 19 new appeals have been lodged and have to be disposed of; so that your Lordships' House have, in all, to dispose of two appeals remaining over since before Easter, and 19 new appeals set down for hearing—21 in all. My Lords,

The Lord Chancellor

I remember the time when it was regarded as a satisfactory position of affairs that all appeals which were remanets at the beginning of the Session had been heard before its close; but this year your Lordships see that virtually all the appeals set down for hearing at the beginning of the Session were disposed of before Easter. So much for the business; now for the Judges. In addition to the Lord Chancellor, we have had the presence during the hearing of appeals of three noble and learned Lords who are ex-Chancellors, and of my noble and learned Friend the late Lord Chancellor of Ireland. I think your Lordships will not consider that unsatisfactory either as regards the disposal of the cases or the number of the Judges. My Lords, such being the considerations of urgency in respect of different portions of the Judicature Act, what Her Majesty's Government propose is this. They propose for the present to detach what I will call the more urgent part of the Act of 1873 from that part which is not equally urgent; and they propose to introduce a Bill which will provide for all those amendments in matter of details which are necessary to be made before the Act of 1873 can be brought into operation. I shall to-night lay such a Bill on the Table, and ask your Lordships to give it a first reading. I may here add that as considerable interest has been evinced in regard of the Rules which were to supplement the Act of 1873, though I did not, in the first instance, think it necessary to burden a Bill with them; yet, yielding to the anxiety expressed that they should appear at the same time, I propose that the Rules which have been approved by the Judges should be printed in the Schedule of the Bill which I shall lay upon the Table. Those Rules will give the Bill an appearance of bulk, the cause of which your Lordships will now understand. The Act of 1873 would come into operation on the 1st of November if Parliament took no further action with respect to it. I am not without hopes that if Parliament agree to the Bill which I am about to introduce both it and the Act of 1873 may be in operation before that date; and I think it would be a great advantage if the Act could be brought into operation even before the Summer Assizes. That, however, must depend not only on this, but also on the other House of Parliament.

Now, my Lords, some explanation is necessary as to an important provision of the Bill—I mean the proposal for an intermediate Court of Appeal; not only is it of importance, but it is of special importance, when you are making large changes in the judicial system of the country and in the law which is to be administered by the primary Courts. As I mentioned, the recommendation as to appeal contained in the Report of the Judicature Commission was for an intermediate Court of Appeal—a Court of Appeal common to all the Divisions of the Supreme Court, constantly sitting and easy of access. We propose that a Court should be constituted, to consist of five ex officio members—the Lord Chancellor, the Lord Chief Justice, the Master of the Rolls, the Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, and the Chief Baron of the Exchequer. Of course these Judges—I speak more particularly of the three Chiefs of the Common Law Courts—having their primary duties to discharge, cannot be expected to sit constantly in the Court of Appeal—they cannot give more than a portion of their time to this duty, though they will be relieved from sitting in the Exchequer Chamber; but in addition to these five ex officio Judges of the Court of Appeal, there will be five ordinary Judges. You will observe, my Lords, the difference between this proposal and that in the Act of 1873. Under that Act there were to have been nine ordinary members of the Court of Appeal—under our Bill there will be five—the two Lords Justices of the Court of Appeal in Chancery, two of the salaried Members of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council—because I think the state of business before that Committee will admit of two of the paid Members being appointed on the new Court of Appeal—and one other Judge to be appointed in the manner pointed out in the Judicature Act. I cannot but think it of great importance that the Court of Appeal which is to watch and superintend the proceedings of the primary Courts, should not sit in various Divisions. Now, as regards the number of Judges who must be present. We propose that with regard to all decrees and judgments which lawyers understand by the term “final” decrees and judgments, and which may be popularly described as decrees and judgments which dispose of the whole question, the Court of Appeal shall consist of not fewer than three members. With regard to appeals from interlocutory decrees and judgments—decrees and judgments deciding questions of practice, or which do not dispose of the whole of the merits of the case—we propose that there shall be, at least, two Judges present. We know from the state of business in the Court of Chancery that all such decrees and judgments may be disposed of in that way. That being the course we propose for intermediate appeals, your Lordships will ask what is to be done with the question of final appeal. The proposal of Her Majesty's Government is to detach for the present the large and comprehensive provisions of the Judicature Act from the question of the Court of Final Appeal. We propose to ask Parliament to suspend for 12 months the operation of those two clauses of the Act of 1873 which negative or take away the Appellate Jurisdiction of your Lordships' House; we propose, therefore, that during that time, appeals should run, as they run at present, from the intermediate Courts to this House. But we propose that with a view of carefully keeping alive the control of Parliament over the Act of 1873, there shall be no repeal and no alteration of that Act in respect of the provisions relating to Appellate Jurisdiction. Her Majesty's Government desire to present that question in the next Session of Parliament as a separate and distinct question, unembarrassed and unburdened by the numberless questions which arise in the improvement of our general system of Judicature.

I might stop here, but I cannot do so without making one or two further observations. I say here also that I do not wish to stir up a controversy or enter on debatable ground; but I consider it desirable that those whose minds are turned towards the question of a Court of Final Appeal should have before them all the information I have obtained on the subject. I think it extremely important that whenever this question is to be decided, the public and your Lordships should know, as far as I have been able to make observations on the subject, both the extent of the work to be undertaken by any tribunal of Appeal and the principles upon which such a tribunal should be constituted. It may appear somewhat paradoxical to say so, but it has always been my opinion that in regard to the constitution of a Tribunal of Ultimate Appeal the matters generally urged are more of form than of substance. I have always been anxious to secure in any Tribunal of Ultimate Appeal what appears to me to be the substance—the presence of an adequate number of the most competent minds you can obtain. I am not, your Lordships will easily understand, speaking of individuals—I am speaking on a broad question as it has been for 100 years, and as it may be for 100 years to come; and I say I believe that neither in this nor in any other country will you ever find more than a very limited number of persons who, from judicial experience and training, would be desirable, or I may say, competent, for the ultimate decision of great questions of appeal. Whether that tribunal is to be found in your Lordships' House, whether it is to be found in the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, or in a Court which will be neither inside this House nor inside the Privy Council, appears to me to be a matter, I do not say unimportant, but a matter of minor importance. It appears to me to be a matter, perhaps of sentiment, perhaps of prestige, perhaps of traditionary honour and dignity. But I am anxious that those, whoever they may be, who will have to consider the question, should keep alive the broad distinction between what is substance and what is comparatively unsubstantial. My Lords, it was for this reason that before the Committee of your Lordships' House, which sat in 1872, I ventured to propose, and the Committee adopted, a proposal which inside of this House would have secured, I think, a tribunal which would have preserved equally the prestige and the traditionary honour and dignity of the House. It was for this reason, that when my noble and learned Friend (Lord Selborne) introduced his Bill in 1873 I was content with the tribunal which he proposed in that Bill, although it was a tribunal of a different character from that which had been suggested in the Committee. It was for this reason that last Session, in answer to my noble Friend the Chairman of Committees, I stated that in the tribunal which the Government then proposed, I was willing to admit there would be wanting the dignity and prestige which must attach to your Lordships' House; but that there would be secured, on the other hand, the presence of those whose judicial strength would constitute the greatest and best security for a satisfactory disposal of appeals. And, my Lords, I think that is the main and cardinal point to be considered when this question comes to be determined. But I wish to go a little further. I think your Lordships ought to be informed, and ought to bear in your minds exactly what is the work which any Tribunal of Ultimate Appeal will have to discharge in this country. It is very remarkable that if you detach, as we propose you should detach, the question of ultimate appeal from the litigation that may arise before any other tribunal, we are able to tell almost to an exactitude what would be the work that that Tribunal of Ultimate Appeal would have to perform. When I look to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council I find that during the last four years—that is, during the years in which there have been salaried members of the Judicial Committee—there has been an average of 108 appeals disposed of every year. That is a high average—too high an average to be taken as indicating what will have to be done in future years, because four years ago that tribunal having the great arrear of appeals to which I have referred, has had to dispose of more than a normal number of appeals. But I take the number at 108 a-year. Of those appeals there have been 13 from the Admiralty Court. It is not unsafe to suppose that when the Admiralty Courts go to the intermediate Court of Appeal these Admiralty appeals will be reduced by 10 every year. The result will be that, as far as the business of the Judicial Committee is concerned, 98 appeals will have to be disposed of in a year. I find that the average number of appeals disposed of in your Lordships' House in a year is 40. Adding these 40 to the 98 appeals disposed of by the Judicial Committee in a year, there would be 138 appeals to be disposed of in a final stage in this country. Now, how long does it take to dispose of 138 appeals? Your Lordships will be surprised to find how very near a reckoning may be made on that point. I recollect that when Lord Kingsdown presided in the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, the allowance that used to be made was that, taking the rough with the smooth in the course of the year, an appeal took a day. I find that taking the last 10 years of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council—whether it is that counsel have become more elaborate in their arguments or not I do not know—the average is a day and a-third; and in your Lordships' House—probably owing to the same cause and to the interruption of adjournments—the average is a day and three-fourths. For the hearing of 98 appeals in the Judicial Committee 131 days are required, and for the hearing of 40 appeals in this House 70 days are required, which make 201 days altogether; and if you reckon for the Judicial Committee a sitting in the year of 33 weeks of six days each, you have 198 days:—so that the appeals to be disposed of can as nearly as possible be disposed of by a tribunal sitting as one tribunal in the course of the year. I pointed out to your Lordships that in constituting the Court of Intermediate Appeal we propose that there should be only five ordinary Judges. We leave untouched the four other Judges, whose services were taken under the Judicature Act of 1873—I mean the two salaried Judges of the Privy Council and two additional Judges authorized to be appointed under that Act. Now, in whatever form the matter may be dealt with hereafter, it is, at all events, perfectly obvious that Parliament will have even in these materials ample strength to dispose of the amount of appellate business which I have described. I go no farther than this—I do not desire in any way to anticipate the proposals which Her Majesty's Government will deem it right to make next Session on this subject. I have stated to your Lordships as fairly and as fully as I can the amount of work to be done with the proposals we make for the present Session.

My Lords, I will conclude by laying on the Table the Bill to which I have referred. I will ask your Lordships to give it a first reading to-night, and I propose to fix the second reading for Friday next.

A Bill to amend and extend the Supreme Court of Judicature Act 1873, presented by the Lord CHANCELLOR.

LORD SELBORNE: My Lords, there are some observations of my noble and learned Friend which I think I ought not entirely to pass without notice. In the first place, my noble and learned Friend said—and said truly—that what the Judicature Commission recommended as to a Court of Appeal was an Intermediate Court of Appeal, leaving the final appeal as it was at the time. The Judicature Commission were not authorized to deal in any way whatever with the question of the jurisdiction exercised either by your Lordships' House or by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council: and in their Report they noticed that limitation of their powers. Although it is true that the Act of 1873 did, as far as it dealt with final appeals go beyond the recommendation of the Judicature Commission, it cannot, I think, with any accuracy be stated—nor did I understand that my noble and learned Friend intended to convey that meaning—that it departed from the recommendations of the Commission upon a point which it was within the province of that Commission to deal. My noble and learned Friend has stated the three cardinal principles which Her Majesty's Government desire to keep in view in dealing with the question of final appeal—the first of them being that there should be in substance a double appeal, with safe-guards against its abuse; the second, that some Court of Final Appeal should dispose of appeals from all the three branches of the United Kingdom; and the third, that the Court of Final Appeal should be as powerfully constituted as possible. If there be in this respect any difference of opinion between my noble and learned Friend and myself it is rather as to the manner in which effect should be given to those principles, and the meaning and extent of the first of them, than on any other point. As far as the constituting a Court of the greatest possible strength is concerned, I agree with my noble and learned Friend without the least qualification or exception. Indeed, I flatter myself that Parliament arrived at that result when it passed the Judicature Act of 1873; and, further, that it amply provided by its 52nd clause for all that might be necessary in the way either of re-hearing or re-arguing cases before the final appeal came to be pronounced. That section was in these terms:

"Any appeal for any reason may be deemed fit to be re-argued before decision, or be re-heard before final judgment, and may be so re-argued or re-heard before the greater number of Judges if the Court of Appeal think fit so to direct."

My noble and learned Friend, in his Bill of last year, proposed to modify that provision by defining the particular cases—namely, those in which the Court of Appeal had differed, or those in which they had reversed judgments, as cases in which a second hearing should be deemed right. When that modification was proposed, though I differed in opinion from my noble and learned Friend, and held that the object he had in view was sufficiently met in the Act of 1873, I was willing to waive that difference of opinion—I did not look upon it as a difference in substance. Passing to another branch of the subject, I may say that I never concealed my opinion as to the desirability of having one Court of Final Appeal for the three branches of the United Kingdom, or that this result would have been ultimately arrived at if the arrangements under the Act of 1873 worked—as I fully believed they would work—well and successfully. At the same time I thought that time and experience might be necessary for that purpose, and that we could, without any serious inconvenience, wait until the matured opinion of Ireland and Scotland had declared itself in favour of their accession to the arrangement which had been adopted in England. My noble and learned Friend said, when I first introduced the Judicature Bill in 1873, that he thought I had done wisely in not proposing in that measure to deal with the subject of Scotch and Irish Appeals; and, on a later occasion, when the noble Lord the Chairman of Committees proposed, during the same Session, to affirm the proposition that there should be one Court of Final Appeal for all parts of the United Kingdom, my noble and learned Friend gave his reasons for not then adopting that conclusion, and showed that there might be sufficient cause for treating the question as to Scotland and Ireland as separate and distinct from that as to England. I gather from what my noble and learned Friend has now said that his present opinion is hardly in accordance with that view; but I have at least the comfort of knowing that our views were not far at variance when, in 1873, I explained my reasons for not including the Scotch and Irish appeals in the Bill which in the course of the Session became the Judicature Act. I do not refer to this fact as if I thought that any man is always bound to adhere to an opinion which he has once expressed upon an important subject; but as, at all events, going some way to justify the course which the late Government took in order, if possible, to solve a difficult and important question, if it was to be solved by means of any alteration of the jurisdiction of your Lordships' House. I do not believe that if it had then been proposed to establish one Court of Final Appeal for all three branches of the United Kingdom your Lordships would have been induced to part with your whole jurisdiction—because at that time Scotland and Ireland, which had a right to be consulted, had not given expression to such a kind of opinion as would have justified that course. It will be in the recollection of your Lordships that when the Bill went to the House of Commons, Notice was given of a Motion which would have had the effect of extending the provisions of the Bill to Scotland and Ireland. At that stage of the measure the then Government for the first time received representations purporting to represent the general feeling of the Judges and the Bar of Scotland and of Ireland, in consequence of which they felt themselves compelled to consent to an extension of their original proposal.—[3 Hansard, cxxvi. 1561.] On this being made known to your Lordships, my noble and learned Friend who is now the occupant of the Woolsack objected to the manner in which the change was proposed to be made, and for that reason it was not possible to persevere with it. I cannot but express my deep regret that this premature proposal was then made; for it was contrary to my original judgment as to the best manner of dealing with the question, and I believe that if no such step had been taken at that time it would have ultimately resulted in the spontaneous accession of Scotland and Ireland to the new system. The course was forced upon the Government of the day, and I think I am justified in complaining of those whose pressure then contributed to that step, but who have since gone round to the opposite view.

I do not think the time has come for examining in detail the proposals contained in the Bill which my noble and learned Friend now asks us to read the first time; but my noble Friend will excuse me if I venture to suggest a certain degree of apprehension that his Intermediate Court of Appeal may be too weakly constituted for the purpose of working the system embodied in the Judicature Act. It will be in the recollection of your Lordships that representations full of alarm were made to this House by an extraordinarily large number of barristers practising in the Courts of Equity, to the effect that in the fusion of the administration of Law and Equity sufficient consideration would not be given to the principles of Equity. I could not but think that in this view less than justice was done to the members of the Judicial Bench, in supposing that they could neither administer nor acquire a knowledge of the principles of Equity. I felt the more confident on this because I had had large experience of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, and had seen how Judges educated either in Equity or at Common Law in the English Courts were able, to the satisfaction of India and the Colonies to administer many branches of law with which they had not originally any acquaintance. Another answer made to these representations was that the keystone of the whole arch was the Court of Appeal, in which would meet together the most experienced representatives both of Equity and Common Law—among them being, as not the least important elements, the Lord Chancellor for the time being and the other noble Lords who had previously filled that office. Their assistance would be most valuable to the Court of Appeal upon all important questions affecting the principles of Equity as they were to be administered after the fusion of the two systems. That Intermediate Court of Appeal will now, as my noble and learned Friend has pointed out, have to discharge in the main the great business of appeal, the ultimate business coming before the Final Court of Appeal being comparatively small in amount. One reason why so few cases come to your Lordships at present is that the existing Courts of Intermediate Appeal are powerfully constituted, and in the great majority of cases give satisfaction to the suitors. If, therefore, there is to be this intermediate appeal followed by a final appeal, it is of the utmost importance that the Intermediate Court should be powerfully constituted with respect to the representation of the principles of Equity. But when I look at the mode in which it is proposed to be constituted what do I find? The Lord Chancellor is to be ex officio a member; but as long as all the business of the final appeal is to be done in this House the Lord Chancellor will be here and not there. As regards the Master of the Rolls too, he must ordinarily be occupied for the most part in his own Court, and can only occasionally be in this Court of Appeal. There remain the Members of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. Now I have the very highest opinion of the able and learned gentlemen now serving upon the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. I quite believe that any one of them would be capable of dealing with equitable cases in the most satisfactory manner. But in order to ensure that full confidence which it is desirable that the profession and the public should have in the constitution of the Court, it is certainly important that a sufficient number of its Judges should have that special experience which is afforded by practice, while at the Bar, in the Courts of Equity. Of those four Judges only two have been brought up in the practice of that system. Altogether this new Court of Appeal is weaker as to Equity than under the circumstances I am bound to say I think desirable. There was one subject on which I think I collected the intention of my noble and learned Friend, although he did not quite clearly express himself respecting it—I mean the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. I take it for granted that it is the intention of my noble and learned Friend to retain the present system of the Judicial Committee and its jurisdiction unaltered.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: That is so.

LORD SELBORNE: The jurisdiction of the Committee with respect to ecclesiastical cases, therefore, remains. I do not know whether that is a public misfortune, but it will carry small comfort to those who were so anxious to destroy the jurisdiction of the Privy Council in ecclesiastical cases. I have observed, on the list of the so-called Committee formed for the restoration of the jurisdiction of this House in English Appeals, the name of at least one noble Lord who last year manifested great anxiety to put an end, at the earliest possible period, to the functions of the Judicial Committee as a Court of Ecclesiastical Appeal. I congratulate that noble Lord on the success of his labours; and, if I might presume to offer him my advice, it would be to hesitate another time before he shows equal zeal for the pursuit of two incompatible objects at the same time. It is only due to my noble and learned Friend that I should state my opinion of the course which the Government have adopted. Had I been in his position I would have preferred to let the Act of 1873 come into operation, rather than suspend it either partially or altogether—for I thoroughly and cordially agree with what has been said as to the evil of prolonging a transition state in our judicial system. Under the circumstances, I am certainly glad that my noble and learned Friend has not encouraged the expectation that the Judicature Act can never come into operation. With reference to the particular arrangements of my noble and learned Friend, I think it better to reserve any further observations which I may have to make till a future stage of the Bill. I may only observe in conclusion that it is to me very satisfactory to find that my noble and learned Friend has not, once and for all, extinguished the hopes which have been entertained of a settlement of this great subject, on the footing of the arrangements made in 1873, but that he has taken a course which will refer to the deliberate judgment of the country the great question whether or not we are to have the best possible Court of Appeal without regard to sentimental or political considerations.

LORD PENZANCE regarded the course which his noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack had taken to extricate them from the difficulties arising out of the legislation of 1873 as decidedly, and beyond all question, the best which was open to them under the circumstances. He believed the Act of 1873, as to the greater part of its provisions, would have worked enormous benefits to the community—both in diminishing the delay and reducing the expense—and he believed no benefit could arise from delaying the operation of the Act for another year. But the Act contained one provision which he had always held to be most detrimental—namely, that it created one single Court in England, which would hear between 400 and 500 appeals a-year, which would pronounce judgments that were absolutely irreversible for all time, except through an Act of Parliament, and which would decide the law for ever in all cases of a like nature. A Court possessed of that power would be capable of doing an inconceivable amount of harm to the Judicature of this country. His noble and learned Friend, when he introduced the Bill last year, endeavoured to remedy that evil by providing that there should be a second appeal. There was a considerable difference between the proposal then made by his noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack and that which was made by his noble and learned Friend who had just spoken, in 1873. Under the Act of 1873, there was to be no second hearing, and the judgment of the Court was to be conclusive; unless it was determined by the Court itself that a case should be re-heard—no power was given to the suitor to insist on such an appeal. That was a cardinal provision in the Act of 1873, and it was that provision which took away the ultimate appeal to the House of Lords. Now, however, there was a very general opinion entertained that there ought to be a second appeal, as a matter of right, at the election of the suitor against whom the decision happened to be given, and not merely at the option of the Court. As to the cases of Scotland and Ireland, it was argued that it was unfair to propose the adoption of one system for them, and of another for England; and that if one Court of Appeal was good for English suitors, it must be equally good for those from the other Kingdoms—that was how the matter, as it affected Ireland and Scotland was put; and the bringing of those two countries as regarded a Court of Appeal into the same category with England was not, therefore, placed upon the footing which his noble and learned Friend, who had just sat down, stated. He confessed, he might add, that he had heard with great satisfaction that his noble and learned Friend (Lord Selborne) was pleased with the speech which had been delivered by the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack on a former occasion, because last year he had taken the opportunity of reading to his noble and learned Friend some remarks of his own when introducing the Judicature Bill, in which he pointed out, in regard to the proposal for bringing Scotland and Ireland into the same category as England, that it was desirable some delay should occur, and some experience of the new Court of Appeal be obtained, before any such proposal was adopted. Yet, notwithstanding those remarks, his noble and learned Friend last year supported a proposal to extend to Ireland and Scotland at once, and without experience of its working, the very same system which was to be applied to this country. His noble and learned Friend had, he thought, very little ground for complaining of the course which had been taken by the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack on the subject. With respect to the immediate point at issue that evening, he concurred with his noble and learned Friend in thinking that his noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack would do well to reconsider whether the Court with which it was proposed to begin would be strong enough for the work which would come before it. He believed he might add that the effect of the decisions of the new Court would be very much greater if the splitting up of the Court of Appeal into two or three separate sections were not resorted to. He should like to see one Court of sufficient strength to secure for its decisions that weight and authority with the country which it was so desirable should exist. On the whole, the plan of the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack was one which, in his opinion, would give great satisfaction to the country.

LORD HATHERLEY said, he was glad to find that a question the settlement of which had been so long impeded by political feeling was now discussed with the single view to the establishment of as efficient a Court of Appeal as possible. He must, however, protest against the continuance of the delay in the constitution of such a Court. Under the existing system there might be one decision of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council on an appeal from Australia, and the House of Lords might arrive at a different conclusion on an appeal from home; and one of the best arguments in favour of having one general appellate jurisdiction for the whole Empire was the advantage of avoiding the conflicting decisions that might very well occur between the Privy Council and the House of Lords. It was a great pity that such a state of things should be allowed to continue to exist, and it was disappointing to all law reformers that a measure which proposed to remedy it should be thrown over. If ever there was a measure that had been thoroughly and exhaustively considered, it was the Act of 1873. As to the cases of Scotland and Ireland, much had been said as to the weight of authority among lawyers being against the transference of its jurisdiction from the House of Lords; but those who could give the best evidence on the subject were the leading counsel accustomed to practice before the House as a Court of Appeal, and in that respect no persons could furnish more valuable testimony than his noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack and the noble and learned Lord who had preceded him (Lord Selborne) because of their great experience. Without any feeling of acrimony towards anyone concerned in that matter, he entered a protest against a Bill which had been introduced after so much consideration, and for which even its opponents must admit so much could be said, being entirely dropped—simply on the threat of a Motion that was never made, and without a discussion in that House, and without anybody knowing who those were who had set in motion the peculiar committees that had been formed on that subject. It was deeply to be regretted that under those circumstances the whole matter was to be postponed; and now he was afraid that it might be postponed indefinitely, because ultimately the Government might still further change its mind, and what had been done might be absolutely reversed. With regard to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, he had himself brought in a Bill which led to the appointment of four Judges to that tribunal. The Bill was made a temporary one—for two years only—because it was thought to be so certain that some measure constituting a new Court of Appeal would pass the Legislature in a short time. Happily, however, that expectation did not prevent their remedying the grievance under which Indian suitors laboured, and he was gratified at finding that the appointment of those four Judges to the Judicial Committee under that Act had cleared away a mass of Indian appeals and placed the business of the Committee in a satisfactory state. That was a great satisfaction to his mind, because he had been determined that that Act should be carried into effect, although he had met with a good deal of difficulty in doing it. The noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack had the justice to say that those Judges disposed of 108 appeals in the year, and he had not heard a word of complaint on the part of the suitors of that Court. One word as to the Bill which the noble and learned Lord proposed to introduce. There was a difference of opinion in the profession as to whether the Rules that were framed should be incorporated in an Act of Parliament. For himself, he thought that by taking that course a rigidity that was undesirable would be given to Rules which would require to be modified from time to time as experience and the necessities of mankind required. The noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack said that he specially aimed at obtaining a Court of Appeal composed of the utmost judicial experience obtainable; but the proposal of his noble and learned Friend would hardly secure that object, because it would take the three Chiefs of the Common Law Courts, who in almost every instance were chosen from the Law Officers of the Crown, and who were therefore of limited judicial experience. He differed entirely, however from the noble and learned Lord as to the necessity of previous judicial experience. Experience gained by practice before the Judges was very valuable in all cases. The late Lord Kingsdown had no judicial experience before he sat in that Appellate Court which his judgments had made famous; and his noble and learned Friend the late Lord Chancellor (Lord Selborne) had no judicial experience before he occupied the Woolsack with so much distinction.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, he wished to say a few words to prevent misunderstanding. With regard to the Chiefs of the Superior Courts of Common Law not having had any judicial experience, he should have thought that the Lord Chief Justice of the Court of Queen's Bench had had about as long judicial experience as any person in this Kingdom; and that, also, the judicial experience of the Lord Chief Baron of the Exchequer had not been inconsiderable. The noble and learned Lord who spoke last (Lord Hatherley) however, had entirely misunderstood him. When he referred to the necessity of judicial experience, he was speaking of a Court not yet constituted—a Court of Final Appeal—and the manner in which its members ought to be selected. The Court of which the Chiefs of Common Law were members was the Court of Intermediate Appeal, and that he had said nothing about. The noble and learned Lord was also under a misapprehension as to the Rules. The noble and learned Lord did not seem to be aware that the Act of 1873, which was the law of the land at present, had 60 odd Rules in a Schedule, and those Rules did not form clauses of the Act, but were called Rules of Court, which, after the passing of the Act, the Judges would have power to alter. All that was now proposed was to add to those Rules certain other Rules, which it was necessary to make, and to put them all into shape in a consolidated form. In other words, the Schedule of the Act of 1873 would be repealed, and be replaced by another Schedule, containing the same Rules with additional ones. In regard to another matter, he wished to point out that 33 weeks were by those Rules to constitute the judicial year; and although he did not expect that every member of the Court of Appeal would sit on all the 198 days, yet he thought that such a Court ought to be constituted in a way which would allow to individual members the amount of relaxation they required without interfering with the regular course of the sittings. As to the general question of the jurisdiction of this House, views had been attributed to him to which he had never given utterance. His opinion as to that jurisdiction was expressed in the Report of the Committee which sat in 1873, and by the expressions in that Report he fully abided. They were expressions favourable to the manner in which the House had exercised its jurisdiction, and his noble and learned Friend had voted with him in favour of that Report.

LORD HATHERLEY said, he had not so voted.

Lord Hatherley

THE LORD CHANCELLOR referred to the official paper in proof of what he stated.

LORD HATHERLEY said he proposed a separate Report.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR replied that that separate Report had been withdrawn, and that the noble and learned Lord then voted with him. Allusion had been made to what he said in 1873 about the course taken by Lord Selborne in not including Scotland and Ireland in the Bill of that year. He would be the first man in the world to admit that he saw reason to change an opinion which he might have on a former occasion expressed. In the present instance, however, he saw no such reason. He said in 1873 that he thought his noble and learned Friend took a very wise course in confining the Bill to England. He was aware that further legislation would be necessary before the measure came into operation, and it was in his belief that in 1874, Scotland and Ireland would be found willing to come in. This would, in all probability, have been the result, but for the sudden and somewhat unhappy change of opinion which had taken place. The remarks he made in 1873 were not really inconsistent with what he maintained to be the principle on which any new Court of Appeal should be constituted—namely, that it should embrace the Three Kingdoms.

BOARD OF NORTHERN LIGHTHOUSES.

QUESTION.

DR. CAMERON asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether his attention has been called to an appointment recently made by the Board of Northern Lighthouses to the secretaryship to that Board; whether an attempt or attempts had been made by that Board, or some of its members, prior to the resignation of the last secretary, to obtain the sanction of the Board of Trade to a larger salary than had hitherto been paid in the case of newly appointed secretaries; whether, during the absence on various occasions of the last secretary his duty was satisfactorily performed by another official of the Board, who was a candidate for the appointment; and, whether there were any reasons for appointing to the office an advocate of no experience in the work, and overlooking the claims of an experienced servant?

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY: Sir, my attention has been called to this subject by the Commissioners of Northern Lighthouses, who have reported to me that they have recently filled up the vacancy in the office of secretary, caused by the retirement, after 49 years' service, of Mr. Cuninghame. Prior to that gentleman's retirement, the Commissioners endeavoured to induce the Board of Trade to increase the salary of future secretaries beyond the amount which the Board had recommended. The amount recommended by the Board of Trade and the amount desired by the Commissioners were both in advance of the salary paid to Mr. Cuninghame when first appointed secretary. The Commissioners inform me that during the absence of the secretary, the routine business of the office was done by one of the clerks, but the duties of the office of secretary were not discharged by the official referred to in the Question. The Commissioners state that a large majority of them considered the gentleman recently appointed to possess the highest qualifications in every respect for the office, and it was their act not appointing the official referred to.

EDUCATION (SCOTLAND) ACT 1872.

QUESTION.

SIR GEORGE DOUGLAS asked the Lord Advocate, Whether it is his intention during the present Session to take any steps to amend "The Education (Scotland) Act, 1872," with the view of rendering more clear the meaning of its clauses, and thereby putting a stop to the litigation which is so general, and which is interrupting the harmony between School Boards and schoolmasters?

THE LORD ADVOCATE: Sir, several applications have been made for the purpose of obtaining amendment of the Education (Scotland) Act, 1872. I have submitted these to the Government, and the communication which I am authorized to make to these applications and to the Question of my hon. Friend is, that as the Act has come into operation so lately, the most expedient course will be to wait until the Government has had longer experience of the working of the Act before they determine to introduce a Bill for the purpose of amending its clauses. It is matter of regret that the litigation referred to by my hon. Friend should exist between the school boards and the schoolmasters, but the decisions of the Courts in these cases may render it unnecessary to proceed with certain of the proposed Amendments; and it is to be hoped that, in the meantime, a spirit of conciliation may prevent further litigation between those upon whose harmonious acting so much of the success of the schools depends.

MINES—(BELGIUM AND PRUSSIA).

QUESTION.

MR. KNOWLES asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, If he has obtained the information asked for on Monday the 27th July 1874, namely, if he will lay before the House any information which can be obtained through Her Majesty's diplomatic representatives in Belgium and Prussia as to the functions of the ministers of mines in those countries; whether the inspectors employed act as cheque viewers as well as inspectors on behalf of the State; what are the salaries of such inspectors; and, whether in those countries coal and other mines are owned by the State; and, if so, in what manner those Governments lease their mines, whether at a royalty rent or at a per centage on actual profits, and at what average royalty or per centage; and, if so, when he will lay such information before the House?

MR. BOURKE, in reply, said, that information on the subject was contained in a Parliamentary Paper which had been laid on the Table for sanction. The answer to the first part of the Question was to be found on the first page, and the answer to the other parts on the second page of that Paper.

SPAIN—CARTHAGENA CLAIMS.

QUESTION.

MR. RICHARD asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, What steps have been taken by Her Majesty's Government to bring under the notice of the Spanish Government the claims of the English residents at Carthagena for losses sustained by them during the insurrection and siege of that city; and, whether there is any prospect of a speedy settlement of those claims?

MR. BOURKE: Sir, correspondence respecting these claims passed last year between Mr. Layard and the Spanish Government. Since the accession of the present King he had again called attention to the matter, and inquiry into these claims has been promised; and Mr. Layard was informed on the 11th of March last, that they had been referred to the Ministers of the Interior and Marine. The position taken up by Her Majesty's Government has been that the British claims should be dealt with on the same principle as the German claims, for which compensation has been rendered.

INTERNATIONAL OBLIGATIONS—GERMANY AND BELGIUM.—QUESTION.

MR. SANDFORD asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether any complaints on the part of the German Government against that of Belgium for the neglect of its international obligations have been communicated to the English Government; and, if they have, whether they have any objection to lay the Papers relating to them upon the Table of the House?

MR. BOURKE: I see, Sir, on the Paper another Question upon this subject, proposed to be asked me by the hon.

Member for Wexford County (Mr. O'Clery), and with the permission of the House I will answer that Question at the same time that I answer the Question put by my hon. Friend. Her Majesty's Government are aware that a communication has been addressed by the German Government to the Belgian Government, calling attention to certain matters in regard to which the German Government think the Belgian Government has not fully performed its international duties. A reply to that communication has been sent by the Belgian Government to the Government of Germany. Copies of these documents have been received at the Foreign Office; but they have been communicated to the Foreign Office confidentially, and, under those circumstances, it is impossible to make them public. I may add that neither by the German nor Belgian Government has any appeal been made, in this correspondence, to the Guaranteeing Powers.

UNITED STATES—THE TREATY OF WASHINGTON—CANADIAN LOBSTERS—BRITISH COLUMBIA.—QUESTION.

SIR ARTHUR MONCK asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether it is true that the Government of the United States have imposed a Duty upon the cans in which canned lobsters are imported into that country from the Dominion of Canada; whether the imposition of that Duty does not amount practically to a Duty upon the lobsters, and is not an infraction of the Treaty of Washington, which provides for the free importation of fish into the United States from Canada; and, whether it is true that the United States Government refuse to admit British Columbia to the advantages of the Treaty of Washington on the plea that she was not incorporated with the Dominion of Canada until after the ratification of the said Treaty, or on any other plea?

MR. BOURKE: No communications, Sir, have been received at the Foreign Office on the subject either from Sir Edward Thornton or the Governor General of Canada. Her Majesty's Government have therefore no official information upon the subject. I am told by my hon. Friend the Under Secretary for the Colonies that these matters have been adverted to in the Dominion House of Commons; but, as I have stated, no representation on the subject has been made from that country. With regard to the latter part of the Question, I cannot say whether the course taken is an infraction of the Treaty of Washington, so far as it provides for the free importation of fish from Canada.

ARMY ESTIMATES—THE SUPERANNUATION LIST.—QUESTION.

CAPTAIN NOLAN asked the Paymaster General, If, in Vote 24, Army Estimates, for 1875-6, the first name on the Superannuation List is that of an officer who died in February, 1874?

MR. STEPHEN CAVE: Yes, Sir, it is so. I may say that the Army Estimates are prepared in the War Office, and not in the Paymaster General's Office, but to save trouble I have made the necessary inquiries. The facts are these—Major Adams's pension was granted after the Estimates for 1874-5, Vote 24, were prepared, and, therefore, could not appear therein. But as the Act requires that the names of all persons granted superannuations shall be laid before the House, it was necessary to include the name and pension in the Estimates for 1875-6; and as Major Adams died a few days after being placed on the Pension List, the amount is included in the £8,808 8s. 6d. deducted from the Vote for allowances which have ceased since the date of the last Estimate. It is, in fact, a mere record of the Grant.

FREEMASONS (IRELAND).—QUESTION.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, When the Return, "Freemasons (Ireland)," granted by the House on March 12th, will be in the hands of Members?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH, in reply, said, that owing to the form in which the Return had been ordered, it had been sent in by the Clerk of the Peace made up only to the year 1866, and it was thought necessary to refer again to that officer, in order that the whole Return should be supplied. He must say there had been some unnecessary delay, but it was not due to the Irish Government: he, however, hoped the Return would be ready before the debate on the Peace Preservation Bill came on next Thursday week.

COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN LOANS—SIR HENRY JAMES—THE PARAGUAYAN LOAN.—OBSERVATIONS.

LORD CLAUD HAMILTON: Sir, I have received a telegram from the hon. Baronet the Member for East Devonshire (Sir Lawrence Palk) stating that he is unable to be present in the House this evening to put a Question to the hon. and learned Member for Taunton (Sir Henry James), which stands on the Paper in his (Sir Lawrence Palk's) name. But I understand that the form of the Question, as originally given, was by your direction, Sir, materially altered; and therefore I think it better on behalf of my hon. Friend, as he cannot be aware of the alteration made in it, that the Question should be deferred until Monday next.

MR. SPEAKER: It is right that I should state to the House why the terms of this Question have been altered on my authority. The Question, as originally presented, embraced the account of a solicitor for certain charges in his client's bill of costs, and all those charges so embraced in the solicitor's account which referred to the hon. and learned Member for Taunton have been allowed to stand; but such portions of the account as were the solicitor's own charges, and of which the hon. and learned Member could have no personal knowledge, have, by my authority, been struck out.

SIR HENRY JAMES: Mr. Speaker, I have to express my regret, under the circumstances, to which I am sure the House will allow me to advert—that the Question of the hon. Baronet the Member for East Devonshire was communicated to the public Press before it could have appeared on the Notice Paper of this House—I have also to appeal to that fairness which I am sure the noble Lord the Member for King's Lynn would be the first to display, and to ask him whether he has not the authority of the hon. Baronet to put the Question to me in the shape in which it now stands on the Paper?

LORD CLAUD HAMILTON: Sir, the terms of my hon. Friend's telegram were "Put the Question to-night, or postpone it." He was not, I believe, aware, when he sent the telegram, that it had been altered; but after what has fallen from the hon. and learned Member for Taunton, I think I could not do otherwise than put it. I therefore ask the hon. and learned Member, Whether he was professionally engaged as counsel for the plaintiffs in a case relating to the Paraguay Loan in the Court of Exchequer, entitled "Cracroft and Ohlsen v. Waring Brothers;" and, whether, if so, his client's bill of costs, which has been paid, dated 5th of May 1874, contained the following items:—Attending Sir Henry James with brief, 13s. 4d.; paid his fee and clerks thereon, £132 6s.; attending him to appoint consultation, with fee, £2 16s. 2d.?

SIR HENRY JAMES: Sir, I have to thank the noble Lord for kindly acceding to my request. I am quite sure that the absence of the hon. Baronet the Member for East Devonshire is attributable only to unavoidable circumstances. At the same time, I must repeat my expression of regret that the hon. Member should have thought it necessary, after the answer I gave last night, to have communicated this Question in the form in which it appeared in the public Press before he put it on the Notice Paper. I now beg permission of the House, first, to answer the Question as it stands. I believe that on the 15th of February, 1874, when I had the honour of occupying the position of one of the Law Officers of the Crown, I did receive a brief in a cause in respect of the right of certain persons to recover a sum of money for work and labour done in relation to a Paraguayan Loan. I am sorry I cannot afford fuller information on the subject; first, because the circumstances have somewhat passed from my memory, and, also, because the cause was never tried. The matter was made a subject of private arrangement before the time for trial. In relation to the second part of the Question, I think the House will at once see that I am not likely to be cognizant of the contents of any bill of the attorney who instructed me; but it appears to me exceedingly likely that some such items did appear in the attorney's bill. I have now answered the Question in the terms in which it is put, and I hope, under the circumstances, that the House will allow me to add a few words on the way in which it was framed. From the way in which it has been put—from its repetition and publication—I hope the House will grant me at least that personal indulgence. I am anxious now only to say that in determining to bring the Motion in relation to Foreign Loans before the House I had no communication of any kind or description, direct or indirect, by way of request or influence, with any person whatever connected with that suit. In fact, I gave Notice of that Motion, on my determination to make it, without being influenced by any person whatever. I brought forward that Motion only in the hope—I may be wrong—but in the hope that I might call attention to what I felt to be a great and growing evil affecting the public; and I think I am entitled to ask from the hon. Baronet the Member for East Devonshire, that if he intends to suggest in this Question that in bringing forward this Motion I have been influenced by any other consideration than that which I deemed due to the public, he will afford me an opportunity of giving a refutation to any facts that are in his knowledge, and not content himself with insinuating that which he does not openly declare.

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE, in rising to call attention to the scheme for the enlargement and improvement of the National Gallery as provided for by Act of Parliament in the year 1866, and to the present condition of the works which have, in consequence, been undertaken, said: There was a time when questions like the one which I am to-night about to bring under the notice of the House were very popular here, and produced animated conversations, and I trust that the present Parliament will take an interest in them not inferior to that of its predecessors. The National Gallery especially has been discussed time out of mind, although, I am sorry to say, it has too often been fought over in the interests of some Party triumph. I can assure the House that it will be in no such spirit that I shall to-night enter on the first artistic debate of the existing Parliament. On the contrary, I shall treat the question of the National Gallery as one which has already become matter of history. England, unlike any other country, I believe, in civilized Europe, possessed no National Gallery, properly speaking, till about 50 years ago, when the Angerstein Collection was purchased. Shortly after, the building which is now the National Gallery was erected in Trafalgar Square, and at that time it seemed to be so much in excess of the needs of the case that its eastern wing was handed over for the use of the Royal Academy, which continued to occupy it till a few years ago. In time, the National Gallery outgrew its small lodgings in the western part of that building, and it then became a pressing question whether the actual edifice should be enlarged, or a new one constructed. In 1864, during the Government of the late Lord Palmerston, and when my right hon. Friend the Member for South Hampshire (Mr. Cowper-Temple) filled the office of First Commissioner of Works, a plan was prepared for the construction of a new National Gallery on the area of Burlington House and Gardens, now occupied partly by the Royal Academy and partly by the University of London, and it was generally understood that if that plan had been carried out the whole of the building in Trafalgar Square would have been surrendered to the Royal Academy. The frustration of that arrangement will, I now believe, be ultimately advantageous to the cause of Art, always supposing that the actual project is realized without mutilation; but, at the period, I much regretted it, for it would certainly have saved a great loss of time and considerable expense. I do not ask why it did not approve itself to the Parliament of that day. The House of Commons rejected it, and the Government was obliged to withdraw the proposal, and it was generally understood that the National Gallery should stop in Trafalgar Square. This brings me to the present state of the question. In 1866, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Hampshire, being still First Commissioner of Works, brought in a Bill for the purchase of the land which was considered necessary for the "enlargement and improvement of the National Gallery;" and on the 6th of August, 1866, a change of Government having taken place, and the Conservatives being in office, that Bill received the Royal Assent. I wish particularly to call attention to the words "enlargement and improvement of the National Gallery" as defining the object of that measure; for they are the very Magna Charta of my present claim. Parliament then deliberately declared that the National Gallery required to be enlarged and improved, by passing an Act for the purpose. Parliament also found the money for the acquisition of the land indicated in that Act, which has become the property of the nation, at an outlay of about £140,000. My plea, then, is that the country should have its money's worth, and that upon this £140,000 of purchased land shall be constructed a National Gallery alike worthy of the object, worthy of the Empire, and worthy of this great capital. Simultaneously with settling the site, steps had been taken to invite plans and prepare a scheme of limited competition, on the part of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Hampshire, who invited selected architects to contend. In the meantime, my right hon. Friend had quitted office, and was succeeded by my noble Friend the present Postmaster General (Lord John Manners). The terms of competition had been arranged by the noble Lord's Predecessor; but the choice of judges was his own work. They were Lord Hardinge; my noble Friend the Member for Haddingtonshire (Lord Elcho); Sir William Boxall, at the time Director of the National Gallery, and himself an eminent artist; that distinguished architect, the late Sir William Tite; Mr. Redgrave, the Royal Academician; Mr. William Russell, a trustee of the National Gallery; Mr. Gambier Parry, one of our first amateur artists; Mr. David Brandon, an architect of great repute; and myself. We met, and came to a decision which, at the time, created some discontent, though it was an unreasonable discontent, for it was expected that the judges would have recommended that some particular design should be carried out. It is true that we did not absolutely recommend that any particular design should be carried out; but we did what was practically as good, and, indeed, as I should personally contend, much better: for we indicated the man whom we thought most competent to do the work, thus practically securing the reward for the worthiest, whilst we untied the hands who were interested in the result, to modify the plan according to circumstances, and we did not fetter employers and employed to crude first thoughts. The competition was a double one, for it invited each competitor to furnish two plans—one for an alteration of the present National Gallery, and the other for the construction of a new National Gallery. For altering the present National Gallery, Mr. Murray, a most meritorious architect, was recommended as having produced a plan which displayed the greatest architectural merit in carrying out that particular object. But for the construction of a new National Gallery—that which the judges themselves, and the public whom they served, felt to be the only right, complete, and satisfactory thing to do—the name of Mr. Barry was mentioned as the architect whose design carried with it "the greatest amount of architectural merit." At the same time, we recommended neither Mr. Murray's nor Mr. Barry's design as it stood for execution. It was very clear that in making that award we indicated our opinion that the Government would act most wisely and consistently in giving Mr. Barry the employment, while we did not wish to fetter either the Government or Mr. Barry by pressing the execution of a plan which, full as it was of merit, seemed capable of improvement. The judges accompanied their award with certain recommendations as to matters of convenience, beauty, comfort, and other points which occurred to them as being necessary to be taken into consideration by those who were to be in charge of the construction of the new National Gallery. The Report of the judges was dated the 28th of February, 1866, and was transmitted to my noble Friend the present Postmaster General. On the 5th of August, in the same year, the Trustees of the National Gallery, having been invited to give their opinion on the subject, drew up a most valuable Report, containing recommendations emanating from their own private experience, bearing upon the building of a new National Gallery. On the 16th of June, 1868, the noble Lord had before him the judges' recommendation of Mr. Barry as the man who had produced the best design, as well as the various Papers and suggestions which related either to the general question or to Mr. Barry's plan, which plan, though not satisfactory as a final design, was a most valuable first sketch. Having all these documents before him on that day, my noble Friend appointed Mr. Barry architect of the new National Gallery. The decision gave great comfort to all who had the artistic credit of the country at heart; for, at last, it was hoped and believed that in a few years the new National Gallery would be something that would have a substantial and material existence. On the 24th of October following, Mr. Barry was invited by the Department of Works to prepare his plans, with elevations and sections. Meanwhile, consequent upon a change of Government, my noble Friend had to leave the office which he had so ably and conspicuously filled, and was succeeded, for a short time, by Mr. Layard—an administrator whose erudite zeal for everything connected with Art deserved more credit than, I am sorry to say, he has received. Mr. Layard, as First Commissioner, threw himself into his work right heartily; but a small political revolution taking place inside the Administration, he was, in his turn, succeeded by another First Commissioner of Works—a man of conspicuous practical capacities, but whose enthusiasm for Art never hurried him into æsthetic excesses: I mean, of course, Mr. Ayrton. On the 6th of November, 1869, Mr. Barry sent in his designs. He had been appointed by the noble Lord now Postmaster General, architect of the National Gallery; Mr. Layard had regarded him as such; and the next communication which he expected was, that he should be ordered to carry out the plan for the National Gallery; but, instead of that, he was requested to send in his bill. Mr. Barry could not understand that. To be called upon to send in his bill, looked as if his engagement were to be terminated. That, however, is an episode in the history to which I will not further refer, for whatever may have been meant by this eccentric procedure it practically led to nothing. The matter was then hung up for a time; but on the 29th of September, 1870, Mr. Ayrton, the First Commissioner of Works, did authorize Mr. Barry to prepare the working designs for a certain fragment of the National Gallery—the portion of it which is now so near completion. Whether, by giving that limited order, the Department of Works intended to cancel Mr. Barry's larger commission as architect of the whole building, is a matter upon which I do not enter; though I believe that I may take upon myself to say that no document can be produced which cancels it, and the work which he was then ordered to do is, in fact, quite consistent with the larger engagement of which it forms a portion, and which was always intended to be carried out as the first part of the undertaking. Mr. Barry did carry out his order accordingly, and sent in his plans, which were accepted and set in hand. The work is now nearly completed, and the Gallery almost ready to receive pictures.

Thus the matter now stands. I have mentioned the name of the architect several times; but I wish the House clearly to understand that I am not speaking as counsel for Mr. Barry, or for any other man. I am simply standing up as the advocate of the National Gallery, and for the completion, in a satisfactory manner, of a great and important undertaking. I must incidentally observe that the man who has done that first part of the work, and done it with great ability and devotion to the public service, would be naturally the man to whom we should look to complete it. Still it is not of the man, of his fame, or of his profits, but of the Gallery itself that I am now speaking. The upshot of the recommendations made by the Trustees of the National Gallery, in their Report of the 5th of August, 1867, was that 4,200 linear feet of wall were wanted for a satisfactory National Gallery. In all these recommendations linear measurement only was taken as the basis of calculation, and the question of height hardly entertained. It would be simply to murder pictures to hang them too high or too low, and the height of the room had afterwards to be settled on practical and architectural considerations. A room should be high enough for the sake of appearance and ventilation, as well as for the comfort of the visitors; but for the proper distribution of the site the linear measurement was the main consideration. In 1867 the Trustees of the National Gallery requisitionized for the Old Masters, to begin with, 2,400 linear feet; 3,000 feet being, in their opinion, the maximum area that they would ever want for that branch of the collection. The Raphael Cartoons, which were at South Kensington, but which I am sure the House will agree with me ought to be in the heart of London, and in the National Gallery, required 200 linear feet; a contemplated Loan Collection 300 feet; modern pictures 900 feet; a special gallery for the Turner bequest 400 feet: the sum total being 4,200 feet, besides an unknown quantity for modern foreign pictures. There was also an independent claim set up for a wing of the gallery to be set apart for the National Portrait Gallery; but, as I believe and hope, that collection will be adequately lodged in some of the numerous galleries of the defunct International Exhibition at South Kensington, I venture to drop that item out of the calculation. Well, as I said, the Trustees proposed 4,200 linear feet, and Mr. Barry's complete plan would have given 4,315—not much more than the Trustees themselves had named. It is but just a little over; and therefore, if he has erred at all, he has done so on the right side. The fragment of the National Gallery now being completed gives a length of 1,078 linear feet, and the old building sections for 2,072 feet; together 3,150 feet, or within 1,000 feet of the entire space wanted. This is the case for doing nothing; but against it we must remember that only 1,000 feet of that space is included in the new gallery, and is therefore possessed of the height, width, dimensions, ventilation, and top-lighting necessary in order that the English National Gallery should compete with the national galleries even of second-class European States—that, for example, of so small a power as Saxony, the capital of which has so long been famous all over the world as an Art centre. I have had the pleasure of visiting the new Galleries, and I cannot express how much I admire the spacious, dignified, and airy appearance of the rooms, with a width varying from 30 to 40 feet, with sufficient height but not too much, and with an area of skylight about half the whole superficies of the floors, conforming in their aspects to the recommendations of the judges and of the Trustees. Then, when I left them and entered the old Galleries—no doubt well-intended apartments, but as unlike the new ones as the first steamer that started from London was like the Ulster and Munster boats now plying between Holyhead and Kingstown—their dark, gloomy, and cavernous aspect was a most striking contrast.

The state of the case, to go a little more into detail, is, that the area which has been purchased at an outlay of £140,000 is divided, roughly speaking, into four sections. One of these is the existing National Gallery; the second the space already built over; and the third the portion of the acquired ground lying behind the new building to the northward. These two last pieces together represent the £140,000, and include among other things, in the part which has still to be built over, the old workhouse of St. Martin-in-the-Fields, in that narrow lane, which we all know so well when we are running to catch a train at Charing Cross Station, called Hemming's Row. The fourth section, to the north-west, is St. George's Barracks. No doubt it would be a serious thing to remove barracks or other large public buildings; but I believe that I am justified in stating that high military authorities are not so enamoured with the site of those barracks as much to object to their removal to another site rather nearer the river, so that the appropriation of the present ground filled up by the barracks for the National Gallery would be no dis-service to our military establishments. But whether or not the barracks are desirable for the National Gallery, they are not absolutely essential to the scheme of rebuilding. The remaining portion is, as I have said, an area which might be plainly and roughly divided into four parts; the part which had been built over, and then the part which is still to be built over—these are known as sections one and two—then comes as the third section, the present National Gallery; and the fourth is these barracks. One of the lots, we see, is already built over; the next is ready to be built over, and the present National Gallery must go, unless the whole thing is to remain an abortion. Now what shall we get by carrying out the scheme? We shall have possession of a National Gallery worthy of the country; a building well isolated and fireproof, and therefore suited to the safe custody of the Art treasures which will be contained in it.

If we take, moreover, the area of the barracks, we shall be able to carry out a great metropolitan improvement, by making a wide street running from south to north at the west end of the National Gallery, commencing opposite the College of Physicians, and reaching up to Leicester Square, where it would meet the new street which the Metropolitan Board of Works are going to carry out there, running to Oxford Street. So the reconstruction of the National Gallery would connect itself with, and lead to a much wanted metropolitan improvement—a main north and south artery running a little to the eastward of Regent Street. This would indeed be a vast gain to the convenience and the appearance of London, and I feel confident that the House will agree with me in the desirability, if possible, of effecting it. I have nothing to say as to the National Portrait Gallery, for the reason which I have already given. I have also, I trust, offered sufficient arguments for the necessity of rebuilding the existing Gallery instead of leaving the poor and inferior range of rooms and the depressed façade which Wilkins was compelled to construct, standing as an eyesore to Trafalgar Square, and a foil to the noble galleries behind.

These, then, are the general facts upon which I base my case. I have described what is required. I have mentioned the length of time during which the undertaking has been hung up. I have reminded the House of the plans for a new National Gallery to be erected on another site, which were prepared by eminent architects in 1864; of the Act of Parliament which secured the present site in 1866; of the limited competition which settled who should be the architect in 1867; of the architect's own plans, now five or six years old; and I ask what have we gained by this procrastination and this economy? What is the advantage of it to London or to the Empire? I have pointed to Hemming's Row, and I hope that any hon. Member who feels an interest in the question will go to Hemming's Row, and look at those miserable ruins which were once St. Martin's Workhouse, and which, if the great scheme were carried out, would be pulled down, when the line of buildings would be thrown back, and a fine broad street constructed where there is now a narrow and squalid lane.

On the more general question of the congruity of such a Gallery, I find it difficult to speak, for the matter is so plain and obvious that it is a truism much more than a truth, and if I were to dwell upon it, I fear that I should find myself drifting into a lecture more adapted to a Mechanics' Institution than to the debates of this House. The thing is obvious; but is it not something to be ashamed of, if the results of such a truism were to be neglected Session after Session and Recess after Recess? I am not blaming any Party in the House, and above all, the present Government, who have been in office only for a year, and has had many other things to think of. To its Members, when in office before, and practically making up the same Government, were owing some of the most substantial steps that have been taken for the commencement of this good work, and I look now to them to carry it through. I put it as a question concerning the national honour, as a claim of necessity, and as an essential element of educational development, and at the same time a thing that will be eminently popular. Has not every addition to the contents of the National Gallery been warmly greeted by the intelligent public? When the right hon. Member for Tamworth surrendered to the nation on such generous terms the magnificent collection of Dutch and Flemish pictures which had been collected by his great father, Sir Robert Peel; when the hon. Baronet the Member for Lisburn (Sir Richard Wallace) presented the masterpiece of Terburg; when two or three years ago the grand unfinished Michael Angelo was acquired; and when these 14 pictures, including the painting by Pietro della Francesca, were bought at Mr. Barker's sale; how great was the enthusiasm awakened by these several acquisitions to our national collection! If in addition to all this the Government will promise to give the country a national building worthy of the name, they will not only do a wise, a far-sighted, and a generous thing, but, I repeat, they will be taking a most popular step, and win for themselves the gratitude of all those sections of the public, whose good will is worth obtaining. Of course, it is a matter of money, and I know that the grim guardians of the national till are sitting at this moment on the Treasury bench. Still there are some things for which money must at times be found, and the National Gallery is one of these. I am not to be met with the excuse, then, that the National Gallery cannot be built, because there are other important structures to be raised. I know that there are Law Courts rising at the eastern end of the Strand, and that a Natural History Museum is being reared at South Kensington. But I contend that a nation like ours, with resources and a history such as ours, and with a Capital of four millions of inhabitants, ought to be able to build a Palace of Justice, a Natural History Museum and Picture Galleries at one and the same time, if England would be true to its traditional greatness. This, then, is my claim. I have abstained from putting down any Notice of Motion, because I might have been met by arguments derived from immediate and temporary expediency, which would have told against me on the division list, and left it no sure test of the real feeling of the House. I prefer to carry with me the sympathies of the House, which I am satisfied that I have won, rather than encounter the unfair and incomplete ordeal of a division taken on a false issue. I hope and believe, however, that the Government will do the best they can in the matter, and I earnestly invite them to carry out with all convenient expedition this most excellent and popular work.

LORD HENRY LENNOX said, he most heartily thanked his hon. Friend for the public spirit which was manifested in the remarks he had addressed to the House. He had been right in adopting that course; because, in order to obtain the sympathy of both sides on matters of this kind, it was desirable not to introduce any question of a Party character, but to argue the subject on its intrinsic merits. His hon. Friend had also very properly disclaimed appearing that evening as champion for the eminent architect Mr. Barry. He (Lord Henry Lennox) sympathized very much with Mr. Barry on account of that which he called the disappointment of his life; but he could not regard him as having been ill-treated, for no one who held the office he had the honour of holding, and, least of all, his noble Friend the Postmaster General, could for a moment have intended so to deal with so distinguished a man. Only the other day he told Mr. Barry that he looked upon it as a fact that every great architect and most artists met, each of them, with a grievance in the course of his career. That appeared to be incidental to such a career, and it was equally true of public men. How few public men were there who came into that House and won their way to office who had not grievances and disappointments, and did not think that they ought to occupy higher positions than those in which they were placed? Mr. Barry had a grievance. He had not been ill-treated, but had met with a disappointment from ill luck. He was one of the architects who had competed for the greatest work undertaken in this country since the present Houses of Parliament were built. The Commissioners to whom reference had been made reported very much in favour of Mr. Barry, and they also recommended another distinguished architect, Mr. Street. Now, if ever there was a building in the plan of which the question of internal accommodation should have been considered pre-eminent, it was that building which was to be adapted for carrying out the vast machinery of the law. That being so, the Commissioners were of opinion that the façade of the great building in question should be entrusted to Mr. Street, and the internal arrangements to Mr. Barry. For his part, he quite concurred with his noble Friend the Postmaster General that such an arrangement would not be likely to work satisfactorily, and in the result the Law Courts were placed in the hands of Mr. Street, and to Mr. Barry was entrusted the re-construction of the National Gallery. The Commission presided over by Lord Hardinge strongly recommended the proposed plan of Mr. Barry for carrying out that object; but, at the same time, did not think it advisable that the re-construction should be proceeded with at once. It was, however, found that the Collection of Pictures was overcrowded; an addition to the Gallery was required, and Mr. Barry was called upon to make it, the question as to elevation being allowed to remain over for the present. Mr. Barry undertook the duty confided to him, and he (Lord Henry Lennox) cordially reciprocated everything his hon. Friend had said as to the magnificent success which had attended his work. He hoped that the new Galleries would soon be open to the public, for when they were he was certain there would be but one opinion as to their merits, or as to the immense stride we had made in adding to our National Gallery, regarding which he thought his hon. Friend had spoken in somewhat disparaging terms. His hon. Friend pointed to several great works which he thought ought to be at once proceeded with; but he (Lord Henry Lennox) must remind the House that the interests of Art had not of late been neglected, and that it was not Art alone that was pulling at the national purse strings. The National Gallery had been extended; the Law Courts were being proceeded with; a Natural History Museum, which would cost £500,000, had been sanctioned; a considerable sum, approaching to nearly £200,000, had been expended on the South Kensington Museum; and Museums had been established in Edinburgh and Bethnal Green. It would not, therefore, be just to say that successive Governments had not shown a desire to promote the interests of Art. The present National Gallery was most admirably situated, and when things were at their worst they began to mend. His hon. Friend, therefore, he thought, would agree with him (Lord Henry Lennox) that it was well the façade of the National Gallery had not been patched up and made something less abominable than it was, for nothing could be much worse. He trusted an improvement in due time would be manifested. His hon. Friend had alluded to the purchase of pictures made last year; but that, he thought, was as nothing compared with the eloquent speech in which the Prime Minister proposed that Vote for the acceptance of the House. No one could have heard the speech of his right hon. Friend on that occasion without feeling that the cause and interests of Art would not only not be neglected, but would, on the contrary, be supported and encouraged.

MR. COWPER-TEMPLE said, that although disappointment had been occasioned to a distinguished artist in the manner referred to by his noble Friend, yet, on the whole, the best course had, he thought, been adopted. His noble Friend had intimated that the Commissioners recommended that two architects should be employed—one in respect of the exterior, the other the interior of the new Law Courts. That, he believed, was not the intention of the judges, although such an impression might be conveyed by the language they used. They contemplated that in a work of such magnitude, the architect might avail himself of the aid of a partner of eminence in carrying it out. He did not doubt, however, that his noble Friend the Postmaster General had good grounds for confiding all the work and its responsibility to one architect. With respect to the National Gallery, he hoped his noble Friend the Chief Commissioner of Works would not imitate the long delay which had occurred, and he had no doubt in that case, the time would soon come when the original design as to the National Gallery would be carried out, when the façade facing Trafalgar Square would be removed, and when a Gallery would be founded worthy of the nation, and of the great treasures which it possessed. A large portion of these pictures were gifts, and the least thing the nation could do was to provide a proper receptacle. He hoped that they would soon see the Cartoons of Raphael placed in the Central Hall—which was part of the design of Mr. Barry—where they might be seen to much greater advantage than either at Hampton Court or at South Kensington.

MR. KINNAIRD said, he cordially thanked the hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Beresford Hope) for bringing the subject forward; because in all metropolitan improvements, they were behind other countries. He thought they could not have a better time than the present for carrying out the scheme shadowed forth, as every year's delay would enhance the difficulty of procuring a site. He believed that in even the past year, house property had risen in value nearly double. ["No, no!"] In Carlton House Terrace, a house which a few years ago was bought for £12,000, had been lately sold for £40,000. Was not that a great increase? He ventured to declare his conviction that they might have carried out the improvement and widened Parliament Street a few years ago at about one-half the cost which they would now have to incur.

MR. GOLDSMID said, he must deny that the value of house property had increased during the last 12 months to the extent stated by the hon. Member. From personal experience he could say, although it probably was only temporary, that, contrary to the statement of the hon. Member, there was rather a tendency to a decline in the value of house property, even in the most fashionable parts of London, during that period; and it was too absurd to compare property in Carlton House Terrace with miserable property at the back of St. Martin's Church. The decline, in his opinion, resulted from the general depression of trade throughout the country. Of course, he was aware that over a period of 10 years there was a considerable increase in the value of fashionable houses; but of them really it was not now the question. But with regard to the question more immediately under discussion, he (Mr. Goldsmid) would say that he could quite understand the feeling of Mr. Barry, who naturally wished to be the architect of a grand National Gallery; but he thought the course the Government had adopted was a wise course—adding galleries as they were wanted, and not anticipating wants by spending between £300,000 and £350,000 more than was at present required for the accommodation of the national pictures. When the time arrived that more accommodation for the display of the pictures in the National Gallery was called for, then would be the proper occasion to incur increased expenditure and carry the remainder of Mr. Barry's plan into execution. He would urge the noble Lord to use a little more expedition in carrying out the Government works not only connected with the National Gallery, but in other parts of the metropolis. Anyone who saw the slow pace at which the Law Courts were being built would feel the justice of this remark.

MR. LOCKE thought the building called the National Gallery was one of the worst used of any public buildings. Before the alterations were made, there was a handsome entrance, and staircases on each side, one for the galleries of ancient pictures and the other for the Royal Academy; but for some reason that entrance had been almost blocked up. Had it not been for the interference of Mr. Hume, who succeeded in reducing the height of the building, and thus saved money, there would have been no reason to complain of the structure. The building would have been 12 or 14 feet higher had not Mr. Hume interfered. No doubt, there would be a necessity for an extension of the buildings; but he thought there were plenty of localities in the metropolis where house property was not of any great value. The more they went to the Northern and North-eastern parts of the metropolis, the cheaper they found the houses. The British Museum stood there; and if the land were cheap they might go in that direction, when they wished to erect public buildings. He thought the Government were acting wisely in not making any alteration at present. He was not aware that the National Gallery as it now stood was entirely filled with pictures, and he thought that when it was filled, there would be time enough to consider the question of further accommodation. With regard to the City of London, great and important alterations had in late years been carried out there, and the new, wide, and fine streets recently constructed within the City must be regarded as great improvements. The Corporation of London many years ago had maps drawn showing the improvements required by widening streets, which they had done by degrees when houses were destroyed by fire or become dilapidated. Newgate Street was an example. The Metropolitan Board of Works had not adopted this course some years ago, when he (Mr. Locke), in a Select Committee brought the plan of the City to their consideration. The Metropolitan Board should give their attention to what was required in the first instance throughout the metropolis in improvements, and have a map to show how these could be carried out from time to time.

INDIA—BANK OF BOMBAY.

RESOLUTION.

MR. GREGORY, in rising to call the attention of the House to the Report of the Commissioners appointed to inquire into the failure of the Bank of Bombay, and the position of the Shareholders in such Bank with reference to the government of that Presidency; and to move, "That, in the opinion of this House, the case of such Shareholders is one for the favourable consideration of Her Majesty's Government," said, the subject related to the ruin of a well-established concern, and to the loss of a capital of £2,000,000, which had been subscribed by innocent shareholders; and the question at issue was, to what extent the Government were responsible for that disastrous result. The Bank of Bombay was established in 1840, on principles similar to those of the banks in the other Presidencies which were established at the same date. Those banks were, to a certain extent, Government institutions, the East India Company, who at that time ruled the country, taking shares in them, and in the case of the Bank of Bombay appointing three of the nine directors by which the concern was managed. Under that system, from 1840 until 1860 the Bank in question, with a capital limited to £520,000, carried on a safe, honest, and profitable business which enabled it to pay the not extravagant dividend of $7\frac{1}{2}$ per cent to its shareholders. In 1860 the Government, however, thought proper to make a change in the business of the Bombay Bank. They withdrew the powers of issue from it, but, in exchange, agreed to make the Bank the administrator of the Treasury balances. That proceeding involved the passing of a new Act, and accordingly the Directors contemplated obtaining an Act on the same footing as that of the Bank of Bengal, and it would have been fortunate for the shareholders if the resolution of the Directors had been carried out. Such, however, was not the case, although about this time the Secretary of State for India expressly pointed out in a despatch that the business of the Bank should be restricted to legitimate banking operations, such as those of the Bank of England or the Bank of Bengal. A Bill was drawn and submitted to the Advocate General of the day, who took some exceptions, and referred it back to the Directors for revision. The result of the matter was, that an important provision which had been originally contemplated was struck out of the Bill—namely, a provision confining the security accepted by the Bank to the guaranteed companies in India; and another provision was inserted, allowing the Bank to invest in the securities of any public company in India, whether guaranteed or not. In that state the Bill was forwarded to the Government of India, and unfortunately they expressed an opinion that it should be passed by the Council of Bombay instead of by the Council of the Governor General. If the Bill had been considered by the Government of Bengal, it would have been considered in the presence of the Finance and Legal Members of the Council, and during its discussion they could have had the advantage of having before them the Act of the Bank of Bengal. Under these circumstances, the Bill was referred to the Legislative Council of Bombay, which was composed of six Members who were officials of the Government, three who were partners in mercantile houses, and three who were Native gentlemen, and it should be borne in mind that the deliberations of the Council were close, no report was given, and their power was essentially an arbitrary one. The Bill was afterwards submitted to the Governor General, and after having passed through the Legislative Council of Bombay it was found to differ very materially from the Act of the Bank of Bengal, and also from the original Act of 1840. Under the new Act the capital was increased to £2,000,000; and instead of, as in the old Act, limiting advances to a sum not exceeding three lacs of rupees to any one individual, repayment of which was to be made in three months, it allowed the discount of any negotiable security, it gave liberty to make advances on the shares of any companies whatever, and it removed the restrictions against the amount which was to be advanced to any one individual on any uncertain security; but it did contain certain provisions which if exercised might have prevented the mischief which subsequently ensued, because it gave power to the Indian Government from time to time to investigate the accounts of the Bank, and to call for reports and balance-sheets. The Bank was launched in September, 1863, under its new constitution, its president being Mr. Birch, a Government Director, who, during his administration of its affairs, lost for the Bank £1,000,000 or £1,500,000, while he received some £37,000 as a premium on shares or securities that had been handed over to him. Then there appeared upon the scene a Native of Bombay, a small cotton broker, a man who, although comparatively unknown, was at once subtle, designing, ostentatious, and speculative—a man of considerable capacity and of great resources in himself. This man lived in the most ostentatious manner, and squandered other people's money when he got hold of it. Of him it might be said alieni appetens sui profusus. In process of time this man acquired very great influence over the Secretary of the Bank and others; he, in fact, seemed to draw out what he liked; and he also recommended customers. He obtained for himself loans to the amount of £420,000, and for other people to the extent of £669,000, on which there was ultimately a loss to the Bank of £434,447. During this time no inspection appeared to have been exercised on the part of the Government, there were no balance-sheets, and no bye-laws were passed. Any person reading the Act under which the powers he had referred to were conferred on the Government would see that it was the duty of the Government to have enforced the provisions of the Act, and, at all events, to have insisted that proper bye-laws should be made for the purpose of controlling the action of the Directors. By doing so, they would have prevented much of the mischief that ultimately ensued. But that was not all. The Directors were not satisfied with what they had already done with regard to the ruin of the central establishment; they established branches, and one in contravention of the Act in Bombay itself. The Act provided that no branch should be established in Bombay; but the Directors got the sanction of the Government for that purpose, and thus incurred a further loss of something like £190,000. In April, 1865, the Directors further came to this extraordinary resolution—that they would advance not only on the nominal value of shares of public companies but also up to 75 per cent of the fictitious value to which they had been run up. This caused a loss of £134,000. Although these things were unnoticed by the Government of Bombay, yet rumours of what was going on reached the Home Government, and Sir Charles Wood (now Lord Halifax) became frightened at what he had heard of the transactions, and, accordingly, in March, 1865, he wrote to Sir Bartle Frere, to the effect that he could not help being alarmed at the prospect of a crash, and bidding Sir Bartle Frere to look after the Bank. It did appear extraordinary that the Government of Bombay should have waited for such a requisition. An inquiry was then directed to be made by the Governor of Bombay, and a Report was drawn up by the Government Directors, but that inquiry was not only inefficient, but was misleading, because they reported that though it was true that large advances had been made upon shares of all sorts, yet these shares had been deposited only as "collateral security." What was meant was, that notes of hand had been given for the advances in addition to the deposit of shares; but, in truth, the shares were the only real instead of being a merely collateral security. Such a Report, when made by Government Directors, put in motion by the Government itself, was certainly calculated to mislead. The Bank went on until January, 1866, when the Governor of Bombay required another examination of the affairs of the Bank. Accordingly the matter was referred to Messrs. Chapman and Norman, and their Report stated that £320,000 had been advanced on loan at the head office, of which £79,000 had been realized; £176,000 remained overdue, and £116,000 was not accounted for; but it concluded with this extraordinary recommendation — that what they called the policy of forbearance should be pursued. There was a run on the Bank in 1865, and Sir Bartle Frere, being informed of what was going on, telegraphed to the Government of India that the Bank must stop payment, unless he was authorized to support it with a loan of something like £1,500,000, and he put the necessity of making the advance upon the ground of political and financial considerations. The recommendation was carried out; and it was by treating it as a political and financial engine that the interests of the shareholders had been sacrificed by the Government. For instance, in April, 1866, a certain gentleman, whose difficulties had become notorious, and who was a debtor to the Bank to the extent of £220,000, made an application for a loan of £50,000. No doubt, from the magnitude of his transactions, it would have been a serious thing if he had stopped payment. A meeting was called for the purpose of seeing whether the Bank could assist him, and the Chairman seemed to have considered it necessary to apprise the Governor of the Presidency of the application, and the Governor sanctioned the transaction upon the very extraordinary ground that it was going on, and that therefore he could not stop it. He now came to another part of the case on which some light was thrown by a Return which had been laid on the Table. When he last brought forward this case, he stated that the Government in 1864 and 1865 had thrown on the market a quantity of land which they no longer required, and which they were anxious to dispose of. There was a strong impression that that land had been bought by parties who had obtained advances from the Bank, and at a very exorbitant price. He was now in a situation to prove this; the Return moved for was "of all lands sold by the Government of Bombay in 1864, stating the price realized by the sales respectively, the valuations previously made, and any advances made by the Bank of Bombay for the purchase." A Return had accordingly been made of all land sold by the Government of Bombay, the price realized, and the valuations made; from which it appeared that the valuation price was £145,650, and the sum realized £400,000; but it did not go on to state the advances made by the Bank of Bombay for the purchase. But by reference to the Report of Sir Charles Jackson upon the matter, he could supplement that Return, and he hoped the Government would make further inquiries into the matter. He believed he was fully justified in the inference he drew that the sums for the purchase of these lands were advanced by the Bank of Bombay. The profit which the Government had made had been appropriated to the revenues of India, and all he asked was that the amount of that profit should be definitely ascertained, and that a sum equivalent to it should be voted to the relief of the unfortunate shareholders, on whose account he had brought forward the Motion. He had but little knowledge of, or connection with, them; but on his taking up the subject on behalf of one friend, he had since had numerous communications from other shareholders for whom he might excite sympathy if he narrated their cases as they had been detailed to him. The Bank which, as he had said, was established in 1840, was, at that time, considered to be one of the safest, surest, and best managed banks in India; it was one in which trust funds and charity funds might be deposited; and the shareholders were, many of them, men who had spent their lives in India, and who had deposited their hard-earned savings with the Bank, on the strength that it was in the hands of the Government. They were amongst those who had administered our laws, maintained our power and consolidated our Empire, and, through no fault of their own, they had lost their investments. On these grounds he appealed to the House, in the terms of his Resolution, that their case might receive the favourable consideration of Her Majesty's Government.

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY seconded the Motion. When he was asked to read over the documents, and make himself master of the subject, he saw, as he perused them and gradually gained knowledge of the complicated facts, that though they might be dry in detail and difficult to master, yet they were matters of vital importance to a large number of our fellow-subjects who had spent the best part of their lives in India in the public service of the Crown. Those facts, as there presented, could be paralleled only by the loss of a well-found ship in mid-day, through the carelessness, incapacity, or wilful blindness of those in charge of her. Those in charge of the Bank of Bombay were Government officials in every sense of the word, for they were imposed upon it by the conditions of its charter, and the shareholders had no power to select or remove them. When the matter was discussed in Parliament previously in 1872, it was said the shareholders came to that House, because they could not resort to legal tribunals; but was there no such thing as Parliamentary redress, if there was an equitable claim which could not be enforced in a Court of Law? He contended that a sufficient precedent existed for Parliament dealing with the matter in the way proposed, for there was no more injustice in charging the Revenues of India with compensation to sufferers from the laches of the Government of India, than there was in charging the Revenues of this country with the compensation paid in respect of the Alabama Claims. In this case, according to information obtained, justice could be done to the unfortunate shareholders by giving them that margin of profit which the Government had made by the sales of land and by pandering to the spirit of speculation with the funds of which they were trustees and guardians. For 23 years the Bank was prosperous, and was well-conducted; and the Government of Bombay took the initiative in those changes in its charter which were so disastrous. The Government of Bombay, for its own profit, deprived the Bank of the power of issue; and, in return, gave it a new charter, which was the origin of all the subsequent evil. A careful and guarded charter was changed into a most reckless one, only fit for a bubble company, and it was taken advantage of, for over-speculation followed with the connivance of the Government Directors sitting at the Board. The present Secretary of State for India (the Marquess of Salisbury), when Lord Cranbourne, in 1866, accused the Government of Bombay of surreptitiously changing the charter of the Bank; and although the Government of Bombay, which was both a legislative body and an administrative body, knew perfectly well that the bye-laws affecting the Bank had been struck out of the Schedule, they never re-enacted them in a separate form, and they left the Secretary and Directors free to enter, as they did, on a wild course of speculation. It had been said that you could not attach liability to a body of trustees who only stood aside and did not take part in the business, but he challenged the Under Secretary of State for India to show that these Government Directors were not rather in the position of watchmen who deliberately fell asleep or shut their eyes while the spoilers were at work. It was clear that the President and the Directors of the Bank deliberately connived at all the irregularities that were going on, and when it was said that it was the duty of the shareholders to look after their own interests, he would remind the House that the shareholders were not all at Bombay, but were scattered about the three Presidencies, and that some were in England. Moreover, Sir Charles Wood (now Lord Halifax) when Secretary of State for India, in 1865, in his Budget speech, used language which lulled to sleep any suspicions that the shareholders might have entertained. He declared, that notwithstanding all the disquieting rumours that had been abroad, the Bank of Bombay would go on as usual, and that there need be no apprehension in the mind of the public. Was not such a declaration sufficient in itself to lull the shareholders into false security? And that being so, ought they not to obtain a remedy? Yet after this assurance the transactions described that night occurred, which cost the shareholders about £300,000. When matters went wrong, a delay was demanded for political, as well as financial, reasons, and on account of this delay, the shareholders were many thousands of pounds out of pocket. He did not go the length of saying, as some had done, that the Government Directors had deliberately used the money of the shareholders for their own private purposes, but he would say that no one who read the Report of the Commission could fail to see that the Directors had been wilfully guilty of acts which were unworthy of any bank. It ought to be borne in mind that there was not a British subject in India who did not look upon the Bank as one in which the Government was a leading shareholder, and the present claim was set up on the ground that the Government by its own act put the Bank in jeopardy. What the unfortunate shareholders now asked was simply to give some little restitution to those who by the iniquitous neglect of the Government of Bombay had been reduced from comparative affluence to poverty because they rightly believed this Bank to be under Government control.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "in the opinion of this House, the case of the Shareholders in the Bank of Bombay is one for the favourable consideration of Her Majesty's Government,"—(Mr. Gregory,)

—instead thereof.

MR. FORSYTH thought that the hon. Member who brought forward the Motion had made out a strong prima facie case. It was not the case of an ordinary bank that had failed, but a Bank the losses in which were mainly attributable to the negligence of the Government officials appointed by the Government of Bombay. By the Act originally creating the Bank, it was expressly prohibited from entering into dangerous speculations. In 1863 however, an Act was passed which enabled the Bank of Bombay to indulge in any kind of dangerous speculation. The shareholders trusted in the security of the Bank, seeing that it was in a great measure in the hands of official persons appointed by the Government of Bombay, and all they asked for was that the amount by which the Government of India had profited by the sale of land during the cotton mania in India, and which had been purchased by money borrowed from the Bank, should be refunded to them. It was no answer to the demand made, to state that the money could not be refunded, however just it might be to do so, without taxing the Natives of India. Unhappily it was too true that, "Quicquid delirant reges, plectuntur Achivi." If the Government were responsible, they should not be deterred from acting rightly by the fact that the amount asked for would have to be raised by taxation. The case was altogether an exceptional one, and he trusted it would receive the favourable consideration of Her Majesty's Government.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON said, that the Resolution proposed by his hon. Friend the Member for East Sussex (Mr. Gregory) was identical with one which had been introduced in the year 1872—namely—

"That, in the opinion of this House, the case of certain shareholders of the Bank of Bombay should receive the favourable consideration of Her Majesty's Government."

It was, of course, obvious that any additional charge which such favourable consideration might involve should be thrown upon the revenues, not of England, but of India. His hon. Friend had given a very fair history of the cause of the Bank's failure; but it was a noticeable fact that the three hon. Gentlemen who had spoken in favour of the Resolution had one and all admitted that the shareholders had no legal claims whatever, and indeed that might have been expected of Gentlemen who were each connected with the legal profession. He thought he might safely lay it down as a rule that when three lawyers in succession advocated a particular case and made no legal claim in support of it, it was because the smallest legal claim could not be made, otherwise they would advocate it elsewhere. In reference to the present case he would go further and say that even a moral claim had not been made out. There were two reasons advanced in favour of the Resolution. First, it was contended that the Government of India was responsible, because they allowed certain alterations to be introduced into the charter of the Bank, and were, therefore, responsible for the abuse of the powers they placed in the hands of the Directors, and next, that the Bombay Government being shareholders in the Bank, and nominating Directors to look after their interest in it, they were—to use the words of the Petition presented to the Secretary of State—unlimitedly liable. He would reply to both these contentions. He denied that the alterations in the charter had been introduced at the instance of the Bombay Government. The shareholders themselves took the initiative in that direction, and it was only on account of the strong representations they made that the Government agreed to the alteration. At a special meeting held in November, 1861, they resolved that the Directors should be authorized to take such steps for varying, altering, or annulling the provisions of the Act under which the Bank was constituted and for obtaining the incorporation of the Bank as to them might seem expedient. The shareholders by that resolution placed an absolutely discretionary power in the hands of the Directors, and that step it was which led to the alteration of the charter. He quite admitted that it would have been better if such alterations had never been made, and that after they had been, the Government of Bombay did not perhaps exercise sufficiently their powers of supervision of the management of the Bank; but, admitting that, it seemed to him almost ridiculous to contend that when the Government placed certain powers in the hands of individuals they were responsible to those who requested them to do so for the abuse of those powers. As well might his right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer be held responsible for an accident caused by the incautious use of firearms because he had proposed the levying of a duty on the licence to carry arms. But there was this further fallacy in the argument of his hon. and learned Friends, that they had assumed that the alteration of the charter had necessitated the failure of the Bank. The failure was, in fact, caused by a wild and reckless spirit of speculation on the part, not of the Government, but of the commercial Directors of the Bank. The most legitimate banking transaction would become dangerous if the security on which it was based were worthless; and even under the old charter it was possible for the Directors to discount bad bills and transact business on which large losses might occur. Of this he was certain—that if the Directors of the old Bank had been actuated by the same spirit of speculation as were the commercial Directors of the new, the Bank would equally have failed. A great deal had been said as to the losses alleged to have arisen in consequence of the alteration in the Act, which permitted the Directors to advance money upon shares of companies which were not guaranteed by the Government, but out of a total loss of £1,800,000 only a loss of £440,000 was attributable to that alteration. The failure of the Bank was, therefore, attributable not to this alteration in the Bank Act, but to the conduct of the Directors, who made the most improper use of every power which they possessed. It was alleged that the Government had interfered in the management of the Bank. It was true they had done so, but in what manner? Why, they had interfered with the view of inducing the Directors to place their business on a more legitimate footing, and when Sir Charles Wood wrote to the Governor of Bombay directing that this special power of the Directors should be rescinded, that communication on being shown to the Directors of the Bank was denounced by them as a most tyrannical interference with the affairs of the Bank. The truth was, that the Government Directors, who were appointed to look after the Government interest, had neglected their duty and that the Shareholders Directors, who had been appointed to look after the interests of the shareholders, had equally neglected theirs; and the result was that both the Government and the shareholders had lost all the money they had invested in the Bank. It seemed, however, to be a most extraordinary proposition to make that the Government who represented one set of shareholders should be held responsible to another set of shareholders for the losses sustained by the Bank in consequence of this common neglect of duty by the Directors; and it was most surprising that such a proposition should have been brought forward by three legal Gentlemen who must be aware that it was directly contrary to the law, custom, and practice, of this country. He entirely denied the accuracy of the assertion made by the hon. and learned Member opposite (Mr. Evelyn Ashley), that the Directors of the company were Government officials. So far from that being the case, when the Government endeavoured to secure the election of a safe Director, the shareholders put him aside and chose to elect a speculative Director in his place. It had been stated that the Government were the guardians of the funds of the Bank, but that statement also was without foundation. The hon. Gentleman had further alleged that the alterations in the Bank Act had been introduced by the Court of Directors in a surreptitious manner; but the fact was, that they were all made at the suggestion of the Directors of the Bank acting for the shareholders. His hon. Friend the Member for East Sussex (Mr. Gregory) also made two statements with regard to Sir Bartle Frere when Governor of Bombay which were not altogether just. He said that when Sir Bartle Frere asked the Government to support the Bank, during the time when a run was made upon it, he had stated that he wished it to be supported for political as well as commercial reasons, and therefore, said the hon. Gentleman, it was evident that the Bank was being used as a political engine in the hands of the Bombay Government. That was not the fact. The Bank was supported by the Government on the occasion in question, because had it failed at that critical period wide-spread commercial distress would have resulted, and what an outcry would have been raised had the Government refused to lend the Bank its assistance in such an emergency? After all, the House must not forget that all the depositors and the creditors of the Bank had been paid out of money furnished by the Government, and that, therefore, the only question at issue was raised between the Government as shareholders and the other shareholders of the Bank. His hon. Friend went on to allege that the sum of £250,000 had been advanced by the Bank to Prem Chund Roychund, the great Indian speculator, at the instance of Sir Bartle Frere. But there again his hon. Friend was misinformed. Prem Chund Roychund, who was a native Director of the Bank and a great gambler, was a man of considerable importance, and it having been stated that unless an advance of £250,000 were made to him he would probably fail, a meeting of the Directors of the chief of the Bombay Banks was held on the 26th of April, 1866, at which it was resolved that the necessary sums should be advanced to him by the banks jointly, the Bank of Bombay agreeing to furnish £105,000 of that sum. The whole of the money was to be advanced, in the first place, by the Bank of Bombay, which was to be repaid by the other banks in stated proportions. [Mr. GREGORY said, those banks subsequently repudiated their liability.] That was perfectly true; but the arrangement sanctioned by Sir Bartle Frere was the one he had indicated. Sir Bartle Frere had stated that the opinion of the Directors of the different banks at the meeting to which he had referred was unanimous as to the necessity for supporting Prem Chund Roychund, and that they had intimated to him that no other course was open to them except to render that person assistance. In criticizing the conduct of Sir Bartle Frere in this matter therefore, it must be recollected that almost the whole of the leading banks in Bombay had represented to him the necessity of the advance being made to Prem Chund Roychund, and that under such circumstances it would have been impossible for him to have declined to sanction the loan being made. His hon. Friend had suggested that because the Government of Bombay had been paid by certain persons for land purchased by them, the Government ought to stand in the same position with regard to the Bank as those persons had done who had subsequently failed, owing large sums to the Bank. A more extraordinary proposition than that he had never heard. His hon. Friend went on to justify his proposition on the ground that the Government had made large profits from the sale of land in Bombay; but the fact was that while the expenses connected with that land amounted to £2,500,000, only £750,000 had been received in respect of its sale, thus leaving a deficit on the transaction of £1,750,000. He hoped he had made clear to the House that this proposal was one to which Her Majesty's Government could not in any way assent. He might point out to the House that if this was a proposal affecting English revenues, he did not think it ever would have been made; and he therefore must ask them to act with regard to Indian revenues as they would act towards English revenues. He was sure there was not a single Member of that House who did not feel the greatest sympathy with the shareholders for the loss of the money they had subscribed. He was afraid, however, that it was one of the inevitable consequences of financial panic that losses fall on those who are least able to bear them, and he was also afraid was it a law of Nature that in any crisis the weak must go to the wall. No doubt, many persons who had spent the greater portion of their lives in the service in India were suddenly deprived of sums which they had hoped would support them to the end of their lives. But how did they lose these sums? They lost them because persons indulged in wild and reckless speculation; and if hon. Members of that House felt sympathy with shareholders who lost their money in consequence of the reckless speculation of those to whom it was entrusted, do not let them adopt the illogical course of accepting a Resolution which unquestionably must tend to increase speculation and reckless investment. If the House, either directly or indirectly, laid down the principle that, because the Government was a shareholder in any concern, therefore all the shareholders were to have a claim against it, what would be the result? The shareholders of any concern such as this would say to the Directors—"Speculate; give the highest dividend you possibly can; we insist upon that, for what matters it if the bank fails? We have got a claim against a number of shareholders—the Government." Of course, if the shareholders had a claim against the Government, it was clear that all creditors and depositors had an equal claim. Nothing was more clear than that. If the House wished, therefore, to put a stop to such practices as were revealed in Sir Charles Jackson's Report, it could not do better than reject the proposal which had been submitted to it. His noble Friend the Secretary of State for India, shortly after his accession to office, had the case under his consideration; he gave it his most careful attention, and in the answer which he returned to the memorial he informed the memorialists he had given every consideration to the circumstances, and that he was afraid he could not comply with their request, neither could he assist them in any other way. He (Lord George Hamilton) felt pretty confident that the decision at which his noble Friend had arrived was one which would be supported by the large majority of that House.

SIR EARDLEY WILMOT said, notwithstanding what had fallen from the noble Lord the Under Secretary of State for India, he was still unpersuaded that the Motion was not entitled to the favourable consideration of the Government. There were many precedents which he cited, and which might be advanced in favour of compensation being granted; and, in this case, seeing who the unfortunate shareholders were, and the losses they had sustained after many years spent in service in India, he had a strong conviction that they were entitled to it. He contended that the Government of Bombay were liable to the shareholders; because, although knowing the condition of bankruptcy in which the Bank was placed, they sanctioned large advances to be made by it to the Asiatic and other banks, which had soon afterwards failed, and whose financial position the Government had had ample opportunities of ascertaining. Under all the circumstances of the case, he could not conscientiously oppose the Motion, and should, therefore, give it his decided support.

MANNING THE NAVY.

OBSERVATIONS.

LORD CHARLES BERESFORD, in rising to call attention to manning the Navy, said, in the observations he sought to offer he had no desire to criticize the present or any other Board of Admiralty. He considered the subject which he was about to treat of as one in which the country felt deep interest. What he was particularly desirous to allude to was the defect arising from the absence of barracks, with accompanying frigates as drill ships, in which the men might be accommodated and trained for the Service during the time that they were in port. With regard to the men of the present day, he believed it would be agreed by all naval officers that the seamen of the present day were infinitely superior to the class of men who were employed in it 10, or 15, or 20 years ago. At that time there were 1,100 men in the ship which he joined when he entered the Service, and of the 1,100 at least 500 could neither read nor write, and their habits were different in many respects from those of the men at present in the Service. Their mouths were generally filled with tobacco, and when they came on shore they commonly spent their money in getting drunk. That state of things, however, did not now exist, for under the new regulations the men, when paid, did not get the same amount of leave on shore as formerly. In France, and other foreign countries, there was better training accommodation for their sailors than this great maritime country had for its seamen, and owing to the absence of the necessary training ships the country did not get more than two-thirds of a man's actual work and time, because the rest of his time was spent in making him become what he should be. Before the Russian War, the men who joined were those who had been connected with the Mercantile Marine, and who were good seamen; but now those joining had to be taught. Therefore, what he wanted, as he had before observed, was to urge the necessity of providing regular head-quarters for the Navy—barracks, having frigates in connection with them—through which men and boys could be drafted in proper rotation to vessels which required them. The men in the depôts were constantly being employed in dockyard work, and the time was thus wasted which might be turned to good account in re-qualifying them for service on board ship. If, however, they were in barracks, they would have to go through a certain amount of drill, and would, with even a very small amount of practice, learn, at least, how to hold a rifle. He must also insist on the necessity of having seamanship taught when young, for it was impossible to acquire a thorough knowledge of it in advanced years. It would require every year 3,000 boys to keep the Navy up to a strength of 19,000; but as we only got about 2,700, it became necessary to draft into the Navy for boys ordinary second-class seamen. There were from 1,300 to 1,800 boys constantly waiting in guard-ships to be drafted into sea-going ships; and it would be of great advantage to them if they could be removed into barracks as soon as they left the training ships. The system of training ships was most excellent, but where the system failed was, that when boys had to wait for nine months or so upon guard-ships they became discontented more or less. The Estimates were always made out for pure seamen. A pure seaman, however, was nothing under an A.B., and the Estimate, therefore, ought to be made out for so many pure seamen, and so many ordinaries of the first and second class. In 1874 there were 5,063 ordinary second-class seamen, and of others who were rated as men there were 1,193, or in all 6,256 embryo seamen. These, however, were included in the 18,000 who were supposed to be pure seamen; and deducting them, there would only be about 11,000 real pure seamen left. In 1874 there were 221 ships in commission; of these 72 were fighting ships, and 189 were yachts, tugs, troopers, gunboats, and so on. In the 72 fighting ships there were 11,000 seamen, leaving 7,000 men in ships of other kinds. If there were barracks, all these 7,000 men might be re-qualifying for their next ship. Many of the first-class reserve men were also used in the depôts to do dockyard work. When he was at Plymouth, he was often asked by seamen to get them on to sea-going ships. One of these, a very smart seaman, when he applied, was asked what he had been doing lately, and the reply was—"Well, Sir, I have been doing horses for the last nine months." It seemed that he had, with a horse, been towing timber round the dockyard; an occupation in which such a man was really wasted. Another thing he complained of was that there was no fixed system by which seamen were taught gunnery—no roster, according to which every seaman was instructed in gunnery. Why, also, should not the non-competent class of men—the stokers, &c.—be trained? In the Hotspur class they were 55 per cent of the number of seamen; yet they would be quite useless in a hand-to-hand fight. If there were barracks, the non-competent men, while living there, could be at least trained. As to the Reserve Force, while it was impossible to deny that the material of our Mercantile Marine was as good as ever, he must contend that they did not have the practice which was necessary to fit them for serving on board a man-of-war. There was no captain, he should think, who would care about employing men on his ship who had never been under man-of-war discipline, however willing they might be. We had 10,000 men in the Royal Naval Reserve, each of whom could be obtained at the rate of £15 a-year, including the cost of food and clothing. But why, he would ask, should we not keep the 10 years' men, who were the most valuable class of men whose services we could secure? He saw no good reason why each of them should not get £7 or £8 a-year with that object. Almost all those in Captain Shaw's brigade were such men, and, indeed, they were a class of men whom anyone would be glad to have in his employment. In fact, at present they became signalmen on railways, and occupied other responsible posts. The average number of them who left the Navy every year was 1,163; of these there came back to the Service 935, so that there were 228 of these 10 years' men lost every year. If they could be retained there would be no necessity for calling them out every year; indeed, once in three years would suffice, and in the event of sudden war he was satisfied they would be found to constitute a most admirable force, while if they knew they were to receive £6 or £7 or £8 a-year, such a prospect would have a great effect in stopping desertion, which generally began before the expiration of the 10 years. Another thing which he wished to mention was this startling fact—that the pay in the Royal Navy had not really been augmented since the days of Trafalgar. In 1805 the pay of an able seaman was £21 15s. 6d. a-year, and in 1874 it was but £24 6s. 8d.; but at the former date a seaman got a pint of rum a-day, whilst now he got only half-a-gill, and the slight increase in wages would barely pay for the rum. He admitted that the comforts of the men had been in this time immensely increased; but when wages ashore had risen so much, it was not astonishing that men deserted to get the higher wages. Another thing was that there was now no prize money, which had formerly constituted a principal inducement for men to join the Navy. In conclusion, he begged to thank the House for the patience with which they had listened to him, and hoped that these matters would receive attention at the hands of the Government.

CAPTAIN G. E. PRICE said, he thought the noble Lord had done good service by bringing that subject forward. The present system of training boys to supply the waste of the Navy was excellent as far as it went, and it met the ordinary requirements of the Service in time of peace; but in time of war, they would have to draw as they now did for the Naval Reserve, upon the Mercantile Marine. If they were to look to the Merchant Service as a nursery for the Navy, they must encourage some kind of interchangeability between the Navy and the Merchant Service. For that purpose they should increase the nominal strength of the Navy, and allow a certain number of men, either 5,000, 10,000, or 15,000, as might be found necessary, after they had qualified and served a certain time in the Navy, to go on furlough into the Merchant Service for a stated period, say for two or three years. That would be a great advantage to the Merchant Service; and in case a war broke out, there would be a large and a real Reserve of men who could be called to man the vessels of war. In the same way, a Reserve of stokers might be created. There was a Reserve of seamen, but none of stokers; and the same principle might be extended to the Marines. He had mentioned his idea to several Friends who were well acquainted with maritime affairs, and they were of opinion that some such arrangement would be invaluable to the Royal Navy, and also be most useful to the Merchant Service. He was not prepared with any matured scheme; but he thought that the suggestion was worthy of serious consideration.

NAVY—COLLEGE FOR NAVAL CADETS.

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. BRUCE, who had given Notice that he would move—

"That it is expedient that there should be further inquiry into the question of the locality and constitution of the proposed College for Naval Cadets before any grant of public money is taken for that purpose," said, that formerly the training of those young men had generally been conducted in the vicinity of our great Dockyard establishments. In that arrangement there was a great advantage, because in those establishments the youths had an opportunity of seeing carried out all those mechanical operations connected with the construction, equipment, fitting out for sea, and repairing of ships which were year by year gaining greater importance for their profession. That would greatly encourage their studies and facilitate their education in the drier and more purely literary branches of instruction. Moreover, the Naval Service had great traditions, and the boys who entered it could not be too early imbued with its spirit, and there was no place in which that spirit was more rife than in those great establishments which were the homes of the Navy, and where all its various grades and branches were concentrated. Their constant contact there with the officers of the Navy would inspire those boys with that pride in their profession, which was one of its most valuable characteristics, and which he trusted the Navy would always retain, whatever might be its mechanical developments. Before fixing the site of the proposed College, therefore, it was desirable to consider carefully the evidence as to the suitability of the places recommended. The Britannia training-ship was now stationed at Dartmouth, a place which he considered objectionable as a site for the College, because it was entirely removed from the great Dockyard establishments of the country, and because it was a small place. The harbour in certain states of the weather was inaccessible, and it was close to one of the roughest parts of the British Channel. He did not come forward as the advocate of any particular locality, but, from his own experience, he thought that such a place as Portsmouth, where there were large Government establishments, a roadstead in which training-ships would be always safe, and where the boys could at all times of the year be exercised, was eminently suited for a training establishment. There was besides a large quantity of land belonging to the Government which could be utilized as the site of the proposed College without any cost. He had no doubt there were other places which might be recommended. All he wanted was that the advantages offered should be carefully considered before a decision was come to. Perhaps, it would be an advantage if the College could be opened to boys for the purpose of being trained for the Merchant Service, on payment of a small fee, the experience of our public schools in destroying exclusiveness having shown that it was desirable to have boys who were destined for different professions educated together.

MR. SHAW-LEFEVRE said, he thought that if the Britannia was to be retained, there would be much to say in favour of keeping her at Dartmouth; but as it had been determined to do away with that training-ship, and establish a College on shore, the question was very much altered. The distance of Dartmouth from London was an important consideration, for it was desirable that the College should be under the immediate supervision of the Board of Admiralty; and in connection with the Britannia a thorough supervision had not been found practicable. Moreover, the distance of Dartmouth from the homes of most of the boys would cause many of their parents a serious expense; and it was not a place which one would choose on account of any advantages in regard to climate, as it would be found too relaxing. Although he had not the same interest in Portsmouth as the hon. Member who had last spoken, he believed it to be one amongst a number of places which were well worth considering. Amongst the others he would name as examples the Isle of Wight, the north side of the Solent, Weymouth Bay, and Branksea Island. The only argument in favour of Dartmouth was that they had already some small institutions there, as an hospital and a playground; but these were so small that they ought not to be allowed to interfere in the settlement of the question. Turning to the speech of the noble Lord the Member for Waterford (Lord Charles Beresford), who had addressed the House in a manner which gave considerable promise upon a different subject, he understood the first point to which he had called attention to be the length of time which many boys were kept unemployed after the period of their training. That had always been found a considerable difficulty at the Admiralty. There were 7,000 boys, of whom 3,000 were in training ships, and great difficulty was experienced in finding places for the remaining 4,000 in sea-going ships. A proportion of 4,000 boys to 18,000 seamen was very large. It was recognized as necessary that 3,000 boys should enter every year, in order to keep up the supply of 18,000 seamen, which showed that the waste of seamen must be very great. The point which the noble Lord had brought before the House, whether something could not be done for the better training of those boys in the interval between leaving the training-ships and finding places in sea-going vessels, was well worth the consideration of the Government. The training ships, no doubt, furnished admirable material for the Navy, but after all it was a question of some importance whether we should rely entirely on the training of boys, and not encourage the entrance into the Navy of men from the Merchant Service. It might be said that in the present condition of the Merchant Service it would not be easy to get the men we wanted, and complaints had been made last night of the difficulty of procuring men for the Merchant Service itself. But when we considered the large number of men in our Mercantile Marine, there could hardly be any extraordinary difficulty in the matter. One obstacle was the difference of wages for continuous-service men in the Navy and Merchant Service. The wages of non-continuance men in the Navy, however, were still lower, and as long as that remained so, he feared there would be no use in trying to get men to enter from the Merchant Service into the Navy. It was, therefore, a matter worthy of the consideration of the Admiralty, whether some greater inducement than was held forth at present should not be offered. Very great advantage to the Navy would be derived from the building of naval barracks at Portsmouth, Plymouth, and Devonport. If the men, when brought ashore, were placed in naval barracks, they could be better trained than they were now, and we should be enabled to get rid of some of the stationary and depôt ships now in use which ran away with a great deal of money for repairs. He thought the noble Lord had done good service in bringing the question before Parliament.

LORD HENRY SCOTT said, it would be a great advantage to the country and to the Navy itself if a little more information were given as to the best site for the Naval College before Dartmouth was definitely decided on. No doubt an admirable site could be found at Dartmouth, though it might be thought that the climate there was of too relaxing a nature. But a point which should have great weight with the Admiralty was that the Naval College should be somewhere in the vicinity of some great naval station, dockyard, or arsenal. If there was one spot more than another where an opportunity would be given of seeing what the Navy really was, what our naval establishments really were, and the quality of those great ships which were rather machinery than anything else, it would be found in the neighbourhood of great dockyards like Portsmouth or Plymouth; whereas, if Dartmouth should be selected, the boys would never see Her Majesty's Ships from year's end to year's end. There was ample room between Portsmouth on the one hand and the Southampton Water on the other along the shores of the Solent to find a better site for a Naval College than on any other part of the Coast. This was a subject upon which it would be well that the Government should give full information before a large expenditure was incurred.

MR. HUNT said, the House was indebted to his noble and gallant Friend the Member for Waterford (Lord Charles Beresford) for having initiated a very interesting discussion with regard to the state of the Navy and the way in which it was to be manned. For his own part, he felt very much gratified that his noble and gallant Friend should have taken such a part in this debate, because he considered that the practical experience of a naval officer on such subjects was exceedingly valuable both to the House and the Government. In a great deal of what his noble and gallant Friend had said he went entirely with him. He felt there was a great want of proper employment and training for these young seamen when they were first rated on leaving the training ships, and the Admiralty were taking steps to provide a remedy. It was their intention not only that brigs should go out in the winter as well as the summer for the purpose of training these young lads when first rated, but that another and a larger ship should be provided to supplement the accommodation furnished by the brigs. It was no doubt a great fault that those boys should spend so much time in harbour, and it had long been felt that when they were first rated—for they were only boys at that time—they did not acquire such habits as were desirable if they were not sent to sea at once. But that was the result of a system very valuable to the country—that of having a Reserve in our ports. Supposing the plan were adopted of sending them to sea at once, then we should have no Reserve. But if we wanted to have sufficient men for our ships in time of need, we must have a number of young seamen sometimes employed "to do horse," to use the phrase quoted by his hon. Friend. It had been proposed as a remedy that we should build naval barracks, which would promote the efficiency of the men by the training they would receive there. No doubt, a more perfect system than the present one might be devised, but then all the pros and cons would have to be considered. The establishment of naval barracks would be a matter of considerable expense, and would meet only one of the difficulties, but not that of not sending these young men to sea. If they were kept in those barracks they would not be acquiring habits of seamanship more than at present. His noble and gallant Friend had touched on the question of the pay of the seamen, which, he said, had not been raised since the Battle of Trafalgar. That, though accurate as regarded the seamen generally, was not accurate as regarded the petty officers, who had received a considerable increase. And, besides, there was now a great inducement held forth in the shape of additional pay to seamen in the Fleet who conducted themselves properly and discharged their duties meritoriously. Therefore, it was open to any seaman to obtain a higher rate of pay than the pay at first fixed. But that the rate of pay was sufficiently attractive to the class of men who were inclined towards a seafaring life was proved by the number of men who joined again for a period of 10 years. He entirely approved of the desirability of retaining men who had already served 10 years in the Service, in respect of which his noble and gallant Friend had stated that out of 1,100 men in one year, 900 joined again for a period of 10 years. That was a large percentage. His recollection, however, entirely bore out the statement of his noble and gallant Friend, for that was very nearly the proportion in which men did re-enter the Navy, and he thought it was a very satisfactory state of things. It went to show that the pay now received by the Navy was sufficiently attractive to induce men to continue in the service. The hon. and gallant Member for Devonport (Captain Price) thought there might be a system of interchanging men between the Navy and the Mercantile Marine, but he feared there would be considerable difficulty in such a scheme. He (Mr. Hunt) had, however, endeavoured to establish a system by which we might train boys for the Naval Reserve, at the same time that they were training for the Mercantile Marine. That he thought a practicable system, for let the seamen of the Mercantile Marine once acquire the use of arms, and then we should have a force we might rely on in the event of a war. The subject of the proposed establishment of a Naval College had been introduced in a very able speech by his hon. Friend the Member for Portsmouth (Mr. Bruce). He pointed out the advantages which would be derived from establishing a Naval College for cadets in the neighbourhood of one of our great arsenals, and he naturally enough preferred Portsmouth. No doubt there would be great advantages in having a College there, where the young officers would see ships in the course of construction, but a great many points had to be considered. It must be known to the House that Portsmouth had its disadvantages, and as a matter of experience, it had been found necessary to remove the Britannia training-ship from Portsmouth first to Portland, and afterwards to Dartmouth. The question had been under consideration for a long period of years, and it was matter of surprise that a decision had not been arrived at sooner. There was at the Admiralty an immense number of particulars about every possible place, from the River Orwell almost to Penzance. Every conceivable place was reported on with regard to the object in view — namely, the education of naval cadets. The result arrived at by the gentlemen in charge of the duty was that four places should be taken into final consideration—Portsmouth, Portland, Poole Harbour, and Dartmouth. The objections to Portsmouth were that the harbour would not be available for boys learning how to manage small boats, being constantly traversed by vessels of all sorts, and there was also the contiguity to places to which it was not desirable boys should have ready access. Portland, as he had said, was tried when the Britannia was removed there from Portsmouth. That had also been under consideration; but the sea was so generally rough at Portland, that boys got drenched to the skin when they went out, and there was a very great difficulty in landing. It would be an exceedingly bleak place for a College. It had also to be remembered that there was a convict prison at Portland, which was objectionable; the country about was very limited, and those amenities generally looked to for walks and recreations were not to be found there. Then with regard to Branksea Island, it was very well worth consideration. It had many advantages but it had this disadvantage, that it was an island, and it would be a great objection, if the College were placed there, that it could only be reached by water. With regard to Dartmouth, he quite saw the force of the objection on the ground of its remoteness. He did not wish to underrate that objection, but they had to consider the pros and cons, and after carefully considering the matter he had come to the conclusion that, on the whole, Dartmouth was the best place. It was known to the House that a very able Committee had looked into the question; they spent some time at Dartmouth, and when they returned, he spoke to one of its Members, who said they could not have a better place than the high land immediately above the boys' gymnasium and bathing place. He was not acquainted with the exact site, but he went down there during the Easter Recess, and he must say it would be very difficult to find a more beautiful site. It seemed to possess every advantage. The harbour was landlocked; the water was almost always smooth, and there was little or no interruption from vessels passing up and down the river. These were great advantages where boys were learning to handle a boat or manage small sailing vessels. There was also the experience of the Britannia on the score of health. He was also told that the site he had looked at was much less relaxing than in the valley of the river. The walks in the neighbourhood were very beautiful, the general healthiness of the place was good, and in every respect, except that of remoteness, it was unexceptionable. On the whole he was satisfied they could not do better than choose it; and his Colleagues, naval and civil, had arrived at the same conclusion. Although satisfied as to the salubrity of the place, he had requested the Medical Director-General to make a special report upon the site. The Admiralty were offered a sufficient quantity of land at a not unreasonable rate; and he believed that any one who went down to the spot would be satisfied that a wise selection had been made.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR said, that the best information on record on the training of boys for the Navy would be found in the Proceedings of the Royal Commission of 1866 on the recruiting of the Army. The evidence of Admiral Eden, then one of the Lords of the Admiralty, was taken in great detail, and the cost of training boys was then ascertained, and, although the average was now put down at only £10 in the Estimates, yet he believed that the inclusion of establishment and all other expenses would bring the total cost per boy up to £65 a-year. It would be well if the Admiralty would direct their attention to the ample supplies of fine young lads trained up by the fisheries of the east coast of Scotland, which he believed would furnish a large number of boys admirably suited for the Navy. Under the far more favourable feelings towards the Navy as compared with that which existed in former years, when sailors were so harshly treated and so little cared for, he felt confident that boys from the fisheries to the number of 2,000 or 3,000 could easily be induced to join the service. A little encouragement to parents, the granting of family tickets, even for a few shillings a-month, would have a great influence on boys and parents. The permission to go back to their villages and to be landed along the coast by one of the vessels of war, so readily made available, and again taken up at the end of the leave, would entirely change the distrust, which still remained against naval service, into one of liking. This excellent source of supply well deserved to be encouraged. It would be easy to raise up the fisheries by improved harbours to double the strength in boats, men, and boys, now existing, and if in that improved condition, the Navy might always rely on procuring as fine lads as could be desired. He would also recommend the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War to adopt the same system of training for the Army as existed in the Navy. The Royal Commission of 1866 on Recruiting advised this mode of providing men for the Army to be considered, and now that so much was said about inefficient and insufficient numbers of recruits, he hoped that this recommendation, like many other suggestions of that Commission, would not remain in a state of neglect.

ADMIRAL EGERTON, as a naval officer, thought that at the end of 13 years it was time that the desirability of this proposed Naval College was settled, and although Dartmouth might not be the best place in all respects, still he should be glad to accept the decision of the Board of Admiralty on that point. He did not think it would be any great disadvantage to the College being fixed at Dartmouth that it would be so far away from the Admiralty. On the contrary, good would result from its being removed from the direct personal supervision of the authorities at Whitehall. A capable teacher would have greater freedom in carrying out his own ideas, and would be more likely to be successful than if he were open to constant interference.

MR. GOSCHEN thought the hon. Member for Portsmouth (Mr. Bruce) had done good service by bringing the question of the Naval College before the House. He was glad the First Lord of the Admiralty had given them the reasons which had led to the selection of Dartmouth, and it must be admitted there was considerable weight in them. He concurred with the right hon. Gentleman in thinking that Portsmouth would be an undesirable position for this institution, which would be a school rather than a college. When the Royal Naval College at Greenwich was founded, it was not considered desirable to place naval cadets there, and the objection to Greenwich applied with still greater force to Portsmouth. The remoteness of Dartmouth as the site of the College was, no doubt, to some extent, an objection, not only with regard to its supervision by the Admiralty, but also on account of the distance of the cadets from their parents. He trusted that the right hon. Gentleman would not proceed further until he had thoroughly satisfied himself from the Report of the Medical Inspector of the Navy that the site was in every respect satisfactory. In that case the establishment of the College was, in his opinion, a wise step. He was glad to hear the right hon. Gentleman proposed to give further facilities for the training of ordinary seamen in sailing ships, as the importance of such training could not be exaggerated. When he (Mr. Goschen) was at the Admiralty, he found it advisable to attach to a squadron like that in the Mediterranean a sailing vessel in which ordinary seamen might be trained, and the greatest advantages were derived from that system. If the right hon. Gentleman would attach sailing ships to some of the other squadrons, it would be a further step in the right direction. In his opinion great good would arise from the point which had been raised by the noble and gallant Lord the Member for Waterford (Lord Charles Beresford). The continuous service system must be at all hazards maintained, but there were difficulties in the way of naval barracks. The present receiving ships were, however, most costly in every way.

MR. ALGERNON EGERTON said, with reference to the remark of the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for Kincardineshire (Sir George Balfour), that the average cost of training boys for the Navy might be taken at £70. The Admiralty entirely concurred with the hon. and gallant Gentleman as to the naval qualification of the men and boys engaged in the Scotch fisheries, and one object of the recent cruise by some of the Members of the Board was to endeavour to get them to join the Naval Reserve. The hon. Member for Portsmouth (Mr. Bruce) objected to the Dartmouth site on the ground that it was near a convict prison; but the nearest prison was at Dartmoor, and that was 40 miles off.

Main Question, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," put, and agreed to.

SUPPLY—NAVY ESTIMATES.

SUPPLY—considered in Committee.

(1.) £1,106,581, Victuals and Clothing for Seamen and Marines.

MR. SHAW - LEFEVRE said, he wished for some explanations relating to an increased share of the expense of Indian troop-ships now borne by the Admiralty. They were employed by the Indian Government for seven months, and then the men were sent to the dépôt ships for five months. They were, however, practically at the disposal of the Indian Government, and could not be used in any other way. The claim of the Indian Government to be relieved from a portion of this charge was not a new one, but upon the whole it was, he thought, fair that the Indian Government should pay for the whole year.

MR. HUNT said, he feared there had been a disposition now and then to press too hardly on the Revenues of India. He had looked into the matter, and when he found that the Indian troop-ships were only employed for seven months, it certainly seemed to him exorbitant to charge them for the whole year. A satisfactory arrangement had been concluded with the Indian Government, by which the expense to which the hon. Member had referred would be borne in equitable proportions between the Government of this country and the Government of India. He hoped, in return, that the Indian Government would make some allowance under other heads.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR thanked the right hon. Gentleman for the acknowledgment he had made as to the hard pressure put on Indian finances. It was not only by the Navy, but by the Army that this pressure had been applied, and as he thought unjustly applied. The Imperial Government had seen fit to deprive India of its own Navy and of its own European Army; and then had pressed India to meet charges which would not have arisen if these forces had been kept up by India; or, at all events, the extraordinary expenses which both Departments now demanded from India for measures suited for Imperial reasons, and not for Indian purposes, would not have been incurred by India for its own services. It was creditable to the Conservative Party for having effected the arrangement to which he had referred, and which he had himself long since advocated.

MR. SHAW-LEFEVRE also considered the explanation of the First Lord of the Admiralty satisfactory.

MR. SAMUDA was about to direct attention to the position of assistant-engineers in the Navy, when—

MR. ALGERNON EGERTON rose to Order, and said, he thought the subject could not be discussed on the present Vote. It related to Vote 1, which had already been agreed to.

THE CHAIRMAN said, he could not see in what respect the question could be raised on the Vote under consideration. In any remarks the hon. Member might desire to make he must confine himself to that Vote.

MR. GOSCHEN said, that there was always a great desire on the part of the House to facilitate the passing of the 1st Vote; and it was impossible after the general statement on a Vote, to enter into particulars. If the ruling of the Chairman was good, those who objected to any item would be placed in this dilemma—either they must in future refuse to agree to Vote 1 on the night the Navy Estimates were introduced, or deprive themselves of the opportunity of raising questions which might be of great interest and importance.

THE CHAIRMAN said, his only wish was to facilitate the business of the Committee as much as possible, desiring that each Member should have full liberty to discuss every topic arising out of the Vote proposed. The hon. Gentleman the Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Samuda) would have several opportunities of bringing forward the subject to which he had referred; but in Committee it could be done only on Vote 1, which had been disposed of.

CAPTAIN NOLAN thought that Vote 1 having been passed for the convenience of the Minister, the line of exclusion ought not to be too rigidly drawn. If it were, the decision would prevent private Members from raising questions which they wished to discuss.

MR. HUNT said, he was anxious that no technical difficulty should be placed in the way of his hon. Friend bringing forward the subject to which he had alluded.

MR. SAMUDA said, that was the only opportunity he would have of calling attention to the position of the engineers. Unnecessary restrictions were, in his opinion, placed in the way of their advancement, and all he asked for was, that those who were capable of taking the position of chief engineers might be advanced to that post without being obliged to wait until they reached the age of 40; and that when they were retired they might be relieved from the humiliation of signing a paper declaring that they had been pensioned, like warrant officers or cooks. He hoped the subject would receive the consideration of the Admiralty.

SIR JOHN HAY hoped that the Chairman would reconsider his decision with reference to the limits that should be put upon the discussion on Vote 2 for Victuals, inasmuch as it was of considerable advantage that the Vote for Men should be allowed to be taken on the evening when the Estimates were first brought forward, leaving all minor points relating to that Vote to be discussed on Vote 2.

THE CHAIRMAN said, that the rule he had laid down was that most conducive to the dispatch of Business. No doubt, a certain latitude might have been occasionally allowed by his Predecessors in the Chair, and he had not, perhaps, been strict enough in enforcing the rule, being reluctant to interfere. The rule, however, was imperative that after the first Vote upon which the general discussion was had, was taken, the speakers on all future Votes were to confine themselves to the matter of the particular Vote under discussion at the time, and when his attention was called to the fact that that rule was being infringed, he felt bound to say, that he adhered to the opinion, that it was an inconvenient practice to exceed the limits of any particular Vote, after the first, in discussing that Vote.

MR. GOSCHEN asked the First Lord of the Admiralty for an explanation of an increase in the items in respect of the allowance in lieu of provisions for the Royal Naval Reserve, and the Coast Guard Service. He desired to know, also, whether any progress had been made in elucidating the subject of lighting Her Majesty's Ships; and, further, why there was an addition to the amount for clothing the Second-Class Reserve?

General Sir George Balfour

MR. T. BRASSEY was of opinion that the engineers were not sufficiently paid, and that a solution of the difficulty would be found in diminishing the number of engineer officers in the Fleet, and employing a considerable number of skilled artificers to perform the manual labour in the engine room.

MR. HUNT said, he was not inclined unnecessarily to limit discussion on naval matters, but he thought that the remarks of hon. Members on the present occasion had been extended to all the provisions, rather than the victuals of the Navy. He was, however, glad of the opportunity of saying that the very difficult question with regard to the engineers was under his consideration, although he was not yet justified in announcing his decision respecting it. In reply to the questions of the right hon. Gentleman the late First Lord, an increase of £5,466 had been caused by the addition of 4,000 men in the Naval Reserve; and of £3,867 for the Coast Guard, because it had been found that the amount hitherto taken was not sufficient; but there had been no change in the regulations. The system of lighting the ships on service was under consideration, and experiments were being made with regard to a new system; but the question was not yet ripe for decision. The increase in the Vote for clothes to the Naval Reserve was owing partly to an increase in the numbers of that Force, but mainly to a suit of clothes being given to such men as chose to re-enter that service at the expiration of their first term.

Vote agreed to.

(2.) £183,916, Admiralty Office.

MR. GOSCHEN asked the reason for changing the titles of the officers in the Constructor's department; and, whether the business at the Board of Admiralty was conducted with the same formalities as it used to be?

MR. HUNT said, that no formal change had been made in the mode of conducting business at the Admiralty; but he was led to believe that the naval Members of the Board were now consulted on many matters on which they were not consulted by his two immediate Predecessors. With regard to the titles of the officers in the Dockyard, it was represented to him that the title of Master Shipwright did not convey a just idea of the importance of the office, and it had therefore been changed into that of Chief Constructor of the Yard.

MR. E. J. REED asked, whether the effect of the establishment of a Council of Construction had been to concentrate or diffuse responsibility?

MR. HUNT said, that both in the Admiralty and the Dockyards, those at the head of the Constructor's department were responsible generally for construction. The engineers were responsible for the engineering part of the work, subject to the Constructor.

MR. SHAW - LEFEVRE observed that the newspapers had stated that the post of the late Solicitor to the Admiralty was not to be filled up at present. He ventured to suggest to the right hon. Gentleman that he should take that opportunity of considering whether some of the work performed by the Solicitor might not in future be performed by the Permanent Secretary, who was of very high legal attainments, and who, by the appointment of a Naval Secretary, had been relieved of much of his work.

MR. HUNT said, that, consequent upon the death of Mr. Bristowe, which he much regretted, a temporary arrangement had been made. No permanent arrangement would be entered upon until inquiries, which had been set on foot before that event happened, had been completed.

MR. CHILDERS expressed his approval of the arrangement.

Vote agreed to.

(3.) £188,505, Coast Guard Service, Royal Naval Reserve, &c.

MR. T. BRASSEY said, it was very satisfactory to find that the rules and regulations which had been made by the late Government were approved by the right hon. Gentleman. He hoped to see a gradual increase in the number of gunboats and drill stations for the training of the men of the Reserve during the summer months. There were many places in which drill stations might be established with great advantage to the requirements of the service.

MR. GOSCHEN wished to know the number of the Royal Naval Reserve for whom it was intended to provide?

MR. HUNT said, it was intended to employ a certain number of gunboats for training purposes during the year, and he hoped, in future, to increase that number, as he was exceedingly anxious that the men should learn to work guns afloat. With regard to the question as to the number of men to be enrolled in the Naval Reserve, there were 12,500 of the First Class, and 5,000 of the Second; and, as he had said the other day, they proposed to enrol 500 boys in a Third Class; but whether they would get the number they hoped this year, he did not know. He hoped, however, that they would come up. This would make 18,000 in all, and they hoped, from the manner in which the men were coming in, 16,900 being on the books already, to have 18,000 this year; and he further hoped that, with the increased facilities for drill, they would obtain an efficient body of men for that branch of the service.

MR. GOSCHEN hoped the right hon. Gentleman would adopt some measure of present increase of pay as an inducement to boys to join the service, which, in his opinion, would operate better than the prospect of pensions, which, however small, would, in their accumulation, become a heavy charge upon the country.

MR. E. J. REED was of opinion that small gunboats would prove of very great use for training purposes at many places where drill stations might be established.

CAPTAIN G. E. PRICE hoped that proper opportunities would be given for instruction in gunnery to those under drill. In that view 9-inch guns might be advantageously employed, under supervision, for training exercise.

MR. GOURLEY wished to know how the men of the Naval Reserve were to be found in case of a war breaking out? At present they did not turn up for drill in a satisfactory manner, and the question was, where were they to be found when a pressing call for their services might arise. The men employed in the shipyards might be made available and utilized for the requirements of the Service should urgent occasion arise.

SIR JOHN HAY hoped the Admiralty would not lose sight of the suggestion of the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for Devonport. He also wished to draw attention to the importance of having a Reserve of stokers, in case of any emergency arising.

MR. CHILDERS said, that when he was at the Admiralty the separate Coastguard Department was abolished, and that nothing had been more inconvenient than the voluminous correspondence between that Department and the Admiralty Office, and he therefore hoped that care would be taken to guard against any such system in respect to the Reserve Office.

MR. HUNT assured the right hon. Gentleman that the communications which took place between the Admiralty and the Reserve Office were of the shortest possible character, and every pains were taken to prevent any unnecessary expense. With respect to the employment of men employed on shore, it was intended to relax the regulations of the Naval Reserve so as to include in it men who had been actually at sea, but this would not extend to shipwrights who had not served on board. It was not to be expected that a man would lose his sea legs the moment he left a ship. He could not actually state the percentage of the men who did not attend drill, but it was taken into consideration in the Estimate. The question of having a Reserve of stokers—a most important question—would be considered.

(4.) £107,324, Scientific Departments.

MR. HANBURY-TRACY said, that Greenwich College was doing good service; but its usefulness would be much increased if, instead of having so many officers idle upon half-pay, they were placed upon full pay and allowed to pursue their studies in foreign languages, navigation, and other subjects. It was much to the detriment of officers that they were often kept at home on half-pay, instead of doing some kind of professional work.

MR. R. W. DUFF agreed in the suggestion, and thought that a larger sum should be allowed than £150 for the library and allowance to librarian at the College.

SIR MASSEY LOPES observed that the number of officers studying at Greenwich College was now 230, as compared with 194 last year.

MR. GOSCHEN said, that the hon. Gentleman opposite (Sir Massey Lopes) had not answered the point respecting full pay. He (Mr. Goschen) thought it was immensely to the credit of commanders and captains that at their age they should go through the very hard work of the Royal Naval College.

MR. HUNT explained that neither from the authorities of the College, nor from any officer in the service who had been there, had any representation reached him to the effect that captains and commanders should be placed on full pay, and it was not for him to originate a measure which would largely increase the Votes.

Vote agreed to.

(5.) £75,548, Victualling Yards at Home and Abroad.

(6.) £64,644, Medical Establishments at Home and Abroad.

(7.) £18,868, Marine Divisions.

In reply to General Sir GEORGE BALFOUR,

MR. HUNT said, they had very little difficulty in filling up the numbers of that force, which was but a very few men short at the present time.

Vote agreed to.

(8.) £73,330, Medicines and Medical Stores, &c.

MR. GOURLEY said, he took objection to the item of £15,500 for carrying out the Contagious Diseases Act, and asked for an explanation of how so large a sum was to be expended?

MR. ALGERNON EGERTON said, he had not the details of that portion of the Vote before him; but he could state generally that the money went to support two hospitals at the naval stations.

MR. WHALLEY said, he had spent some time at Portsmouth and Devonport Hospitals in making inquiries relative to the working of this Act, and he was convinced that no public money was better expended and for better purposes. The Act had worked well in the social interests of those districts where it was in operation.

MR. GOURLEY objected to public money being used to legalize vice.

Vote agreed to.

(9.) £15,904, Martial Law and Law Charges.

(10.) £148,823, Miscellaneous Services.

MR. SAMUDA said, he wished to call attention to the smallness of the sum (£2,000) proposed to be set apart for torpedo experiments, which he regarded as being of great and growing importance. He thought the Vote ought to be greatly increased on account of that importance.

MR. WHITWELL asked for an explanation of the great increase of the Vote for "officers and seamen."

MR. E. J. REED said, that the two vessels of extreme speed proposed to be built by the Government would be valuable in the use of torpedoes. He did not, however, think that the experiments upon torpedoes should be pushed too far, as with fast vessels, which might be used also as dispatch boats, it would be easy when required to develop by their means the best kinds of torpedo warfare. If they took any urgent measures for developing torpedo warfare they would be conferring very great benefits on other countries.

MR. GOSCHEN wished to know whether the charge for torpedo experiments was separated from the charge for maintaining the Vernon, which had been set apart for instructing officers in the use of torpedoes?

MR. HUNT said, that torpedo experiments were conducted by the War Office and the Admiralty together. The War Office Vote for the purpose amounted this year, he believed, to £4,500, in addition to the sum taken in the Navy Estimates. But that by no means represented the expenditure on the torpedo system. Independently of the Vernon, which was the torpedo school ship, the Admiralty had been fitting vessels of different kinds for the purpose of torpedo warfare, partly experimental and partly otherwise, and the fitting of those vessels came under the Dockyard Vote. One ship would cost £5,000 to have her fitted out, another £1,000, and preparations were made to adapt vessels of a smaller size for the same purpose. The question was a very interesting one, and every year was assuming greater importance. It was not desirable to go into particulars in discussing the question, but every attention was given to the matter by the Admiralty and the War Office. We had Reports from our naval attachés both in America and the Courts of Europe as to the experiments in these countries, and we were regularly receiving information on the subject.

In reply to Sir HENRY DRUMMOND-WOLFF,

MR. HUNT said, that there was one naval attaché to the Courts of Europe. He was not fixed at any one Court, but travelled from place to place.

Vote agreed to.

(11.) £888,211, Half-Pay, Reserved Pay, and Retired Pay.

SIR JOHN HAY called attention to the fact that this Vote had increased by £200,000, which was an addition to the dead weight of our naval expenditure. The good intentions, moreover, of those who proposed it, and owing to whom it had been incurred had not been realized, as the country expected they would be. He would take an opportunity of bringing the subject before the House on a future occasion.

Vote agreed to.

(12.) £681,781, Military Pensions and Allowances.

(13.) £284,529, Civil Pensions and Allowances.

(14.) £172,090, Army Department (Conveyance of Troops).

SIR JOHN HAY asked for some explanation.

MR. HUNT said, it was partly incurred in sending troops and stores to foreign stations.

Vote agreed to.

CONSIDERATION.

Order for Consideration, as amended, read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now taken into consideration."—(Mr. Ritchie.)

MR. WHALLEY said, he would move the adjournment of the debate on the ground that they ought not to proceed with the Bill at that late hour (12.45). It was re-introducing a system of Saints' days into this country, and was an interference with the trade of the Kingdom.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the debate be now adjourned."—(Mr. Whalley.)

MR. E. J. REED said, he took the same view, and should therefore support the Motion.

Question put, and agreed to.

Debate adjourned till Tuesday next.

SIR JOHN GEORGE SHAW LEFEVRE, K.C.B., LATE CLERK OF THE PARLIAMENTS.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR acquainted the House that he had received from the Lords Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury a copy of a Minute of that Board awarding to Sir John George Shaw Lefevre, K.C.B., late Clerk of the Parliaments, a special retired allowance of £2,500 a year.

The same was ordered to lie on the Table, and to be printed. (No. 52.)

NATAL—THE KAFFIR OUTBREAK.

MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS.

EARL GREY, who had given Notice to call the attention of the House to the Papers lately laid before Parliament by Her Majesty's command relating to the Kaffir Outbreak in Natal; and to move that an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that Her Majesty will be graciously pleased to allow the Act of the Parliament of the Cape of Good Hope, No. 3. of 1874, to continue in operation, said, he could assure his noble Friend the Secretary for the Colonies that in bringing this Motion forward he was not actuated by any spirit of hostility to him or to Her Majesty's Government. On the contrary, from the time the present Administration was formed he had always earnestly wished it success, and especially did he wish success to the Administration of his noble Friend, whose appointment as head of the Colonial Department gave him great satisfaction. But it was notorious that both in Natal itself and in the Cape Colony very strong objections were entertained to the policy with regard to the former that had been pursued by Her Majesty's Government, and such being the case, he thought it right that these objections should be stated in that House, in order that, if they were well-founded, they might receive proper consideration, or that, if ill-founded, they might be removed by the explanations which would, no doubt, be offered on the part of the Government. He was glad also to find that his noble Friend was himself of opinion that if any discussion at all on this subject was to be raised, this was the proper time to raise it, as he understood from him that the whole of the case was now before the House in the Papers which had been laid on the Table, and that it would not be for the public convenience that the discussion should be further delayed. That being so, he would proceed to state the grounds on which he intended to conclude by moving an Address to Her Majesty to allow a certain Act of the Cape Parliament to continue in operation. And in the first place he would give a slight sketch of the Colony of Natal. The territory of the Colony was estimated to be about one-third the size of England. Of its inhabitants there were 18,000 persons of European descent; perhaps now somewhat less, as the attraction of the diamond fields beyond the territory had led some of the inhabitants to leave Natal:—of the entire number of the population of European descent, about 8,000 lived in two towns; the remainder lived in farms and stations which were scattered widely throughout the different parts of the Colony. The Colony was also inhabited by large numbers of Natives. He believed the Native population did not fall short of 300,000. All those were not of the race of the original inhabitants. Towards the close of the last century or the beginning of this, the country was densely inhabited by the Kaffir tribes; but the bloody wars waged by a famous Zulu conqueror who invaded the territory had so nearly exterminated or dispersed its former inhabitants that when about 40 years ago the first settlers entered Natal from the Cape Colony, they found the country an almost uninhabited waste. After a time, when the Colony was formed, and the English rule established, many of the old inhabitants came back, and put themselves under British protection, which was also sought by a far larger number of the Zulus. These Zulus were in many respects a fine race of men, and they were by no means absolute savages, though not far removed from barbarism. They had among them recognized forms of laws and social customs, and a state of society which, in its own way, maintained a kind of rude order among them. After the establishment of British authority, large numbers of the Zulus continued to come into the Colony; sometimes individuals or families escaping from the tyranny of their chiefs; sometimes whole tribes flying from the attacks of stronger ones—indeed, they did so to such an extent that at last it was found necessary to impose certain restrictions on their immigration. Some of these Zulus lived among the settlers as servants and assistants; and he found that many of them displayed considerable skill as carpenters and in bricklaying and other handicrafts, so much so that some were even found capable of attending to steam machinery. A case was mentioned of a Native, living within 20 miles of the port of Durban, who possessed £600 worth of steam machinery, with which he was now manufacturing sugar from canes grown and planted by other Natives, without the aid of any White assistance or intelligence whatever. The Kaffirs supplied a large part of the domestic servants of the Colony, and to them was entrusted the postal delivery all over the territory, which they performed with punctuality and despatch. But those who were employed in these useful callings constituted but a small portion of the Zulus in Natal, who were part of the great Kaffir race spread over the South of Africa. The great mass of the race had made much less progress, and were living as tribes according to their old customs on land assigned for their use by the Government. It was obvious that the existence of so large a population of that description, though their services were valuable to the settlers, was necessarily a source of constant anxiety and danger to the Colony, and they required to be managed with great firmness and great prudence to keep them under control. These Native tribes living under the English rule were governed exactly upon the same system as the tribes beyond the boundary, who were ruled by their subordinate Chiefs, each of whom in his turn owed allegiance to the Zulu King. In like manner the tribes within the boundary were governed by their own Chiefs under Her Majesty's Representative, the Lieutenant Governor of the Colony, who, by an ordinance of the Natal Legislature, was made the supreme Chief over the Zulus, and who exercised over them the same authority as the Zulu King did in his territory. They were required to pay very light taxes, and to abstain from all acts of violence; but while they submitted to these rules there was as little interference as possible with the authority of the Chiefs. Such of the Native laws and customs of those people as were not repugnant to humanity were allowed to remain in force. This was the system which had been in successful operation in the Colony during the last 30 years. In the course of that time the interruptions to peace had been but very few; there had been no disturbance of any consequence, but order and security had been maintained; and favoured by these, the British settlers had amassed a large amount of wealth and property. The exports and imports of Natal for 1872—the last year for which he had seen the accounts—were just under £1,500,000, and the productive power of the Colony was extending itself very rapidly. Well, when Sir Benjamin Pine arrived at Natal as Lieutenant Governor in 1873, he found that great doubts respecting the loyalty of a powerful Chief were entertained by some of the principal officers of the Government, and by nearly the whole of the White population. He would not enter into the details of the circumstances which had created these doubts, and which appeared very fully in the Papers laid on the Table; it was sufficient to state that in October, 1873, Sir Benjamin Pine and his advisers thought it necessary to send a force to enforce the obedience of the Chief he had referred to, who bore the very difficult name of Langalibalele, who had been three times summoned to appear before the Governor, and evaded or neglected the summons. That would not appear to be a very grave act of disobedience to persons ignorant of Kaffir customs, but it derived great importance from the light in which it was regarded by these people. According to Kaffir law, the refusal of a Chief to obey the summons of his immediate superior was an act of rebellion deserving of the severest punishment; and in the opinion of Sir Benjamin Pine and his advisers, Langalibalele, in refusing to attend when summoned, was deliberately taking the first step in a rebellion he had been long preparing. One of the circumstances which led them to that conclusion was that he was observed to be removing the cattle of his tribe beyond British jurisdiction. Now, that also, according to Kaffir law, was regarded as a high misdemeanour and a sign of rebellion. In consequence of those proceedings and of his disobedience, an officer of the Government, supported by a force composed of Native troops and White Volunteers, was sent to him with the view of inducing him to obey the summons, and, that attempt failing, of compelling him to do so. The force was divided into different parties, in order to surround the Chief and his followers. One of the parties came upon a portion of the tribe driving cattle away from the British territory. The officer in command commenced a parley with them in order to induce those Natives to return and again place themselves under British authority. They seemed inclined to obey; but they managed to prolong the parley for two hours, and during that interval got an increased number of the Chief's followers into a commanding situation. This accomplished, they, without warning, suddenly and treacherously fired on the officer and his party, killing five of the latter and wounding him. After that open act of revolt, of course there was nothing left for the Governor to do but to put down the rebellion by force. The hostilities which ensued were only of short duration, and they ended in the driving of the rebellious party out of their strongholds in the Colony, and by the active co-operation of the Cape Government and of a subordinate Native tribe, the Chief and some of his principal followers were made prisoners beyond the frontier. Governor Pine then proceeded to try Langalibalele according to Kaffir law. Having been adjudged guilty, he was sentenced to transportation to Robben Island, and the Legislature of the Cape passed an Act to authorize his detention there. For his conduct in these transactions the Governor had been censured and recalled by the Secretary for the Colonies, and if he (Earl Grey) understood the Papers correctly, his noble Friend had arrived at this decision mainly on two grounds—first, that Sir Benjamin Pine had been too hasty in employing force against the Chief; and, in the next place, that justice had not been done to the latter in his trial and sentence. There were other points adverted to in the despatch of his noble Friend; but, as he felt the necessity of not taking up more of their Lordships' time than he could avoid, he would abstain from entering into them, and would confine himself exclusively to the two main points which he had just mentioned. On the first of these points, he submitted to their Lordships that his noble Friend had fallen into a mistake in attempting to review in this country the judgment formed by the Governor on the spot. Whether Sir Benjamin Pine was right or not turned on the question whether the Chief was or was not meditating rebellion when a force was sent to compel him to obey the Government summons. There could be no doubt that the Chief had declined to obey that summons more than once; there was no doubt that some of his excuses were false; and there was no doubt that in order to maintain the authority of the Government, it was absolutely necessary that the obedience of the Chief should be obtained either by expostulation or compulsion. So far his noble Friend and the Governor were agreed; but Sir Benjamin Pine and his advisers were convinced that the conduct of the Chief implied a determination to rebel which made it unsafe to temporize, while the Secretary of State had come to an opposite conclusion, and stated in his despatch that he could not divest his mind of the conviction that, if greater pains had been taken to sift the matter, a more just conception would have been formed of the attitude of the Chief, and that by more conciliatory measures the fatal necessity of putting a force in motion might have been avoided. Now, in his (Earl Grey's) opinion, it was a great error on the part of his noble Friend to attempt on such a question as that to review the judgment arrived at by the Governor, and, for his own part, he declined to go into an examination of the reasons which influenced the Governor on the one side and his noble Friend and the Bishop of Natal on the other in coming to the opposite conclusion at which they had arrived. He declined to balance those conflicting reasons, because he was persuaded that the point was one on which it was utterly impossible that a sound judgment could be formed in this country. To enable one to form such a judgment required an intimate knowledge of Kaffir habits and manners, and a far more accurate knowledge of the circumstances than could be conveyed in written despatches. Even if all the facts could be made known to his noble Friend, there might be many of them which in England might appear insignificant, while they might be very significant in the mind of the Governor and others seeing matters on the spot. He said it was a great error of his noble Friend to question the judgment of Governor Pine and his advisers upon a matter of this sort; because he held that the judgment of a Colonial Governor under such circumstances should be accepted as right, unless there were some very strong reasons for believing that he had been wrong. There was this strong reason for adopting this as a general rule—that unless the Governor could act on his own judgment, with full confidence that he would be supported by the Government at home, unless he were manifestly wrong, it would be utterly impossible that a people like the Kaffirs could be governed with the firmness and promptitude that were required. With regard to any Colony, it was impossible to carry on its government efficiently from Downing Street, and too much interference from home with the measures of the local authorities was always a mistake ; but in the case of a barbarous and warlike race like the Kaffirs to attempt to govern a Colony in that way could not fail to have fatal consequences. It was obvious that the Governor of such a Colony as Natal must be prepared to act with vigour in circumstances of emergency, if peace and the obedience of an almost barbarous people many times out-numbering the White population was to be preserved ; but how could you expect him to act with vigour if he knew that he could not be safe in taking decisive measures unless there was a case of necessity not only to satisfy his own mind, but also sufficient to satisfy an imperfectly-informed Secretary at some thousands of miles distance ? If Governor Pine was right in his view of the situation, and if the Chief was really plotting rebellion, immediate action was required. By this the mischief might be stopped at once—as it was—but if there was delay—if time were given to Langalibalele to go on preparing for revolt, and to gain adherents, and if other tribes were encouraged to join him by the apparent indecision of the Government, a formidable rebellion would have been likely to break out ; and, if so, though in the end it would have been put down, it could not have been so till much blood had been shed, and there had been a very considerable sacrifice of life on both sides, and a great destruction of property. He would remind their Lordships that in Natal the lives and property of a very large number of scattered settlers, whom it would have been impossible to protect, depended on the stifling of the rebellion. This had been pointed out in a very able paper written by the Treasurer of Natal. If once law and authority were set at defiance in that Colony, we should have to deal not only with the 300,000 barbarous and warlike Kaffirs within the Colony itself, but also with a large number of Chiefs and their tribes outside the Colony, who were in constant communication with the Kaffirs within, and whose love of war and plunder would be speedily excited by an outbreak in the Colony itself. The consequence might be a war of races, the results of which no man could foresee. Our policy in the case of such a Colony ought to be to support the Governor as long as there was no decisive proof that he was acting in flagrant error. Was a man like Sir Benjamin Pine likely to act in that way ? He had been in office at Natal more than 20 years before, and his conduct here met with high approbation. From Natal he was transferred to other and most important posts on the West Coast of Africa and in the West Indies, and had throughout maintained his character as an able, energetic, and honest Governor, an able administrator, and one sincerely humane and very desirous to promote the civilization of the barbarous races. The present system of government in the Colony had been established for 30 years, and had been approved by successive Secretaries of State ; the Governor, therefore, was entitled to believe that it was his duty to adhere to it, and to take those energetic steps, without which, in his opinion, there was no doubt that the whole territory would have been in a state of rebellion. Then how was his conduct in respect of Langalibalele viewed in the Colony ? Why, the opinion of the colonists, including the missionaries, English, Scotch, German, and American, was in his favour—and some of those missionaries thoroughly knew the Colony from an experience of 30 or 40 years in Natal. They were well acquainted with the character and language of the Natives, for whose welfare they had shown the most praiseworthy devotion. These missionaries, with the exception of a few followers of the Bishop, had, in the strongest manner, expressed their approval of the conduct of the Government ; and at a meeting of farmers in the Colony, regret was expressed that the action taken by Sir Benjamin Pine had not been taken five months before, and the Natal papers which reached this country on Saturday last contained further expressions of opinion on the part of the colonists that the Governor was in the right. He ventured to ask whether, in the face of such a concurrence of colonial opinion on the side of Sir Benjamin Pine, it was wise in his noble Friend to assume that in spite of his well-known character and his reputation for sound judgment, the Governor was wrong in respect of this Kaffir Chief ? He was glad to observe that as regarded the proceedings which were adopted after hostilities commenced, and before the trial of the Chief, his noble Friend did not express any censure, and did not seem to think that the charges of reckless cruelty were well-founded so far as related to any officers of the local Government. It was not to be denied that some acts of cruelty had been committed, and, of course, those were to be regretted; but such acts were committed in wars in which the most civilized countries were engaged, and it was not to be wondered at that troops consisting of Natives, assisted by settlers who had wives and children and property in the Colony, should have done some cruel acts in the course of hostilities which had been commenced by murder and treachery on the part of the rebels. But for these acts no blame had been imputed to the Governor by his noble Friend the Secretary for the Colonies. What he condemned him for was his proceedings against Langalibalele and his followers after the revolt had been put down. As he had already stated, in accordance with Kaffir law that Chief had been tried by his superior Chief, whose summons he had disobeyed, and his noble Friend had declared, in the first place, that Langalibalele ought not to have been tried by Kaffir law; and, in the second place, that the sentence of detention for life in Robben Island was too severe. It appeared to him (Earl Grey) that his noble Friend, in objecting to Sir Benjamin Pine's having himself tried Langalibalele as his supreme Chief, and especially his having refused him the privilege of being heard by counsel, had fallen into the mistake of forgetting that our whole system of administering the law, and the technical rules by which it was governed, were only means adopted in order that justice might be done. They were, on the whole, well adapted to attain their end in our state of society, though even here it might be doubted whether the end was not sometimes sacrificed to the means, and whether a failure of justice did not occasionally happen from too rigid a regard for technicalities. Be that, however, as it might, he thought it clear that our system was not fitted for rude tribes in the very infancy of civilization. In such a state of society, a much rougher mode of proceeding worked better. Among the ancient nations of Palestine, they read in the Bible that the King sat in the gate of the city and judged his people; and, even up to the present time, in a great part of Asia, judicial authority was in the same hands as executive power—the Kings and Chiefs were the Judges. This was precisely the Kaffir system; and, in his opinion, Sir Benjamin Pine had done wisely in adhering to it, and in himself judging Langalibalele his supreme Chief. That was wise, because it was of extreme importance that the proceedings in this case should be rapid; that they should be brought to a conclusion as soon as possible, and that they should be so conducted as not to cause unnecessary excitement among the Native population. If the trial had been conducted in accordance with English forms, with all the technicalities of English law, the proceedings would have gone on for a very long time, and in the end there might have been a miscarriage of justice, which would have been attended with the greatest danger. But if the Governor was to judge the culprit as his Chief, it would have been out of character with the whole proceeding to have allowed counsel to be heard in his defence. With regard to the refusal to hear counsel, on which so much stress had been laid, it ought to be remarked, too, that it was not so long ago that even, in this country, the privilege of being heard by counsel was first given to the accused in criminal cases. The Governor acted in the exercise of his discretion; and, whether he was right or wrong in the course he took, it was unfair to find fault with him for merely having followed what was an established custom of the Colony, unless it could be shown that in following it he had done some substantial wrong. There was all the less reason for finding fault with Sir Benjamin Pine on this ground, because three or four cases had previously occurred in which trials were conducted in accordance with the Kaffir law, and the Governor had not been censured in any one of those cases by the Secretary of State. And whatever opinion might be entertained as to the propriety of the mode of proceeding, could anyone say that owing to it, any substantial wrong had been done? Langalibalele had been taken in open and armed rebellion—about that there could be no doubt—and in the revolt several of our troops were killed. It appeared to him that even the Bishop of Natal confessed that there was an actual rebellion. He had read his very long, very confused, and very obscure statement; and though he did not feel very confident that he understood it correctly; if he did, it did not amount so much to a denial of the rebellion as to an argument that Langalibalele had been driven into rebellion by harsh and unfair conduct on the part of the Governor, and that therefore the Chief was entitled to be treated with indulgence. This brought him to the last point in the case—that of the too great severity of the punishment. His noble Friend held that the sentence was too severe, or, in other words, that the plea set up on that head by the Bishop was just. He altogether dissented from that view of the subject; he believed that by every nation, and at all times, armed resistance to the Government had been considered as a great crime, for which death was the appropriate punishment—and justly so; because there was no crime which tended so much to the destruction of society and led to so much evil and so much misery. We might not feel the same detestation for a rebel as for an ordinary criminal, because his crime did not imply the same moral degradation as that of a murderer or a robber; but still, looking to the consequences of rebellion, by the common consent of all nations, no crime had been regarded as greater than that of armed resistance to the State. That being so, he would remind their Lordships that in this case the crime was not merely rebellion, but rebellion accompanied by treachery and murder committed under circumstances to which he had already called attention. The Bishop, however, contended—and he presumed that view was adopted by his noble Friend opposite—that the Chief himself was not responsible for the attack made upon our troops during the parley; and that he was at a distance from the spot at the time it was made. Having considered the whole of the circumstances of the case, he (Earl Grey) must say that though there might be no proof that it was done by his direct orders, it seemed impossible to believe that the treacherous onslaught did not form a part of the general plan of rebellion to which the Chief was a party. And even though he might not have had anything to do with the crime beforehand, it was asserted in the Papers, and he (Earl Grey) could not find that it was anywhere denied, that when those who had perpetrated the crime immediately afterwards joined the Chief openly carrying the arms taken from their victims, he did nothing to show disapproval of their conduct, and allowed them to keep the arms they had thus obtained. By doing so, according to the principles not only of Kaffir, but of British law, the Chief became an accomplice after the fact in a most treacherous murder of British subjects, as well as having been guilty of rebellion. He (Earl Grey) held that if the Chief had been sentenced to capital punishment, and that punishment had been inflicted, no blame could justly have been passed on the Governor. But Sir Benjamin Pine believed that the peace of the Colony would be secured, and that a sufficient example would be made by inflicting a milder punishment, and he wisely as well as humanely determined to follow the precedent of what had been done, with the full approval of the Home Government in the case of Macomo, and he sentenced Langalibalele to detention for life on Robben Island. The Cape authorities concurred in that course, and on the advice of the Ministers, an Act was passed, authorizing the Chief's detention. His noble Friend the Secretary of State in the first instance doubted the legality of what had been done, but he had since recognized that it did not involve even any technical infraction of the law. He adhered, nevertheless, to the opinion that the punishment inflicted was too severe, and had announced his intention of advising the Queen to disallow the Act, though he had for the present postponed doing so. To disallow the Act, before some other legal provision had been made on the subject, would involve the necessity of giving liberty to Langalibalele, and that would, in his (Earl Grey's) opinion, be as dangerous as it was uncalled for. It was uncalled for, because for the reasons he had stated, he considered the punishment to which the Chief had been subjected, to be a lenient one under all the circumstances of the case. It would be dangerous in the highest degree, from the effect the liberation of that Chief would have on the minds of the whole Kaffir race. On that point he would call their Lordships' attention to the opinions expressed by persons of the very highest authority on such a question. Mr. Brownlee, one of the Ministers and Secretary for Native Affairs in the Cape Government, said, in a Paper, dated January, 1875, that—

"In considering the effect on the Natives of the release of Langalibalele, it cannot be overlooked that he possesses even greater influence from his reputed powers as a magician than he does as Chief of a large and powerful tribe."

Their Lordships were doubtless aware that the belief in magic and witchcraft prevailed universally amongst the Kaffirs, and exercised a most powerful influence over their conduct. The most dangerous war of 1850-53 was brought about, as Mr. Brownlee observed, by the agency of a magician; and with reference to that well-known fact, he said that heavy floods last year in the Trans-kei district were attributed to the captivity of that Chief, and their continuance was predicted; the still greater floods which had occurred when Mr. Brownlee wrote would, he said, enhance his importance and confirm the predictions of last year, and he then proceeded to state that—

"All the Natives feel, and those friendly to us admit, that Langalibalele has received substantial justice. His release would be considered as a sign of weakness rather than as an act of clemency on the part of the British Government, and would be attributed to his power as a magician. His importance would thus be magnified in the eyes of all the Native tribes both in the Colony and in Natal. Their minds would become unsettled and our influence impaired."

Such was the opinion deliberately expressed by the Cape Secretary for Native affairs, of whose knowledge of the people, and ability, there could be no doubt. Another of the Cape Ministers expressed the same opinion; in a letter dated December 24, 1874, after observing that Langalibalele had deliberately defied the Government of Natal, and that had he not been made prisoner quickly, it was almost certain that very serious disturbances would have taken place among the Native tribes. Mr. Molteno added—

"With all the Native tribes the one opinion and idea is that this Chief has been checkmated and defeated in his purposes, and is now justly undergoing punishment; indeed, that he has been leniently dealt with. Should he now be released, the idea with these people will be that it is from fear and distrust on our part as to the success of our policy, consequently, our difficulties in the management of the Natives would be increased enormously, so much so, that it would be impossible for us to preserve peace and the satisfactory state of affairs which has now existed for the last 20 years and upwards, in which case the question would necessarily arise as to whether the Home Government could leave us to ourselves, to bear the brunt of a policy essentially their own."

Their Lordships would not fail to notice the significance of the last words of the extract he had read from Mr. Molteno's letter. That country had now for some years acted on the policy of telling the Colonists that they must rely on themselves for protection, and that if another Kaffir war should come, they must not expect to be relieved from the necessity of providing for their own defence. He (Earl Grey) disapproved of that policy; but it had been adopted by successive Administrations; and, if it was to be adhered to, it surely would be, in the highest degree, unjust to use the power of the Crown—which was not to be exerted to protect the Colonists—in order to prevent them from employing the means they believed to be necessary to avert war with the Native tribes. Such a war, if it should once begin, could not be limited to one of the two Colonies, but would be sure soon to become a war of races, and to extend over the whole of South Africa. To take a step which involved the risk of causing so fearful a calamity would, in his opinion, be utterly unjustifiable, and it was that consideration which had induced him to make this Motion. Much as he disapproved of the policy of the Government, he might have abstained from bringing it before the House, if it had been irrevocable; but the Act had not yet been disallowed, nor the Chief released. The intention of disallowing it had been announced; but the carrying it into effect had been suspended, and he therefore asked the House to interpose its advice, and by an humble Address, to submit to Her Majesty the inexpediency of disallowing the Act of the Cape Parliament. He hoped that there might be no occasion for his pressing the Motion; he hoped that his noble Friend might be able to tell them that having already determined to delay the step he contemplated, to give time to the Cape Parliament to make some other provision with respect to Langalibalele, he would go a little further, and assure them that he would continue this delay until some arrangement had been made with the concurrence of that Parliament. Such an assurance would be perfectly satisfactory to him: he believed, indeed, that the place where the Chief was now detained was the best and safest that

ment; and though he did not feel very confident that he understood it correctly; if he did, it did not amount so much to a denial of the rebellion as to an argument that Langalibalele had been driven into rebellion by harsh and unfair conduct on the part of the Governor, and that therefore the Chief was entitled to be treated with indulgence. This brought him to the last point in the case—that of the too great severity of the punishment. His noble Friend held that the sentence was too severe, or, in other words, that the plea set up on that head by the Bishop was just. He altogether dissented from that view of the subject; he believed that by every nation, and at all times, armed resistance to the Government had been considered as a great crime, for which death was the appropriate punishment—and justly so; because there was no crime which tended so much to the destruction of society and led to so much evil and so much misery. We might not feel the same detestation for a rebel as for an ordinary criminal, because his crime did not imply the same moral degradation as that of a murderer or a robber; but still, looking to the consequences of rebellion, by the common consent of all nations, no crime had been regarded as greater than that of armed resistance to the State. That being so, he would remind their Lordships that in this case the crime was not merely rebellion, but rebellion accompanied by treachery and murder committed under circumstances to which he had already called attention. The Bishop, however, contended—and he presumed that view was adopted by his noble Friend opposite—that the Chief himself was not responsible for the attack made upon our troops during the parley; and that he was at a distance from the spot at the time it was made. Having considered the whole of the circumstances of the case, he (Earl Grey) must say that though there might be no proof that it was done by his direct orders, it seemed impossible to believe that the treacherous onslaught did not form a part of the general plan of rebellion to which the Chief was a party. Such an assurance would be perfectly satisfactory to him: he believed, indeed, that the place where the Chief was now detained was the best and safest that could have been selected for the purpose; but if an Act should be passed by the Cape Parliament which, in its judgment, would secure the two Colonies from having their peace disturbed by Langalibalele, without keeping him in Robben Island, that would be quite enough; but, simply to disallow the Act, and thus make it necessary to release him, would be a course he considered so unjustifiable that he trusted his noble Friend would be able to assure them that it would not be adopted.

Before he sat down, he hoped he might be allowed to add a very few words on another point of great importance to the welfare of that interesting Colony, though it had no direct bearing on the Motion he had to make. He observed that in the despatches laid on the Table his noble Friend had told the Governor that he contemplated a great change in the policy hitherto pursued in Natal, and it appeared that one object of this change would be to break down the power of the Chiefs. That announcement alarmed him. Hitherto the policy pursued had been to govern the Natives mainly through their Chiefs. He admitted that that system was not in all respects satisfactory; it tolerated for the present the continuance of many evil customs and practices which we should all be glad to get rid of, and especially polygamy and the oppressive treatment of women by their husbands. These things had been allowed to go on, because it had been the opinion of the ablest servants of the Crown employed in South Africa, that an attempt suddenly and violently to change customs which had so long existed and had so strong a hold on the minds of the people, would do more harm than good. Unless a large number of efficient European officers could be sent out to work a new and better system of laws, and unless their authority could be supported by a large military force, England must for the present be content to govern Natal through the Native Chiefs and by Native laws and customs. Those laws and customs might be gradually and cautiously improved if peace and order were maintained, and all violence and bloodshed were sternly put down, as they had been of late years. Security and intercourse with a civilized race would by degrees create new wants among the Natives, and call forth industry to supply them; in the meantime, the efforts of the missionaries and the increase of education would produce their effect on the rising generation, and the habits of civilized life would grow up among them. Facilities also might be given to those of the Natives who desired to withdraw from their tribes and settle among the Colonists under the same laws and with the same rights as the Whites. That was the policy which for nearly 30 had been pursued, and though improvement had not been so rapid as might have been desired and expected—in some degree owing to the continued influx of additional immigrants from the surrounding tribes keeping up the element of barbarism—still it had not, on the whole, been unsuccessful—peace and friendly relations between the White and coloured races had been maintained. Industry had begun to increase, and European implements of industry were coming into use, while education was extending among the young. The first steps of civilization, which were the hardest, had been made, and every year that went by the progress was likely to be more rapid, as the number of White inhabitants increased, and the means of communication were improved—as it was to be hoped they would be—by railways. More had been probably accomplished than if the Government had attempted to go faster, since it was not enough that changes in the laws should be good in themselves—to be really useful they must be fitted to the people among whom they were to be introduced. He therefore looked with apprehension to what had been announced as to the intentions of the Government, and especially with regard to the attempt which it seemed was to be made to break down the authority of the Chiefs. He hoped his noble Friend would be very cautious how he proceeded in that design, and that he would not forget that both in Africa and in New Zealand, the breaking down of the authority of the Chiefs from their contact with Europeans before there was anything to replace it, contributed more, perhaps, than any other single cause to produce the discontent and disaffection among the Natives which led to the calamitous wars with them in which we were involved. It was that experience which suggested the policy which had been pursued successfully in Natal, and he felt convinced it would be wise to adhere to it, and that instead of attempting to break down the authority of the Chiefs, it would be better to regulate and control its exercise, and by degrees to convert them into paid and responsible officers of the Government. The first step towards that had been made by the practice which had been introduced of deposing any Chief who grossly abused his power, and appointing another in his place. By a different policy they might easily rouse their hostility, and if a war of races should once be kindled, civilization would be thrown back for generations. But that was a subject far too large to be fully discussed on that occasion, and he had to apologize to their Lordships for having made even these very imperfect observations upon it. He would now conclude by moving the Address of which he had given Notice.

Moved that an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that Her Majesty will be graciously pleased to allow the Act of the Parliament of the Cape of Good Hope, No. 3. of 1874, to continue in operation.—(The Earl Grey.)

THE EARL OF CARNARVON: My Lords, I certainly have no cause whatever to complain of my noble Friend who has brought forward this question—neither as to the time he has chosen, nor the manner in which he has discharged his self-imposed task. If, indeed, the policy of Her Majesty's Government is to be called in question, and if it be necessary that such a Resolution as this—which I beg your Lordships to observe is a direct censure upon the policy which has been pursued—should be seriously pressed, from no one sooner than my noble Friend would I be content to accept it. I say so for this reason—I know well that no personal feeling has entered into the question with my noble Friend, and that he has been actuated solely by a sense of public duty. In fact, if it were necessary that the question should be stated against the Government at all, it could not have been more fairly, clearly, or ably stated than by him. My noble Friend begun by reviewing the early history of the Colony. Into that I will not enter. I believe his statement of it is substantially correct. But when he comes to the later period in the transactions with the different tribes

I feel myself obliged, in some degree, to traverse the same ground, because, as your Lordships are aware, the same facts admit of very different colouring. It is because I look at the transactions which my noble Friend has reviewed from a very different standpoint from him that I am obliged in part to recapitulate the facts to which he has referred. My noble Friend stated, at the commencement of his speech, that the censure I had cast upon Sir Benjamin Pine fell under two heads—first, that he had acted too hastily, and secondly that the trial and the proceedings connected with it were wrong. Now, as to the hasty action, although I admit I have touched upon it in the despatches, I do not think it is a point worth discussing. Whether the action was soon or late is of comparatively little importance. But when I come to the proceedings themselves—to the trial and its consequences—I must join issue distinctly and completely with my noble Friend. I can hardly accept a single expression which he used in connection with that matter. Throughout the greater part of his speech my noble Friend begged the whole of the question at issue, and dropped words which, were I to accept them, would not only prejudice my case but absolutely cut the ground from under my feet. He spoke of doubts and suspicions, long entertained respecting this Chief and his tribe. If there were any such doubts and suspicions, why have they not been stated to us before? Why do we now hear of them in this House for the first time? I challenge my noble Friend to go through the Papers and point to anything relating to such doubts and suspicions, beyond the most vague and cursory allusion. There has never been any doubt expressed or any well-founded suspicion alleged in these papers from first to last. My noble Friend speaks of the defiance which this Chief gave when he refused to attend the summons of the Government. If the Chief had defied the power of the Government a great part of the case of the Colonial Office would have been gone. I contend that he acted entirely under the impulse of fear and panic. My noble Friend speaks of the affair as a rebellion. It is a mistake to characterize it as a rebellion. If it had been a rebellion I admit it should have been put down with a strong and high hand. But I believe it deserves rather the name of a disturbance, which a few policemen would have effectually dealt with. And if it had been animated, as my noble Friend says, by motives of treachery, I fully admit that I should not have a leg to stand upon, and that a great part of what Sir Benjamin Pine did or sanctioned with regard to this particular Chief would have been only what the justice of the case required. But it is because I demur absolutely to the views expressed by my noble Friend that I propose to run over the main facts connected with these disturbances. The difficulty in question arose about October, 1873. It had a variety of causes, one of which was an unfortunate marriage law, which imposed a certain tax upon the number of wives which a Kaffir Chief might purchase and own. But it arose in a greater measure, I believe, from ordinances passed for the registration of guns. A large number of the Kaffirs in their dealings with the Whites were paid in guns instead of money, and these transactions seemed to be recognized by the authorities. At all events, when the Natives brought home the guns which were the price of their labour, the Natal Government summoned them to have those guns registered. In many cases the guns were brought in for registration. But I have to call your Lordships' attention to two important facts—namely, that sometimes guns which were taken away from the Natives for the purpose of registration were not returned; that the tribe of Langalibalele were guilty of disobeying the law in a lesser degree than other tribes, against whom no proceedings whatever were taken. My Lords, if it was fair to insist on the registration of guns in this tribe, obviously it was only fair to insist upon guns belonging to other tribes being registered also. This Chief it appears was summoned no less than three times. At first he made excuses; but subsequently, knowing that he had failed to comply with the law, and fearing the action of the Government, he fled, and his tribe fled with him. The Colonial authorities at once started a force of Volunteers in pursuit. They came up with the retreating tribe; a parley ensued, and then—not, as I conceive, by any premeditation or treachery—for of this there is really not a shadow of evidence—a gun was fired, an unfortunate panic seized the White Volunteers, Langalibalele's men fired upon them, and in the fray five valuable English lives were lost. It was a deplorable event altogether; but I own I cannot see throughout these Papers any evidence of any premeditation, still less of any treachery such as my noble Friend has described. Scarcely had this affray occurred than the whole tribe seemed to be seized with panic, and again fled. They were pursued, the Colonial forces got up with them, and there was, I am afraid, a great deal of bloodshed. My noble Friend says I have failed to censure the Natal Government for what occurred at that particular time. When I reflect, however, on the difficulty of holding the Native auxiliaries in check, I feel I am not in a position to press that part of the case against the Natal Government. There was no wish or intention on their part to run to any excesses, and I prefer to draw a veil over proceedings which will not bear the light of day. For the next step in this unhappy business, Sir Benjamin Pine and the Natal Government are unquestionably responsible. The action was directed against the tribe, the tribe was broken up, its lands were harried, women and children were summarily expelled from their homes and placed in servitude, their property was confiscated by the State; and no less than £50,000 or £60,000 in cash was paid into the Colonial Exchequer. This was a severe punishment for a tribe which, so far as I know, had taken but little part in the disturbances. But the Natal Government went on to take proceedings against a neighbouring tribe against whom I am absolutely unable to find anything in the Correspondence involving guilt or complicity. The utmost I can discover as furnishing a reason why it was considered right to take measures against this tribe was that they had harboured some women or cattle of another tribe. The dispatch went on to say—although I am at a loss to follow the argument—that even under English law such an offence would make the offender amenable to punishment. This serves, at all events, to show the somewhat exaggerated view which, under the influence of the moment, was taken of the matter. Well, the next point of my noble Friend is the trial of Langalibalele. Langalibalele having been captured beyond the frontier was brought to trial. I cannot go into this part of the case without pointing out how anomalous in many respects are the circumstances of that trial. The Court itself was a very singular tribunal. The head of it was Sir Benjamin Pine himself, the Commander and Chief of the Forces and Governor of the Colony, and who combined in his own person the position of Judge and prosecutor, he being, in order to sum up the anomaly, head of the Court to which an appeal would lie. Then came the heads of tribes which were hostile to Langalibalele, and who would naturally follow the ruling of the White Judges; and, in the next place, certain colonists formed part of the tribunal. Of them, however, I prefer to say nothing, except that it seems to me for the sake of appearances to be unfortunate that one of those White Judges should have been the father of one of the young men who had most unhappily lost his life on the frontier. It would, I cannot help thinking, have been more wise and more prudent—although I am sure no personal feeling was allowed to influence his mind—if he had abstained from sitting as one of the Judges in the case. Lastly, I may observe that to complete the anomaly, the members of the Court did not sit continuously, some coming and going throughout the whole trial, some sitting only part of the time, and others at other times. Thus much for the composition of the Court. But my noble Friend says that in the despatches contained in these Papers I have objected to the employment of Native law. Now, I never did anything of the sort. My objection was not so much to this Chief being tried under Native law as to his trial being conducted under a mixture of Native and English law. Therein consists, it seems to me, the gross anomaly of the whole proceeding. My noble Friend has pronounced a panegyric on Native law; but originally it was retained in the Colony on the understanding—firstly, that it was to be applied to Natives as between themselves, and, in the second place, that it was to be maintained only so long as was absolutely necessary, and that the moment a higher system could be attained it should pass away. In this case it was not applied as between the Natives themselves, for the issue was between Natives and Whites. Its application, therefore, was most preposterous and dangerous. I admit it is a very convenient weapon to make use of, under certain circumstances, against the Native Chiefs, and Sir Benjamin Pine, being described by law as a Native Chief, is held to be absolute. But in a despatch written by my noble Friend in 1848, I find his definition of a Native as one who is ignorant of, and unfit by habit for, the duties of civilized life; so that your Lordships will at once see that Sir Benjamin Pine, being described by law as a Native Chief, answers the terms of one who is unfit by habit and ignorance for the discharge of those duties. But what, my Lords, I so much object to is not, as I said before, Native law, as the mixture of Native and English law. Let us have either one or the other. To have recourse to both is likely, I think, to be productive of unfairness, for it scarcely seems right when you fail to reach a man by Native law to have recourse to English law, and when you fail to reach him by English law to fall back upon Native law. One or two words more as to the Court and its procedure. One of the Native witnesses produced stated that the Chief ordered the messenger of the Government to be put to death; and it was no doubt believed that he had been stripped of his clothes, which would have been a great insult to the Government of Natal and a manifestation of the worst intentions. When, however, the matter was examined into it turned out that all the messenger had been compelled to do was to take off his cloak, and that upon the ground that on a previous occasion when the cloak was kept on a pistol had been used with serious effect upon the Natives. Yet upon that evidence in a great measure the prisoner was convicted. The next step in the trial to which my noble Friend alluded was, in my opinion, a fatal one. The prisoner was denied the assistance of counsel and never even saw the indictment against him until the very morning of the trial. His plea of "Not Guilty" was, moreover, construed by the Court as a plea of guilty:—and I am perfectly lost in astonishment to find that a tribunal, partly composed of English gentlemen, could have thus acted. The result of the trial was that the prisoner was convicted and sentenced to confinement for life. I was advised that that sentence was one which it was wholly beyond the power of that Court to pass, and that it was illegal. It was impossible to carry it out without having recourse to the assistance and co-operation of the sister Colony. The Legislature of the Cape of Good Hope, with the best intentions of rendering assistance to a neighbouring Colony in what was felt to be a great and a critical difficulty, came forward and passed the Act to which my noble Friend referred, under which the prisoner was transported and confined on Robben Island; and although the actual confinement may be legal, the sentence to which that Act was afterwards applied is wholly and unquestionably illegal. It only remains to say, in conclusion, on this particular point that there was an appeal first to the Executive Council and subsequently to the Supreme Court, and that, as might have been expected, inasmuch as the Judges in each case were the same, the appeal was in each case dismissed. My noble Friend, among the charges which he has thought fit to bring against me, has not, I think, accused me of this, although I have been greatly accused of it in the Colony, and I wish to say one word about it. It has been said that I have acted hastily. My Lords, no charge could possibly be more unfounded. I can appeal to these Papers and to the whole of the facts of the case, which are in the recollection of all who have followed these transactions, to show whether I have at any time acted with haste. It was long before I brought my own mind to any conclusion on the subject. When, last year, I was strongly urged to lay all the Papers before Parliament, I declined to do so simply because I felt that the production of the Papers at that particular stage might give an unfair colour to these transactions. My Lords, I am in this difficulty—that if, as sometimes happens in correspondence, I have expressed a strong or, as my noble Friend says, a peremptory opinion, I am then told that it is Downing Street tyranny and oppression that is being revived. If, on the other hand, I endeavour to deal gently and considerately—as, for instance, in the despatch in which I announced to Sir Benjamin Pine that he was relieved of his duties as Governor—then I am told that I am so uncertain in my expressions that I do not know my own mind. That is rather hard; and an unfair dilemma in which to be placed. My noble Friend has more than once spoken of the peremptory tone of my

despatches. Now, I would rather be judged by these despatches than by anything I say here to-night, because they were written with the utmost care and consideration that I could give them, and, as far as I know, there is no expression and no word in them which I regret or am prepared to recall. I cannot for one moment lament having expressed my strong view of the illegality, of the unwisdom, of the injustice of those proceedings. I should have been unworthy, as it seems to me, to hold the Seals of the Colonial Office, if holding such an opinion I had refrained from giving expression to it. If there be any truth whatever in our theory and idea of Empire, surely it is in this—that the servants of the Crown are bound to have a conscience in this matter, and bound, also, to have a voice; and when an act of wrong or injustice has been done in any part of the Empire it is their duty to raise their voice in its condemnation. If the ties of the Empire really will not bear that strain upon them, then I say the whole Imperial theory becomes an absolute fiction, and worse than fiction. My Lords, I have been constantly accused—and there was much in what my noble Friend said which endorsed the charge—of having sacrificed the whole merits of this case to some notion of abstract justice. I can only say that I do not know where abstract justice exists. But if it is meant that I have sacrificed to some theoretical and fanciful notion of abstract justice what was expedient and practicable in this case, I utterly and entirely deny that allegation. I have thought all through of that which was expedient, and that which I believed was practicable; and my hope and belief is that when this question is brought to its final conclusion it will be found that the course which Her Majesty's Government has taken has not only been wise and safe, but also eminently founded on what was practicable under the circumstances. My noble Friend dwelt strongly, and most severely perhaps, on the utter impolicy and folly of which I was guilty in attempting to govern Natal from Downing Street. He asked how was it possible that any Minister sitting in Downing Street could be so conversant with all the details of Native affairs as to interpose in such a quarrel as this, and to issue a mandate deciding on the question at a distance of thousands of miles? Surely my noble Friend must see that there is some limit to this argument, and if it is pressed home not only is there an end, as I have said, of all justice, of all right, of the expression by the Home Government of what they think to be just and right, but an end also of all that control which I hold it is the business of the Minister here to exercise. If you tell me, on a question involving the lives and property of 15,000 Natives, and also 15,000 of Her Majesty's subjects, where I believe, on good evidence, that wrong has been done, that injustice has been committed, that the Colony itself is placed in a dangerous position by that injustice, that I am not to pronounce an opinion in any degree affecting the decision of the matter, then I say you make the Colonial Minister a mere puppet, and the sooner you abolish the Colonial Office and the Colonial Minister the better. But I deny altogether that that is the case. There are many views which are best to be seen at a distance. It is not always those who stand close to mountains who really can take in their full proportions or distinguish their true character. While I admit that it is very difficult for a Minister here in England to be accurately informed of a thousand and one local details, it is, on the other hand, competent for him—and he is often best qualified, I think—to judge, being at a distance, of the broad outlines of truth and justice and of right and wrong. One of these days the Colony itself, I hope, will do me better justice than I have now received. At present this is the day of public meetings, of condemnatory resolutions, and I cannot expect at this moment very much mercy at their hands. Still, I think that as time goes on, under a calmer view of the circumstances, the colonists will feel that I have, at all events, been actuated not only by friendly feeling towards them, but by no desire to interfere in their local concerns more than was absolutely necessary to me as a responsible Minister of the Crown. My noble Friend dwelt with great force—and it had all the more force because it was done indirectly—upon the danger with which an unadvised step might precipitate such a Colony as Natal. He hinted in no doubtful language that, with the numbers, the strength, the power of organization which existed in the various tribes, the risk of any mistaken action now might involve us in trouble, and possibly in war. To whom does my noble Friend say that? Does he conceive that these dangers, these risks, could have for one moment been absent from my mind? I venture to say that no one in this House has thought of them more or more anxiously, more fully, and in every point of view, than I have endeavoured to do. There is not one single step that I have taken in which I have not endeavoured to the best of my judgment, knowledge, and ability to give them their due weight. When I urged on the Cape Government to allow the prisoner to locate, as it is termed, under certain restrictions, near Cape Town, it was with a view to those risks. When I recently advised Her Majesty's Government to send out a distinguished officer—but who goes there, not in a military, but civil capacity—it was with the same view to meet those risks. Any one who knows anything of the state of a South African colony, where we are in contact with large masses of the aborigines, must be aware that no matter of any importance can arise in that part of the world in which there is not or may not be the germs of serious danger. But I say it is no reason because there is danger for saying, as my noble Friend does by his argument, that you are bound to throw the whole control into the hands of the Local Government, and may yourselves dispense with the administration of those functions which reside in the Home Government, and so absolve ourselves from all responsibility as to the administration of justice and the rights and liberties of the nations over whom this country claims dominion. What, therefore, is my conclusion? It is this:—I have had to deal, first of all, with certain proceedings in Natal which I have already described; secondly, with the Act which has been passed by the Cape Legislature. As regards those proceedings in Natal, I have said it was impossible for Her Majesty's Government to accept them. We could not make ourselves parties to them. It was in their power to express the opinion they held, and as far as possible to find a remedy. But when you come to deal with the Act, that is altogether a different matter. Let me ask your Lordships to consider for one moment what that Act was. The sentence which had been passed by the Natal Court was, I venture to say without fear of contradiction, not only unjust, but also illegal. Ignorant of that illegality and actuated by the best intentions towards a sister Colony, the Government of the Cape came to the rescue and passed that Act in order to give the power of transportation to Robben Island. The Act consequently gave effect to that which was an illegal sentence. Her Majesty's Government could not accept such a position. They proposed to the Cape Government the release of the prisoner; but, at the same time, conscious that there would be a risk in bringing him back to Natal, and desirous to avoid all possible danger, they proposed that he should be located—as the term is—somewhere in the neighbourhood of Cape Town, where he could be placed under surveillance. The Cape Government, while expressing anxiety to meet Her Majesty's Government in every possible way, argued that it would be difficult to impose such restrictions upon the prisoner when he was released as would give a security for his retention in that particular part of the country, and they urged—and urged in very reasonable language—that his escape beyond the Cape frontier, and his return to his own country and to his allies would be a fruitful source of danger. On these grounds they declined for the moment to give effect to my earlier despatch. My Lords, in a certain measure, as I think, I have shown that I can sympathize with the difficulties which the Cape Government felt:—some of the arguments, however, I cannot subscribe to. When I read in Sir Henry Barkly's despatch the observation that the disallowance of the Act might be construed as an improper interference with the self-government of the Colony, I confess I was at a loss to understand the argument. I believe it arose from a pure and absolute misconception of the facts—certainly from an entire misapprehension of the intentions of Her Majesty's Government. I think I have set that matter at rest. I have explained that there cannot be the slightest desire or intention on our part to interfere with the system established in the Colony, and have shown that the Cape Government themselves by passing that Act contributed in a certain degree to produce the present difficulty, and therefore that it is only reasonable and fair they should meet us half-way and co-operate with us in seeking to arrive at a satisfactory settlement. My noble Friend urged that the disallowance of the Act might be fatal to the peace and safety of South Africa. I quite admit that if this man were released without any restrictions being placed upon him, there would be a risk of dangerous consequences. But I beg the House to observe that that never was our intention, and was distinctly stated in the last despatch not to be our intention. Her Majesty's Government have consented, indeed, that the Act should not be disallowed until legislative provision has been made as best it can for placing the prisoner under the restrictions which seem necessary. If the Cape Legislature could pass an Act for the imprisonment of this man, they can also pass an Act for surrounding him with such safeguards as the public security demands—there is no difficulty on that point: and when therefore my noble Friend asks what course Her Majesty's Government will take with regard to the disallowance of the Act, my answer is that I fully hope and expect that the Government and Parliament of the Cape will meet us half-way, and that, acknowledging the mutual and reciprocal obligations which in this as in many other things bind the Colony to the mother country, they will endeavour to meet Her Majesty's Government with the same good feeling that we are disposed to extend to them, and will at once consent to adopt the course of passing an Act which will surround this man with the proper restrictions after his release. If—what I believe to be almost impossible—the Cape Government should decline altogether to co-operate with us, then I can only say that Her Majesty's Government must take that most extraordinary state of things into their consideration, and act with reference to it according to the best lights they have. But I am bound to say at once that it is an entire mistake to suppose it possible for us to consent to the indefinite continuance of that Act, for it is an Act which clearly gives effect to an illegal and unjust sentence of perpetual imprisonment passed upon a man who is, after all, a British subject and entitled to all the rights of a British subject. I wish to add a few words with reference to the concluding remarks of my noble Friend—which, as he himself acknowledged, travelled somewhat beyond the actual scope of his Motion. I quite admit that the question does not end with the mere release of Langalibalele. Matters must be placed henceforward upon a surer basis than they have been in the past. It was with that view that Her Majesty's Government sent out to Natal so able and distinguished a man as Sir Garnet Wolseley. I hope and believe that many changes in the Native law will be carried out, with the best possible results. But let me point out that there has been a great alteration in the state of affairs since the noble Earl was Colonial Minister. Let me remind your Lordships with whom we have to deal. First, there is the Cape Colony, with its responsible government. Next there is the Colony created and founded by my noble Friend opposite. Then there are two Dutch Republics, which are really united with us by many ties. Then there are districts such as British Kaffraria, governed by independent Chiefs; there are the Zulus; and lastly there is the colony of Natal. At the time my noble Friend was Secretary of State there were not, I think, 100,000 Natives in the Colony. Now there are between 300,000 and 400,000. The tribes live in a state of segregation, and are the centres of armed strength—it may be even of rebellion. Barbarous customs, which it was the intention 25 years ago gradually to get rid of, have been in some respects strengthened rather than weakened. In the interest both of the public safety and of civilization, it is important that this state of affairs should come to an end. Hitherto the interests and systems of all the States in South Africa have conflicted with each other. My wish is to see those interests and systems brought into greater unity. I desire, in the first instance, to see a greater development of those great resources which South Africa possesses. Secondly, I desire to see a uniform system adopted in these States, because as long as different systems exist among them there will be a perpetual source of danger. And, lastly, I look most earnestly to a better understanding being created between the two Dutch Republics and ourselves. I think it would be to the interest of all parties to concur in demanding that there should be a better understanding and a more conciliatory course of action between those Republics and our Colonies. None of the great objects which I have indicated can ever be realized unless they are founded upon justice; they cannot rest on an Act which is tainted with injustice and illegality, and it is on that ground, and on that ground alone, that I must meet the Motion of my noble Friend with a direct negative.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, he could assure his noble Friend opposite and the House that he was far too sensible of the difficulties which surrounded Government at all times in dealing with the complicated affairs of South Africa to be desirous of saying anything which would create any addition to the embarrassment under which the noble Earl the Secretary for the Colonies laboured. He had read the Papers with great care, and he was obliged to say that he concurred in the main with the views expressed by his noble Friend (Earl Grey) as to the policy which had been pursued by Her Majesty's Government with regard to the matter which he had that night submitted to the consideration of the House. He could not concur in the proceeding of his noble Friend the Secretary of State with regard to this Act. He could conceive that his noble Friend should come to the conclusion that the policy pursued by the Natal Government ought to be to a certain extent revised; but he could not understand how his noble Friend could have proceeded to pronounce a decision without first adopting the very simple expedient of taking time to ascertain the views of the Cape Government. He might be quite wrong—and he should be glad if he was wrong to be set right—but his strong belief was that Her Majesty's Government had no power to direct the removal of Langalibalele from Robben Island to a place within the Cape Colony, with strong restrictions against his re-entering Natal. The present system of Government at the Cape by a responsible Ministry had been established but a short time: he believed that thus far it had worked well, but it was obviously especially necessary that Her Majesty's Government should do nothing which would weaken its authority. So far from doing this, however, the noble Earl, without first ascertaining whether the Cape Government would assent to the course which he proposed, informed Langalibalele that he would be released from Robben Island, and caused to be issued a Proclamation in which he pledged himself that when released from the island, Langalibalele should not return to Natal. Further, the noble Earl seemed to have contemplated establishing the whole Amahlubi tribe in the place to which Langalibalele was to be transferred from Robben Island.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON said, the noble Earl had misunderstood the line of action which was contemplated. It was only intended that Langalibalele should be accompanied and surrounded by his immediate relatives and friends.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, his misunderstanding was due to the vague terms in which, unfortunately, the Proclamation had been drawn. He had no desire to suggest to the Cape Parliament that they should refuse to comply with the wishes of Her Majesty's Government, and he certainly hoped that a course would be taken in which the Imperial and Colonial Governments would be able to agree; but, at the same time he strongly deprecated the taking of any dictatorial course by the Home Government in reference to the Colonial Legislature. The inevitable result of such a course must be to land this country in responsibilities and possible consequences of no light description. The noble Earl who had brought this question forward (Earl Grey) took what seemed to be the correct line when he said that Parliament at home was scarcely competent to deal with questions involving such intricate local details of Colonial Government as were raised in the question before the House, although, no doubt, the Imperial Parliament ought to reserve to itself the right to review, and, if necessary, to revise the decisions arrived at by Colonial Governors and legislative bodies in Crown Colonies, such as Natal. His noble Friend the Colonial Secretary contended that it was begging the whole question to say that Langalibalele had been guilty of a great crime; and further he said that the Chief in running away acted simply from fear. This, however, was not nearly the whole of the offence that was charged against him. A charge having been made against Langalibalele and his tribe, the Chief was called upon to answer it, in accordance with the whole sum and spirit of Kaffir law and tradition, which held the Chiefs of tribes responsible for the acts of their subjects and followers. The noble Earl himself admitted that a serious crime had been committed, and added that his recommendation to the Queen to remit the punishment was based upon the fact that, in his opinion, the sentence was too severe. The noble Earl himself said in his despatch—

“For this, which he (Langalibalele) knew to be a serious crime according to all the conditions and usages of his tribe, he was deservedly and justly punished.”

And no one could doubt that he had committed a serious offence. He was legally summoned by the Supreme Chief the Governor, to appear at the seat of Government; he did not appear to give any account of his proceedings, and having treated the messenger sent to him with indignity, a force was sent to compel him to appear. This force was attacked by some of the Chief's followers and five men were slain. Having made the despatch of this force necessary by his disobedience, he must be held to be guilty of the murder of these five British subjects. By the whole system of Kaffir law and tribal relations the Chief was responsible for the acts of his followers; and Langalibalele had not only permitted his men to keep their arms, but had identified himself with them after this most treacherous murder. His noble Friend (the Earl of Carnarvon) held that the trial to which the Chief was subjected was not a fair one. Now he quite admitted that Sir Benjamin Pine would have been better advised if he had simply dealt with the case by his authority as Supreme Chief administering Native law; but, at all events, the intention of Sir Benjamin Pine was that the trial of the offenders should be made more full and fair than they were entitled to by adding to the Native law—to which they were amenable—some of the forms and procedure of the English Courts. So that, in truth, no injustice had taken place in respect of these proceedings, for all the changes that had taken place were in extenuation and mitigation of the Native procedure. It was not difficult to imagine a more perfect legal system under which the trial could have taken place; but the only course open to Sir Benjamin Pine was to administer to the best of his ability the law as he found it. It was said that the sentence was illegal; but, if so, how would it be cured by the substitution of an Act, as suggested by the noble Earl, for confining Langalibalele on the mainland for the Robben Island Act? The noble Earl who had introduced the subject (Earl Grey) had laid down the policy that it was exceedingly undesirable that the Crown should be advised to set aside the Acts of Colonial Governments. In this principle he (the Earl of Kimberley) concurred. He held that it was not desirable to interfere with the discretion and judgment of those on the spot, unless a very clear case indeed was shown that they had committed a serious error. In this case he did not think that it could be shown that any such error had been committed. He thought that with a smouldering state of rebellion in the Colony the Government of Natal were justified in calling upon Langalibalele to give an account of his actions—that when he did not respond to their orders they were right in sending a force to coerce him—that when they had sent that force and it had been treacherously fired upon they had no alternative but to follow him; and that, having captured him, they had no alternative but to try him, and that the sentence passed upon him was not too severe. So far as the Chief was concerned he (the Earl of Kimberley) did not think the punishment either unjust or excessive; but he was ready to admit that the Government had punished the tribe too heavily—it would have been sufficient to punish the ringleaders. He also agreed with the noble Earl (the Secretary of State) that the punishment inflicted on the Putili tribe was not justifiable: it was only fair, however, to the Natal Government to remember that even before they received an intimation of the noble Earl's opinion they had taken steps to remedy this injustice by replacing the tribe in its location. No doubt some cruelties had been committed. They must, however, make an allowance for a population of 15,000 or 16,000 White people placed amid 300,000 Natives; and though things had been done in hot blood which were to be regretted, no cruelties had been committed in cold blood. He would say nothing of Sir Benjamin Pine's merits, as he was responsible for his appointment, except that he believed him to be a singularly humane man; but with regard to Mr. Shepstone he was a man who for many years had conducted successfully the most difficult relations with Native tribes that existed in any part of the world. Mr. Shepstone approved and counselled every step of Sir Benjamin Pine; and would it be believed that, having been the prime counsellor in these proceedings, and the Governor having been recalled the Imperial Government sent out another Governor, with instructions that he was to rely on the advice and assistance of Mr. Shepstone. He (the Earl of Kimberley) did not wish to say anything unkind of the Bishop of Natal; but when he read his confused, illogical, and unfair pamphlet, and when he set against it the opinion of Sir Benjamin Pine, Mr. Shepstone, and Sir Henry Barkly, he was surprised that his noble Friend should have acted simply on the views of the Bishop. [The Earl of CARNARVON: No, no.] His noble Friend had taken the precise course which the Bishop of Natal recommended. In a preface to his pamphlet the Bishop suggested that Langalibalele "may be suffered to retire into private life under proper surveillance for a time." So much was the Bishop carried away by his feelings that he could not find in his pamphlet a single word of regret for the murder of the White men; and though he (the Earl of Kimberley) did not wish to make that an accusation against the Bishop, who was certainly actuated by perfectly pure and honourable motives in the course he had taken, he complained that this matter should have been judged on the views of the Bishop, to the neglect of the views of other persons more competent to form an opinion. He trusted that his noble Friend would be able to reconcile his action to the Cape Government, and he hoped that the Cape Government would look at this matter calmly, and remember that any dissension between the Colonial and Imperial Governments could not tend to their benefit. He hoped also that Her Majesty's Government would be able to find a way out of the difficulties in which they were involved, and would greatly rejoice if this affair should lead to no further embarrassment.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: My Lords, I feel as much as any of your Lordships the necessity of upholding the Government of this country, and of strengthening the hands of those who administer public affairs in our distant Colonies. I sympathize as much as anyone with what I believe to be the feeling of our fellow-countrymen who are in the Colony of Natal—a small handfull of Englishmen in the face of an overwhelming Native population. I sympathize in their anxieties, and in what cannot be described otherwise than their natural apprehensions, lest anything should be done to endanger their position in the face of tribes with whom their relations are so often unsatisfactory. This is a subject on which, however, I feel unable to keep silent. I should be ashamed to occupy the place I have the honour to hold, if I did not protest against the observations which have fallen to-night from the two noble Earls who support this Motion. England exercises too wide a sway, has too large an Empire, and interests much too high at stake, to allow or tolerate that which is an absolute and thorough injustice to be perpetrated with impunity in any part of her dominions. I will show your Lordships that this is no question of technicality; no question on which a quibble can be raised as to what was the law under which the prisoner should be tried. It is not a question which can be slurred over and buried, or with regard to which we can say—"Well,"—to use the expression of the noble Earl who spoke last—"it was not satisfactory, but after all the man who was tried was a very bad man, and if he had not committed the offence which he did, he would have tried to do something else; so the best thing we could do was to confine him." England, my Lords, cannot afford to hold language of that kind, or to shrink from expressing its approval or disapproval of an act done under the authority of one of its colonial Governors. And when I hear that any statesman can approve what has been done in this instance, I can only express my most unfeigned astonishment. I ask your Lordships to consider for a moment what is the state of the case. I am not going to enter into some of the acts charged against this Native Chief, which, according to the law, were punishable, or into what the exact amount of punishment to be assigned to them should be. I believe him to have been rightly accused of not having obeyed the summons to appear before his Chief. I am not going to dispute that he was in fault when he proceeded to withdraw his cattle and the members of his tribe across the frontier. But the great offence on which he might most properly have been convicted in proper form was that he was said to be guilty of the murder of five men, who were killed in the collision between the troops of the Colony and his tribe. Now, what occurred was as follows:—This tribe was believed to be retreating with their women and children across the frontier. Their Chief had not attended when summoned; and for that reason the Governor proceeded to undertake against the tribe what he calls in some places a proceeding to arrest the Chief, but which was in reality a military operation. I do not complain of the Governor for undertaking that operation; but it was a military excursion in pursuit of a warlike tribe engaged as I have described. It was, under the circumstances, all but inevitable that a collision should occur. So the Governor thought; but he issued the very prudent and humane order that his troops should not be the aggressors. The Chief of the tribe, Langelibalele, had gone forward with some advanced portions of it; they had crossed over the border, and were not on the spot where the collision occurred. That is proved by the evidence of the Government of Natal itself. A parley was held, but without effect. Meantime a sudden panic arose among some of the troops, engendered, as is stated by the Governor, by the cowardice and folly of one of the Volunteers. He called out that the troops were surrounded, and a retreat at once commenced. Then it was that—obviously without any premeditation—the firing took place on the retreating body of soldiers, ending in the very disastrous result of the death of five men. Now, I do not say one word as to what should be the punishment of a person actually engaged in such a transaction; but to make a man who was miles distant, and who could know nothing of what was going on behind him, responsible for the murder of these men is, according to any idea of law which we have, out of the question. It is said that because, at a later period, when Langelibalele was arrested there was in his company a man who was present when the occurrence took place, he must on that ground alone be held responsible, is simply absurd. Now, I beg your Lordships to consider what was done on this occasion. In the first place, let me advert to the Judges before whom Langelibalele was tried. I do not, let me at the outset observe, concur in the criticisms which have been made on the fact that the Governor was at the head of the Court, for under the Colonial Act it was provided that a fit and proper person should be appointed. But one of the five Judges was the father of one of those who had been killed at the collision while in command of some of the Volunteers. What, I would ask, would be thought of English justice, if the father of a man said to have been murdered was appointed to try a prisoner accused of the crime? Is it possible that noble Lords can stand up in this House and say that this is a matter of no importance—a mere matter of form—and that that opinion is to go forth to our Colonies as our idea of English justice? Is there not, I would ask, a Supreme Court in Natal? I want to know if this prisoner was to be tried by an admixture of English and Native law, why was it that the Judges of the Supreme Court were not associated with the others in the trial? What reason could there be except that the ingredient of law was to be excluded from it? But that is by no means all—worse remains behind. Let us see what occurred at the trial. The Governor explained to the tribunal what they were to do. "We are assembled," he said, "to try Langelibalele for the greatest crime a human being can commit against society—for rebellion against the authority of the Queen." He then goes on to say that while the Court was willing to give the prisoner the benefit of an inquiry according to Native law, they would temper that law as much as possible with mercy. "We are Christian men and live under a Christian dispensation." Well, the prisoner is called upon to plead—the forms of English law being thus resorted to—and his plea, which the Court construed into a plea of guilty, is the longest I have ever seen, for it occupies more than a page. But it was in reality a plea of not guilty. The prisoner's plea admitted some of the facts stated, but alleged that if the prisoner's view was right, the conclusion drawn from them was entirely erroneous. It was a plea which the youngest magistrate in this country would immediately have ordered to be entered as one of not guilty. But it was taken at once as a plea of guilty; and, thereupon six of these impartial Judges—Native Judges—pronounced judgment.

"Mafingo (one of these Judges) said that among Natives there would be very little talk over such an offence as this. The prisoner occupied the position of a dog, which if it bit its master would be killed with little consideration . . . and 'his conduct had disgraced every black man in the Colony and made every native feel resentment towards him.' Another (Nondonise) said 'no black man, no white man, but lifted up his hands in amazement at the course he (Langelibalele) had pursued.' Another native Judge (Manxele) concurred in all that had been said and felt that if he said anything he would be only needlessly taking up the time of the Court."

So that you commence with an allegation of not guilty being entered as a plea of guilty, and then you have six of the Judges pronouncing sentence on that plea of guilty. The prisoner was then removed. The Court re-assembled next day—and will your Lordships believe what happened? The night, I suppose, had been spent in considering a little the position in which they stood, because on the Court meeting again it is said, "The Court will now proceed to hear evidence." Will your Lordships believe that this occurred in a British Colony among sane men, professing to administer law and English justice? It is said that they met "to place on record the extent of the prisoner's crime." The second day they spent in taking evidence, after the man had been pronounced guilty. On the third day a complete change of scene occurred. The Court re-assembles and the Lieutenant Governor says—"I wish, before we commence business to-day, to state that I have determined to allow counsel to the accused in the person of an European advocate." The Lieutenant Governor went on to say emphatically that this was not allowed in any Kaffir Court, that it must not be taken as a precedent, which would be a dangerous thing in the Colony and that he was only induced to permit it on that particular occasion, on account of the importance of that trial in the view of the public; that although it was contrary to Kaffir law and usage, he was going to allow a European advocate "to say what he can fairly and justly say for the prisoner." That is the promise made. If it had come a little earlier, it might have been pretty well. But they finished the evidence without the presence of the European advocate, who was not sent for and who was apparently to come in at the close as a sort of ornament. At the end of the third day they thought they would ask the prisoner whether he should like to have counsel. The prisoner said he should, and he left it to his Excellency's discretion whether it should be a Kaffir or an European counsel. Mr. Escombe was the gentleman who was to act as counsel for the prisoner and he applied to the Resident Magistrate, the proper person, for permission to see the captive. What could be the use of counsel if he was not to be allowed to see the man he was going to defend? That permission was, however, refused. Is that English justice? What happened next? When the Court re-assembled on the fourth day the Governor said—

"I stated at our last meeting that we intended to allow counsel to appear for the prisoner, and we selected Mr. Escombe for that purpose. Mr. Escombe, on being informed that this Court was of a peculiar nature and jurisdiction, and that he must confine himself within certain limits, could not accept the duty, and I think properly. He said that as an English counsel he must ever be at full liberty to say or do what he liked, or he could not take up the case at all, and therefore he had declined; but looking at the peculiar character of this Court, and its being so directly contrary to Kaffir usage, custom, and law to allow counsel, I made up my mind that it would not be desirable to allow or ask any one else to say anything or act for the prisoner; he could only say something in extenuation of the guilt of the prisoner because he had admitted it."

Counsel must not say his client was not guilty; he could only be allowed to extenuate his guilt. Was there ever anything written in the wildest novel equal to that? The prisoner was taken to have pleaded guilty when he pleaded not guilty; yet he must be tried all the same. The evidence was heard, and after it had been taken counsel was to be called in for the prisoner. The Governor then said counsel could not be permitted to say anything, except in extenuation of the prisoner's guilt, because he had confessed it; and then his Excellency observed—"We shall be as merciful as the circumstances permit of." The very Governor who had invited counsel to come, who had begged him to come and "say what he fairly and justly could say for the prisoner," afterwards shuts his mouth and says he must not open it in favour of the accused because he has pleaded "Guilty." Was there ever anything that had darkened the annals of British justice like that? And is this what Her Majesty's Government at home are to wink at and slur over, and say we must not look at or criticize because it happens thousands of miles away, and therefore we are not able to pronounce an opinion upon it? This, the noble Earl says, is what Parliament and the British public are to accept without remonstrance. But the matter does not stop there. Mr. Escombe is not heard; and at a later period, after the Governor had had the benefit of the remarks of my noble Friend the Secretary of State for the Colonies, he said on this point himself—

"There is much force in your Lordship's objection to our not allowing counsel for the prisoner. Looking at the question as it is regarded in England, and from a purely English standpoint, I regret that we did not allow counsel. But so far as the administration of strict justice is concerned, I feel certain the prisoner would not have benefited by the concession, but rather the reverse."

According to the noble Earl (Earl Grey), we are not to take any notice of that. Well, my Lords, the trial went on, and further witnesses were examined: and here is the account of the close of the fourth day. His Excellency says—

"Before I go away I want to say one word with regard to the speeches the Chiefs made to me on the first day of the trial."

It is obvious that even in the Colony itself it was matter of observation that it was Jeddburgh justice to pronounce the decision first and examine witnesses afterwards. His Excellency went on to say—

"Some fault has been found with their giving their opinions at that stage by persons who do not exactly understand the usages and customs of the Kaffirs."

I suppose, indeed, that the Kaffir nation is the only one in the world where such usages as those here brought before us could prevail. But I thought this was a Christian trial, or one, at all events, tempered by the usages of Christianity. From the Kaffir point of view it is true what was done may have been quite right. His Excellency proceeds—

"Langalibalele has confessed his guilt,"—I have not found where he did so. "Langalibalele had confessed his guilt, and stated circumstances which he considered were an extenuation of his guilt, and according to Kaffir law and usage the trial was over. In their point of view the Chiefs were quite right, and I thanked them for the opinions they gave. All the subsequent proceedings which have taken place are in conformity with our own ideas of justice."

I must demur to that. Standing here, I say those proceedings were not in conformity with our ideas of justice; and I want it to go forth that your Lordships are not of opinion that they accord with our ideas of justice. In no part of the world can a colony thrive which holds that proceedings such as those are in conformity with enlightened principles of justice.

"We wanted," continues his Excellency, "to find out what extenuating or mitigating circumstances there might be. That would not have occurred in a strictly Kaffir court; but, according to our own notions of justice and propriety, we thought it proper to go and ascertain any circumstances which might mitigate or extenuate his conduct."

Again, on the fifth and sixth days witnesses were examined. Then we come to the judgment—and I want your Lordships to understand exactly what the Chief was sentenced for. The heads are as follows:—

"1. The prisoner has for a considerable time past set at naught the authority of the magistrate to whom he was immediately subject, in a manner not indeed sufficiently palpable to warrant the use of forcible coercion according to our laws and customs, but perfectly clear and significant according to Native law and custom.

"2. The prisoner has at least permitted, and probably encouraged, his tribe to possess themselves of firearms and to retain them, in direct violation of the law. On this point the evidence is clear and precise.

"3. It also clearly appears from the evidence that, with reference to the unlawful possession of these firearms, the prisoner set the authority of the magistrate at defiance, and on one occasion insulted his messenger."

With regard to the insult to a messenger, had an advocate been permitted to appear for the prisoner he would have pointed out a circumstance which in this country would have been fatal to this charge—namely, that of the two messengers, both of whom gave evidence, one spoke of the insult and the other said not a word about it. The judgment proceeds—

"4. It has further been brought to light that after the Supreme Government had been called upon by the magistrate to support him, the prisoner set even that authority at defiance by refusing to appear before it; excusing his refusal by evasion and deliberate falsehood, till at last, emboldened, as it would seem, by the extreme forbearance of the Government, he insulted their messengers sent to deliver to him a message full of mercy as well as justice.

"5. We come now to the final stage of the prisoner's proceedings. It has been proved that he directed his cattle and other effects to be taken out of the Colony under an armed escort, thereby manifesting a determination to resist the Government with force and arms. Now, on this subject the Court wishes to remark that, according to Native law, as administered under the Native Chiefs, the mere removal of a tribe with its cattle out of the jurisdiction is an act of treason and rebellion. This law has been so far recognized by this Government that it has always been in the habit of giving up cattle brought into the Colony by refugees; but it has not given up the people, on the intelligible ground that it has no means of judging by itself how far the people may have been guilty of treason, except by such act of removal. But this Government has never recognized the mere act of such removal as an act of treason, if unaccompanied by any criminal acts; and it cannot be too clearly understood that any tribe in this Colony is at liberty to remove itself and its cattle out of our jurisdiction if it does so peaceably and with the cognizance and previous consent of the authorities. The case before us, however, is quite different. It is that of a tribe flying from the jurisdiction, after having set the authority of the Government at defiance, and thereby endangered the peace of the country. We come now to the affair at Bushman's River Pass. A great deal has been said upon this subject, in the Colony and elsewhere; but all we have to do with it is to look at the evidence submitted to us as it concerns the prisoner. It has been proved that a force sent by this Government, under Major Durnford, to intercept the prisoner's tribe and prevent them from leaving the Colony, met at or near the Bushman's River Pass with a portion of the tribe, under the command of the Induna Mabuhle; that Major Durnford entered into a lengthened parley with that Induna and members of the tribe, in which he earnestly and for some time endeavoured to persuade them to return to the Colony and to their allegiance; that the Induna and those with him led Major Durnford to believe that they would consider his injunctions, and so prolonged the interview till they had brought up an additional force. It appears that then, after many threats and insulting gestures and language, the tribe fired upon our forces and killed five of the Queen's subjects, who were doing their lawful duty by attempting to support Her Majesty's authority. It is needless to say that this act of firing on the Queen's forces, even had they, in obedience to authority, opened the fire, amounted in the eye of the law to rebellion and murder. But to fire on Her Majesty's forces and to kill her subjects, who had not thought it right to commence firing, and whose leaders were trying their utmost to avoid the shedding of blood by an appeal to reason, was wilful and deliberate murder. The law of England declares that any person who in committing any felonious act causes, even accidentally, the death of another is guilty of wilful murder. The next question is, who committed this act of rebellion and murder. It was proved in evidence that the Induna Mabuhle commanded the portion of the prisoner's tribe at the pass, and, therefore, presumably commanded them to fire. He is, then, the immediate traitor and murderer. But, now comes the inquiry, in what relation did this Induna stand with respect to Langalibalele? It has abundantly been proved by the evidence before us that Mabuhle was one of the most trusted, perhaps the most trusted, of the prisoner's Indunas; that he always formed part of any important mission sent by the Chief to the magistrate. It has been further proved that he took a prominent part in the communication which latterly took place between the prisoner and the Secretary for Native Affairs. But, more than all, it has been admitted by the prisoner himself that Mabuhle was the commander of the military portion of his tribe; in fact, as we should say, Commander-in-Chief of his army. It has been proved and admitted that the prisoner himself was, at the time, actually with that portion of his tribe who were some distance in front; that is, that he was personally with the armed array which was leaving the Colony, of which array the divisions under Mabuhle formed a part. It has further been admitted by the prisoner that the killing of the Queen's subjects was reported to him by a messenger sent to him by this same Induna Mabuhle. Lastly, it has been proved that this Mabuhle was in company with Langalibalele when he was taken prisoner. Thus, in every way, before and after the fact, the prisoner was identified with the actual perpetrator of the murders, so as to render him as directly responsible for those murders as if he had himself commanded on the spot."

That is to say, that a man who was in front of a retreating force is made answerable for shots fired by men in the rear with whom he had no personal communication. Then comes an important part of the judgment—

"6th. The charge against the prisoner of treasonable communication with others out of the Colony has not been inquired into, in consequence of the length of time which it would take to collect evidence, and also because, in the presence of the grave charges proved against him, it was not thought necessary to press this charge. On all the other charges we find the prisoner guilty. The prisoner Langalibalele, therefore, appears before us convicted on clear evidence of several acts, for every one of which he would be liable to severe punishment under the Native law; for some of them he would be liable to forfeit his life under the law of every civilized country in the world."

For which of these offences would he be liable to forfeit his life under the law of every civilized country in the world? The concluding passage is—

"Our unanimous judgment, therefore, is that the prisoner Langalibalele, the late Chief of the Hlubi tribe, is, under the law which we are bound to administer, liable to the punishment of death; but, taking into consideration the extenuating circumstances alluded to, and giving them the greatest and fullest force, and also the punishment he has already undergone by deposition from his office and confiscation of his property, we sentence the prisoner to banishment or transportation for life, to such place as the Supreme Chief or Lieutenant Governor may appoint."

Add to this that the sentence was perfectly illegal—the Governor had no power of transportation—there was no law in the country which empowered him to transport the prisoner. Are we to overlook that? Are the Government at home so weak, powerless, and paralyzed that they are to allow this gentleman—of whom I must speak with the greatest respect as a man of experience and ability—to carry out an illegal and unjust sentence, merely because the place is some thousand miles away? What is Sir Benjamin Pine's own view of the proceedings, as expressed in a despatch of the 24th September, 1874? He wrote—

"The trial, so called"—so called!—"of Langalibalele, commented on by Mr. Advocate Moodie, was not a trial of a prisoner in the ordinary sense"—I quite agree with him there—"but was an inquiry to ascertain the whole circumstances of the case and its ramifications so far as other tribes were concerned."

If that was the nature of the proceeding they were holding, they were not trying Langalibalele at all, they were only investigating some historical circumstances to ascertain the relationships between certain tribes. I only wish if this be so they had not issued that illegal sentence. I should be surprised to hear anyone say that at this so-called trial, justice was administered as it is in this country. The only other matter referred to by the noble Earl (Earl Grey) was the phraseology of the despatch of the Secretary of State with regard to the colony of Cape Town. I see nothing whatever in that. The Secretary of State was justified in saying that this sentence could not be supported and that the clemency of Her Majesty must in some form or other be extended to the prisoner. I do not in the slightest degree wish to suggest that this man was not a very troublesome Chief, or that he did not commit an offence for which he ought to have been punished; but it is a different thing to say that a trial such as this was, for an offence such as alleged, followed by a sentence such as I have described, is a thing to be desired.

LORD SELBORNE said, he agreed with his noble and learned Friend who had just sat down that the proceeding against Langelibalele in no respect deserved the character of a judicial process. It violated, in the several ways which he had pointed out, not only the rules of judicial proceedings as observed in this country, but those necessary to give any such proceeding the character required by the rules of substantial justice. But, when this was most fully admitted, it appeared to him to go but a very short way towards the decision of the present question, which really depended, not upon forensic, but upon political considerations. Granted that there had been no trial, in any proper sense of that word, and therefore no judgment founded upon a proper trial. But it did not follow from that, that what was called the sentence in this case, was therefore illegal and void. That question, as the Papers showed, was brought in a formal and legal manner before the Supreme Court of the Colony, and the Supreme Court of the Colony—from whose decision on that point, if wrong in law, an appeal would doubtless lie to Her Majesty in Council in this country—determined that there was nothing to show that what was done might be warranted by the powers of the Native Chiefs, and, under the circumstances, held that there was no law in force in the Colony enabling any Court of Law to interfere with the execution of the sentence. No doubt it had been pronounced by a political authority in the exercise of arbitrary powers. No doubt it was impossible, with any propriety, to apply the term law to the proceedings under which this Chief was sentenced—still he (Lord Selborne) was not able to follow the proposition that the order for his banishment was altogether ultra vires. As a sentence of an Executive Government armed with arbitrary power, it appeared to have been supported by a legal decision in the Colony, and until the Court of Appeal in this country should have otherwise determined, he, for one, must hesitate to express a confident opinion as to the illegality or incompetency of that sentence. Indeed, but for the speech of the noble and learned Lord, he should have supposed that this was the opinion of the Secretary of State for the Colonies himself. The noble Earl the Secretary for the Colonies in his despatch had stated that the punishment was excessive, and ought to be mitigated. But if the sentence was altogether illegal and unjust, it would necessarily follow that no punishment whatever ought to be inflicted. How, if he regarded the sentence as simply illegal, could the noble Earl consistently treat the case as one for mitigation of punishment, and not for total remission? Upon the general merits of the case, he was far from differing with his noble Friend the Secretary of State. He agreed with him in wishing that further means had been used to test the good faith of Langelibalele before such strong measures were taken against him. He agreed in wishing that the most lenient measures possible might have been, and might still be taken, as far as the safety of the Natal and Cape Colonies would allow, with respect both to the Chief and his tribe; and he agreed in thinking that the severities practised against the other—the Putini tribe—were unjustifiable. On the other hand, he thought, as the Secretary of State did, that Langelibalele was confessedly guilty of some serious political offences; and his noble Friend seemed to him to be quite justified in dealing with the whole case upon its merits as a political one, and of looking calmly at all the facts as far as they could be ascertained, apart altogether from the abuse of the forms of legal proceeding which had followed upon the commission of the offences. He regretted, however, that, under the circumstances, his noble Friend had not communicated with the Cape Legislature before forming and publicly announcing the decision at which he had arrived—because it was above all things necessary in a case like the present, that there should be co-operation and agreement between the Imperial and Colonial Governments. But as matters now stood, he could not vote for the Motion of the noble Earl (Earl Grey), if for no other reason, because it was not possible to know what was now passing in Natal, and while their Lordships were addressing the Crown with a view to the continuance of the Act, the coming mail might be bringing to this country—as he sincerely hoped it might bring—a decision of the Cape Legislature in favour of some alternative course which would have the effect of reconciling the existing differences.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY said, that Governor Pine, whose judgment had been praised so much, and which, it had been suggested, was to over-ride that of the Colonial Office, had when on the West Coast of Africa projected an expedition through Central Africa, and, he believed, had been censured by either the noble Earl (Earl Grey) or by the late Secretary of State for the Colonies. He was certain that he had incurred the ridicule of the leading journal for his proposal to carry the British flag in triumph through Central Africa. The noble Earl (Earl Grey), in his speech introducing the Motion, had begun by speaking of the imports and exports of Natal, and the interests of the Colonists; but, except by using the words "rebellion of the Kaffirs," he had said nothing which showed that Her Majesty was Sovereign of the Kaffirs as well as of the Colonists, and therefore owed them also justice and protection. A circumstance similar to that now under discussion had taken place in the Algerian Colony of France. In 1862 the French in Algeria attempted to deprive the Arabs of their lands; but the Emperor appointed a Commission to report to him, and on the receipt of their report he quashed the attempts to deprive the Arabs of their land, saying that in Algeria he was as much the Emperor of the Arabs as of the French. The consequence was that out of gratitude to the Emperor the Arabs remained quiet during the Prussian war. Her Majesty's Government would not have to regret having done justice upon this occasion.

THE EARL OF BELMORE said, that if any fault had been committed in this matter by the Government of Natal, he should be much disposed to think that the fault rested not so much with the Governor, Sir Benjamin Pine, as with some of the subordinate officials, on whose information and advice he had acted. He would say nothing as to the legality or illegality of the trial, but what struck him most forcibly was the anomalous nature of the whole proceedings. But while he refrained from commenting upon the result, as far as the sentence was concerned, he wished with regard to the subsequent proceedings to call attention to the appeal brought before Sir Benjamin Pine under the 10th section of the Ordinance of 1849. On that part of the case he must express his regret that the Governor in Council, sitting as a kind of Court of Appeal, had confined himself solely to the evidence given on the first occasion, in accordance with the practice of English Courts of Appeal, instead of admitting anything which would have been adduced in the prisoner's favour. But supposing that the whole proceeding was irregular altogether, how was the Secretary of State to investigate a sentence that was altogether illegal? If the sentence was illegal, as was contended, it could not be mitigated, but must be remitted altogether; and this course, as he understood the matter, was to be followed in the present case. He did not understand that the Government proposed to give an absolute pardon, but that the Chief would be permitted to return to the colony and set at freedom, such precautions being taken as might be necessary to prevent his return to that part of Africa in which his influence with the Natives might be used against British rule. He was, further, glad to know that Her Majesty's Government intended to make certain alterations in reference to African customs where British rule prevailed. He hoped these alterations would reach the practice of polygamy and the custom of magistrates assigning wives to the Natives whether they liked them or no. He commended the appointment of Sir Garnet Wolseley to the governorship, in succession to Sir Benjamin Pine, as one which was likely to lead to the best results. Sir Garnet Wolseley had a great reputation. He would be sure to act with decision if the occasion required it, and he would be almost quite sure to be supported by public opinion at home in doing so. He referred to the opposition which had been made at the Cape to the action of his noble Friend (the Earl of Carnarvon). Although he had great respect for public opinion there, yet Colonial public opinion was apt to be influenced by prejudice, and he hoped that when the Colonists came to re-consider the very courteous request made to them for assistance in carrying out his noble Friend's views, they would see their way to falling in with his wishes. It was his opinion that the Government had adopted the best course that was open to them under the circumstances.

LORD DENMAN said, that the noble Lord, who had last occupied the Wool-sack, had abundantly proved that the banishment of Langalibalele was lawful, and he himself had been told of the commutation of his sentence, and had gladly accepted it. He (Lord Denman) believed that the Parliament of Cape Town would gladly aid the Government in finding a suitable locality for the banished man and his family. He found in the Papers presented to this House that the presiding over the Court of Appeal by the Governor had been compared to, and justified by, the worst sort of case that could arise in an appeal before their Lordships; but he (Lord Denman) believed that the debate would do a great deal of good, inasmuch as it would prove to the Colonies that they might always rely upon their affairs receiving a full and fair discussion in the Imperial Parliament.

EARL GREY, in replying, observed, that he had never contended that the Secretary of State was always bound to accept the judgment of Colonial authorities, or that their judgment might not in many cases be properly overruled by the Government at home, but that in cases where a knowledge of local circumstances was required—in such a case, for instance, as that of Langelibalele, which they were now discussing—where the Colonial authorities had the best means of knowing the truth, and where instant and prompt action was required, a Colonial Governor ought to be supported by the Home Government, unless it could be clearly shown that he was in the wrong. With regard to the trial of Langelibalele, he entirely agreed with his noble and learned Friend near him (Lord Selborne) that it had been a great mistake to mix up two things so inconsistent with each other as an act of authority of a Kaffir Chief and a trial according to the practice of an English Court—that made the proceedings of the trial a perfect mockery, and Sir Benjamin Pine would much better have dealt with the Chief according to his own judgment as Supreme Chief. Still, in spite of this error in the form of the proceeding, substantial justice had been done, and that was what was really important. The objections taken by the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack to the infliction of a just punishment, because the culprit had not had a chance of escape by a trial conducted with all the technicalities of English law, were like the objections of a professional sportsman to the shooting of a fox without giving him a fair run for his life. He begged to remind the noble and learned Lord that there were cases in which a fox was so dangerous that any mode of killing him might be resorted to. In the present case, the lives and property of the colonists of Natal were in danger from a person who was beyond all doubt a rebel; and, under all the circumstances, he maintained that the action of the Colonial Government was perfectly justifiable. As to the Motion, after what had fallen from his noble Friend behind him he would consent to withdraw it provided the noble Earl opposite would assure the House that he did not contemplate the unconditional discharge of so dangerous a person as Langelibalele, and that his liberation would be accompanied with such restrictions as would prevent him from inciting the Natives to rebellion, and thus causing a serious disturbance.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON said, he could give no more distinct assurance on the subject than that which he had already conveyed to the House. He wished, he might add, further to state that he had not, as was by some supposed, acted in the matter on the advice of Bishop Colenso. Both Dr. Colenso and Mr. Shepstone had come to this country, and he had had the advantage of hearing from them both sides of the question before he came to a decision upon it; but, as a matter of fact, the conclusion at which he had in the first instance arrived was substantially that which he afterwards adopted, which clearly showed that he had not been influenced by what Bishop Colenso had urged. As to Mr. Shepstone, of whose great experience he had the highest possible opinion, he had consulted him on the various questions of Native policy. He found, he might add, that that gentleman concurred generally in his views, and had promised, so far as lay in his power, to carry them out in the Colony.

COMMITTEE ON PUBLIC PETITIONS—
THE QUEEN v. CASTRO—PETITION FROM PRITTLEWELL.

REPORT.

SIR CHARLES FORSTER brought up a Special Report from the Committee on Public Petitions as follows:—

"Your Committee having had before them a Petition from Prittlewell and neighbourhood, presented to the House on the 6th day of this instant April, relating to the Trial at Bar, in the Court of Queen's Bench, on the Indictment of The Queen versus Castro, for Perjury, think it proper that the said Petition should be brought to the notice of the House, as containing offensive imputations upon the Lord Chief Justice and two of the Judges of the said Court, and reflecting, in an unbecoming manner, upon the Speaker, and the proceedings of the House.

"The House, while respecting the constitutional rights of Petitioners, has guarded against the abuse of those rights; and it will be for the House to judge, in the present case, whether the Petition be one, which, according to the Rules and practice of the House, can properly be entertained."

MR. DISRAELI moved that the Special Report should be taken into consideration on Thursday next, at half-an-hour after Four of the clock.

Motion agreed to.

MISCELLANEOUS ESTIMATES—THE INDUSTRIAL MUSEUM, EDINBURGH.
QUESTION.

MR. McLAREN asked the First Commissioner of Works, On what grounds the completion of the Industrial Museum in Edinburgh has been indefinitely postponed, by the omission from the Miscellaneous Estimates of the usual grant of £5,000 for building purposes; and, whether this omission will be supplied when any supplementary estimates are brought forward?

LORD HENRY LENNOX: Sir, I am much indebted to the hon. Member for Edinburgh for giving me an opportunity of removing the natural misgiving which exists in that city on the subject; and I am happy to assure him that there has never been any intention on the part of the Government to act in the manner suggested in his Question. The omission of any sum for the purpose in this year's Estimates was owing to the fact that the arrangements for the construction of the west wing were not sufficiently advanced to enable the Government to insert any sum. If necessary, a Vote can be submitted hereafter in the shape of a Supplementary Vote, and in the meanwhile I beg the hon. Member to believe that I will use my utmost efforts to remedy the delay which has taken place, and for which I fear I must admit I was partly to blame.

ARMY—MILITIA ADJUTANTS.

QUESTION.

COLONEL LEARMONTH asked the Secretary of State for War, If, under the new system, the retirement of Adjutants of Militia will be commutable?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: Sir, the Commutation Commissioners act under instructions from the Treasury, and, as they have commuted the retired allowance of several adjutants, no doubt they will continue to do so.

ARMY—THE MERTHYR VOLUNTEER RIFLES.—QUESTION.

MR. MACDONALD asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether it is true that the locks have all been taken off the rifles which are used by the Volunteers of the Merthyr district, county Glamorgan, South Wales; whether they have been removed out of the county; whether the same thing was done during a dispute in respect to wages between the mine owners of the district and their employés in 1872 and 1873; and, whether he will state by whose orders these acts have been carried out, if done?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: Sir, in reply to the first part of the Question of the hon. Member I have no information on the subject. I have endeavoured to obtain information; but I do not know whether such a thing has been done on this occasion or not. It certainly has not been done by any orders of the War Department, for no one in that Department knows anything about it. It appears that in February, 1873, during a strike in South Wales, directions were given by the War Department to the general officer commanding the district to have returned into store any arms or ammunition in the places named which were not in a secure place. The locks were to be taken of and the bayonets to be removed.

MR. MACDONALD said, he would renew the Question on Friday.

HIS HIGHNESS THE GUIKWAR OF BARODA — PROCEEDINGS BEFORE THE COMMISSION.—QUESTION.

MR. SULLIVAN asked the Under Secretary of State for India, When it is his intention to lay upon the Table of the House Copy of the official reporter's notes of the Evidence lately given before the investigation or trial of certain charges against his Highness the Guikwar of Baroda; and, whether it is his intention further to lay before this House a Copy of the Proclamation or Order of the Governor General of India suspending the Guikwar from the exercise of authority in his own territory?

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: Sir, the Secretary of State for India will, as soon as possible, lay before Parliament the Papers relating to the appointment and proceedings of the Commission referred to in the Question. Those Papers will give the hon. Member the information which he seeks. I take this opportunity of stating that a large mass of Papers relating to the proceedings of the first Commission appointed to inquire into the administration of the Baroda State have for some time past been in the hands of the printers, and will shortly be distributed to hon. Members.

INTERNATIONAL OBLIGATIONS— GERMANY AND BELGIUM.

QUESTION.

MR. OWEN LEWIS asked the First Lord of the Treasury, If it is true that a menacing note has been addressed by the Prussian Government to the Belgian Government, referring, amongst other matters, to the liberty of the press in Belgium, and calling upon the Belgian Government to alter the laws of their country; if any communications upon the subject have been received from the British Minister at Brussels, or any instructions sent to him by Her Majesty's Government; and, if so, if he will lay such Correspondence upon the Table of the House; and, as Great Britain has formally guaranteed, in conjunction with the other great powers of Europe, the neutrality and independence of Belgium, what steps it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to take, diplomatic or otherwise, in fulfilment of that guarantee, should Belgian independence be imperilled in consequence of rejecting the demands of Prussia?

MR. DISRAELI: Mr. Speaker, I would venture to observe that, I think as a general rule, in Parliamentary Questions, and especially in questions connected with Foreign Affairs, we should be careful not to avail ourselves of the opportunity of using epithets entirely uncalled-for and unnecessary. Epithets in Questions are generally, I may say, always useless, and may lead to misconception. In the present case, Her Majesty's Government have no information whatever of a "menacing" Note having been addressed by the German to the Belgian Government. This is a subject, on which there is a great deal of misrepresentation and exaggeration. In the first place a considerable time has passed since a Note was addressed by the German Government to the Belgian Government. It was at the commencement of February—I think on the 3rd; and it was not a menacing Note, but a Note of remonstrance. Now, a remonstrance does not, I conceive, by any means involve menace. On the contrary, one element of remonstrance may evince a friendly disposition, and we all know that a "friendly remonstrance" is a phrase often adopted in discussing subjects. This remonstrance was addressed by the German to the Belgian Government, on the 3rd of February, and it was replied to by the Belgian Government at the end of that month—I think on the 26th. Her Majesty's Government became acquainted with these two Notes, the Remonstrance and the Rejoinder, through the action of the German Government. The German Ambassador, by the instructions of his Government, made Her Majesty's Government, in confidence, acquainted with those two Notes, and we at the time appreciated that act, and still continue to appreciate it, as an evidence of the cordial and confidential relations which subsist happily between Her Majesty's Government and the Government of Germany. No answer whatever has been made to the Rejoinder by the German Government. The Rejoinder having been made on the 26th of February, we are now advanced in the month of April, and we consider, and I believe those who are competent to form an opinion upon this question also consider, and have considered for some time, that this is a question which is concluded. The hon. Gentleman continues by asking me whether—

"As Great Britain has formally guaranteed, in conjunction with the other Great Powers of Europe, the neutrality and independence of Belgium, what steps it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to take, diplomatic or otherwise, in fulfilment of that guarantee, should Belgian independence be imperilled in consequence of rejecting the demands of Prussia?"

Now, Sir, as a general rule—and I think the House will support me in the position I take—it is not expedient or necessary that the policy of Her Majesty's Government, whoever forms that Government, should be declared upon a hypothetical statement. But I will so far deviate from the strict course taken on such occasions, certainly, as to say that if the independence and neutrality of Belgium were really threatened, we should do our duty to our Sovereign, and not be afraid to meet Parliament.

ARMY—MILITIA ADJUTANTS.

QUESTION.

MR. LOCKE asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether, taking into consideration the length of service of the majority of the Adjutants of Militia, and that the present scheme for their retirement is virtually a compulsory one, he will grant such Adjutants the honorary rank of Major on retirement?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY, in reply, said, he thought that the retirement scheme in question could hardly be called a "compulsory one," and good compensation was given to those officers who retired. He could not give the assurance asked for by his hon. Friend, but no doubt the case of those officers who had served a long time would be deserving of consideration.

IRISH SALMON FISHERIES—LEGISLATION.—QUESTION.

THE MARQUESS OF HAMILTON asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether it is the intention of the Government to bring in a Bill this Session with regard to the Irish Salmon Fisheries; and, if so, whether it is proposed to make any change in the Law relating to Fixed Nets?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS - BEACH: Sir, some suggestions having been made as to the amendment of the law relating to the Irish salmon fisheries, I referred them to the Inspectors of Fisheries for their report. That, however, cannot be made for some time, the Inspectors being occupied in other duties. When I do receive their Report I fear it will be too late to propose new legislation this Session, even should it be thought necessary. But considering the many abortive attempts to carry out alterations of the law upon this subject during recent years, I do not think it would be any disadvantage to the Irish salmon fisheries if they should for a certain time be left without any fresh legislation. I may, however, say that the Inspectors do not recommend that any change should be made in the matter referred to in the latter part of the Question.

ARMY—THE "HIMALAYA" TROOPSHIP —THE 75TH REGIMENT.—QUESTION.

MR. O'CONOR asked the Secretary of State for War, How soon the detachment of the 75th Regiment, which left the Cape on board the "Himalaya" troopship in the early part of January, is likely to reach England; whether it is true that in consequence of defects in the machinery of that vessel she broke down several times during the voyage, and had at all times to proceed at a very slow pace; whether it is true that messages were sent from Madeira requesting another ship to be sent in her place, which request was refused; whether the troops then went on to Gibraltar where they were disembarked and placed in huts, without protection from the severity of the weather, and without more clothing than was necessary for them in the comparatively warm climate they had left; and, what steps have been taken for bringing them home, and who is responsible for the efficiency of the ships engaged in transporting Her Majesty's troops?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: I fear, Sir, I must apologize to the House for the length of my Answer, which I have derived from the Admiralty, who supply transport for the Army. A detachment of the 75th Regiment, consisting of six officers and 250 men, left the Cape in Her Majesty's Ship Himalaya on the 2nd of February last—not early in January—and arrived at Gibraltar on the 9th of March. On the 18th of March two officers and 100 men were transhipped to Her Majesty's Ship Tamar, and arrived at Queenstown on the 26th of March, where they joined the headquarters of their regiment, on board Her Majesty's Ship Simoom, and landed at Belfast on the 31st of March. Four officers and 150 men were landed at Gibraltar on the 18th of March, and on the 2nd of April they embarked in the Paraguay, hired steamer, for conveyance to Ireland. This ship arrived on the 11th in Ireland, and the detachment of the 75th has been disembarked. About the 12th of January, at the Cape, "a fracture was discovered in the fore part of the after crank pin," but, after full investigation, it was not considered of such a nature as to make the voyage home with troops in any way hazardous, but merely to render the precaution of reduction of speed desirable. On the homeward voyage the Himalaya called at Ascension, St. Vincent—February 24, whence the captain reported proceedings by telegraph—and Madeira, reaching that island on the 5th of March. These stoppages, however, were merely precautionary and for the purposes of communication, and not on account of "breaking down." Between the Cape and St. Vincent steam power only was used, strong head winds being experienced, and the duration of the voyage—22 days—did not much exceed that of an average passage, though greater than the Himalaya under other circumstances would have occupied. No application for assistance was made by Captain Grant, but having reported from St. Vincent that the fracture had slightly increased, he was informed that he would find Admiral Symons with the Channel Squadron at Madeira, by whom convoy would be furnished. The four officers and 150 men disembarked at Gibraltar on the 18th of March were placed in huts protected from the severest weather, where they remained until the 2nd of April. During this time not a man was sick, nor was a complaint made. These troops had the same cloth tunics with them which they would have had on landing at home, the serge frocks being of a thinner texture. The Paraguay steamer, has, as already stated, brought the remainder of the detachment to Ireland. The Admiralty is responsible for the efficiency of Her Majesty's troopships or hired vessels conveying troops, subject to the inspection by a mixed board of officers as to the accommodation provided for the troops.

CAPE OF GOOD HOPE.—QUESTION.

MR. W. M. TORRENS asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, If there is any objection to lay upon the Table a Despatch of the 18th August 1866, or about that date, from Sir Philip Wodehouse to the Secretary of State, regarding the distress prevailing at the Cape of Good Hope, founded upon certain communications from the Consul General of the Sublime Porte in that Colony, together with the Reply of the Secretary of State?

MR. J. LOWTHER, in reply, said, there would be no objection to produce the despatch, if the hon. Member would move for it.

ARMY — RECRUITING — THE DEPARTMENTAL COMMITTEE.—QUESTION.

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether the Departmental Committee which, when moving the Estimates, he informed the House that he had appointed to consider the questions of recruiting, reserves, and desertions has yet reported; and, if so, whether the Report will be presented to Parliament and circulated before the 20th instant, for which day notice has been given of a Motion on the subject of recruiting?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: Sir, the Committee I spoke of was a Departmental Committee, and not, therefore, one of a public character. It has reported to me, but its opinion is confidential. When I have got the appendices to that Report, I shall look through them to see if there be any new facts which I can state to the House; but I should not consider it consistent with my duty to bring the confidential Reports of my Department before the House.

METROPOLIS—STREET TRAFFIC— HYDE PARK CORNER.—QUESTION.

MR. ADAM asked the First Commissioner of Works, Whether any steps are to be taken to ease the block of traffic at Hyde Park Corner; and, if so, whether he will state what is proposed to be done?

LORD HENRY LENNOX: I fear, Sir, that my Answer to the Question of the right hon. Member will be longer than is thought convenient for Ministerial replies. Shortly before I took office, the right hon. Member himself was good enough to explain to me the way in which he would have attempted to relieve the block of traffic at Hyde Park Corner; and, coming from so high a quarter, I gave my very serious consideration to the scheme in question. It proposed to throw the foot pavement in front of the Wellington Arch into the carriage-way, and to construct a foot pavement where the small gardens now are on either side of the archway. The width of the present roadway is 80 feet, and this would have added to it 18 feet, or the width of two lines of carriages; but while the already wide thoroughfare was to be thus widened, the narrow channel of Grosvenor Place would have been left as it is, and I feared, therefore, that the addition of these two strings of carriages to the road at Hyde Park Corner would only have aggravated the difficulty. Besides that the gardens in question form part of the Green Park, and I have no right to appropriate them for a public footway. For these reasons, among others, I was unable to adopt the suggestion of the right hon. Member. The evil existing at Hyde Park Corner is very great, but the difficulties in the way of improving matters are equally great. I received several suggestions upon the matter, and after much consideration I was of opinion that the best plan would be to make a road following the line of the present footpath across the Green Park from Hamilton Place, passing under Constitution Hill, and coming out in Grosvenor Place, nearly opposite to Halkin Street. A model was prepared of this; but, from unavoidable circumstances, I was unable to exhibit it until within a few days of the close of the Session. Very few hon. Members, therefore, were enabled to see it; and the Government, in consequence, thought that for that and other reasons, it would be unadvisable to expend the necessary sum of money without having directly obtained the approval and sanction of Parliament. That model, however, with the drawings and inclines, will, by permission of the authorities of the House, be again placed in one of the Committee Rooms, and I shall be grateful if hon. Members will do me the favour of inspecting it, so that when the question is brought on in the House, they may give their opinion as to whether the proposed plan is not the best to remove or palliate an acknowledged and growing evil.

PARAGUAYAN LOAN—COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN LOANS—SIR HENRY JAMES.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

SIR LAWRENCE PALK: Mr. Speaker, I feel great pain, Sir, in having to bring under the notice of the House a matter which I am sorry to say is of a personal character, and there can be nothing more distasteful to me than to trouble the House with any matter of a personal description. I have therefore to ask most respectfully for the indulgence of the House in bringing the matter before them. On Thursday last I felt it my duty to put a Question to the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Taunton (Sir Henry James), of which I not only gave him private Notice, but also the usual Notice in accordance with the Rules of the House. The question was to this effect—I asked him whether he had appeared before the Lord Chancellor in a legal proceeding relating to the Paraguayan Loan. The hon. and learned Gentleman answered—

“On the 15th of December, 1874, I had to appear as counsel in an interlocutory motion before the Lord Chancellor and Lord Justice James, sitting as the Appellate Court in Chancery. I believe the main object of the suit was to enable certain persons to recover a certain sum of money from other persons for work and labour done in relation to the Paraguayan Loan; and the interlocutory proceeding in which I appeared was for the purpose of determining whether certain witnesses should be examined in private or should be examined in public; that was the only manner in which I was concerned—the only proceeding in which I had to take any share or part. With the main purpose of the suit I had nothing to do. At the time, I had no intention of moving for a Select Committee on Foreign Loans. Before the sitting of Parliament, and when I determined to bring the question forward, I caused the retainer I had received in that suit to be returned, and I have taken no part nor share, directly or indirectly, as advocate or counsel, in that suit or any other connected with it.”

Well, Sir, that language conveyed to this House and to me the impression that that was the only suit in which the hon. and learned Gentleman was engaged; but it so happens that before I put that Question to him, I received evidence which to my mind was conclusive, that he had been engaged in another suit or action in which he received a fee of £132. On Thursday, therefore, when the hon. and learned Gentleman made this statement, I was very much inclined to get up and state what I am now stating to the House; but I felt that his declaration was so explicit, that either I must have made some mistake in the Question I had placed on the Paper, or that my information must have been incorrect. I therefore consulted with some friends, and finding that the evidence I relied on was such as would justify me in placing another Question on the Journals of the House I did so, and gave the usual Notice, both public and private. It so however happened—and I must apologize to the House for the circumstance—that I was unable to attend in my place upon Friday last, and consequently I telegraphed to my noble Friend the Member for King's Lynn (Lord Claud Hamilton), requesting him either to put the Question as I had given Notice of it; or, if it were possible, to postpone it until to-day, that I might be in my place to put it myself. Under those circumstances, on Saturday as I returned to London, I was very much surprised to read the Answer of the hon. and learned Gentleman. He said—

“I have to thank the noble Lord for having acceded to my request [that the Question should be put at once], and I am quite sure that the absence of the hon. Baronet the Member for East Devonshire is attributable only to unavoidable circumstances. I must, however, repeat I do regret that he should have thought it necessary, after the answer I gave him last night, to communicate the Question to the public Press in the form in which it there appears.”

As I was out of London, and as I had no communication with any member of the Press, I at once wrote a letter to the hon. and learned Gentleman, and as I was uncertain where he might be found on Saturday, I myself took the letter to his club. In that letter I said—

“Dear Sir Henry,—I regret that I was prevented from being in the House of Commons on Friday last. On my return to London I read a report in The Times of your answer to the Question put for me by Lord Claud Hamilton, in which you are stated to have said—‘I do regret that he (alluding, I suppose, to myself) should have thought it necessary, after the answer I gave him last night, to communicate the Question to the public Press in the form in which it there appears.’ Should this report be correct, I beg to request you will do me the favour to give me the name of your informant, also the authority on which you made the above assertion. I have also to inform you that, so far as the rules of the House will permit, I intend on Monday next to give that statement my unqualified contradiction, also equally to repudiate all intention of insinuating that which I do not declare, as I gather you stated to the House.”

I must now revert to the first Question. [SIR HENRY JAMES: Will you read my reply?] Most certainly; I had intended to do so, and here it is—“Brooks's Club, April 11, 1875.

“Dear Sir Lawrence,—I trust it is not necessary for me to disclaim any intention of discourtesy to you personally, I do not remember the exact words I used in the House of Commons on Friday last; but I did intend to convey a complaint that the Questions proposed by you to be submitted to me should, in the form in which they appeared, have been communicated to the Press. Permit me to remind you that in The Times of Friday morning an announcement appeared of your intention to put certain Questions to me. Those Questions never appeared on the Notice Paper of the House, and, therefore, could not have been copied from it. As you were the Member giving the Notice which did appear, I certainly assumed the publication was with your sanction. If any one without your authority communicated to the newspapers Questions you never intended to put to me, I am sure you will so inform the House; and if this be so, pray accept the expression of my regret that I should have assumed that the Member who framed and gave Notice of certain Questions was answerable for the announcement which some one made to several newspapers. Claiming from you that in making your statement to the House, you will read this correspondence, I am, &c., HENRY JAMES."

Well, Sir, I am not aware what I have done that the hon. and learned Gentleman, whom I have endeavoured, so far as my knowledge permits, to treat in this matter with every courtesy, should have made this charge against me. I can only say I think it is very hard that one in his high position and of his great Parliamentary reputation should have so attacked me. Still, I am bound to accept the apology he has made. There is, however, one portion of the letter to which I wish to allude, and it is that in which he speaks of "Questions you never intended to put to me." I beg leave to say that the Question which was put on the Notice Paper of the House, or as I sent it to the Clerk of the House, was as I arranged it should have been put. I must refer to the original Answer to my Question, in which the hon. and learned Gentleman says, as I understand, that he was only engaged in one suit. I may be wrong—I do not make any charge against him; but I am informed he was engaged in the one suit in which he says he was engaged, where he returned his brief, and that he was also engaged in another suit, in which he received a fee of £132, and in connection with which he was engaged in an application to the Court of Chancery for the examination of certain witnesses which was refused him. The hon. and learned Gentleman seems to think that the object of my Question has been to cast some reflection upon his public and private character. I beg leave to say nothing was further from my intention, and nothing is further from my intention at the present moment. I have watched the hon. and learned Gentleman's career with great admiration, and certainly I am not a likely man to attack him in the way he was good enough to attack me in the concluding part of his speech on Friday night. He said—

"I think I am entitled to ask the hon. Baronet the Member for Devonshire if he does intend to suggest upon these two Questions, that my object in bringing forward that Motion had been influenced by any other considerations than that of what was due to the public, he should give me the opportunity of giving a refutation to any facts within his knowledge, and not content himself by insinuating that which he does not declare."

I beg leave to tell the hon. and learned Gentleman that I am not in the habit of insinuating charges, and that I would never condescend to so mean an artifice as has been implied; if I had a charge to make, it should be made after due Notice had been given, and when he had full opportunity to refute it. But while disclaiming any intention or any desire to cast any imputation on the hon. and learned Gentleman, I have still a great regard for the honour of this House. I have had a seat in this House for more than 20 years and I look with great veneration upon the pureness of its Committees and upon the justice of their decisions, and in asking these Questions I had no other intention, no other thought, than that of ascertaining, as I believed I was justified in ascertaining, whether the Rules of this House had been infringed or not. For myself, I have only to say that, although I think the hon. and learned Gentleman was perfectly justified in moving for a Committee in a matter in which he has taken so much interest, yet it is not fair to try individuals in the House of Commons and in the Courts of Law at the same time. It only remains for me to thank the House for the kind consideration with which it has listened to my explanation, and to move that this House do now adjourn.

SIR HENRY JAMES: I am sure that the House will accept my statement how sincerely I regret that the public time should be occupied in any way by a matter which appears to affect me personally; but I hope it will feel that it is not my fault that its time has been thus taken up. In relation to what I understand is the first complaint of the hon. Baronet the Member for East Devonshire—that I assumed he communicated to the public Press a Question which had never appeared on the Notice Paper of this House—hon. Members will recollect that on Friday morning there appeared in The Times and other newspapers a notice of several specific Questions which, I repeat, had never appeared on the Notice Paper of this House. As the hon. Baronet's name was attached to those Questions when they appeared in the public Press, and as his name afterwards appeared to some Questions,

Sir Lawrence Palk

I may say, similar, which were printed on the Notice Paper, I did assume that he was answerable for that communication. If he did not send that Notice to the public papers, who did? I have written to him what I repeat now—that if the assumption I made was inaccurate, it was such a natural one that I am sure he would forgive me for having drawn that conclusion. I say no more on that point; but I must now, after the course the hon. Baronet has taken, ask from the House a few minutes' consideration while I meet that which, notwithstanding what he says, does appear in some respects to cast an imputation upon me. It is true that on Thursday evening last the hon. Baronet asked me a specific Question, whether I appeared as counsel in December, 1874, and again in January, 1875, before the Lord Chancellor in a legal proceeding relating to the Paraguayan Loan. I answered that I did appear in an interlocutory proceeding, which I then explained, in a cause which without doubt had a connection with that Loan, and I certainly did not intend, when I said that I took no other part in that suit, to convey that I had no connection with any other suit. With reference to the cause to which the hon. Baronet referred on Friday I did not appear in Court—it was settled several days before it should have come on for trial. I wish to add a few words more on the general proposition which the hon. Baronet puts forth. He tells the House that his only object is to maintain its honour, and to secure that its usages should be followed. I accept that statement, but does he know for what cause and reasons these Questions have been suggested to him? I think the House will suppose, because I had been connected with matters relating to the Paraguayan Loan, that therefore the persons connected with those loans had objections to this investigation. As far as I can learn, no objection proceeds from any person connected with the Paraguayan Loan, and if such objection should be made, I am sure that the Committee will do what is right in the matter. It so happens, however, that we are now investigating matters connected with the Honduras Loan. Let me remark that the hon. Baronet's second Question contained a specific quotation from a certain bill of costs, in which the name of Mr. Waring was introduced.

Now that Gentleman, who was formerly a Member of this House, having been alluded to, he has written to me this morning the following letter as a defendant in that suit, and also a contractor of that loan—

"Dear Sir,—I can scarcely express to you the regret with which I have seen an extract from a bill of costs delivered to my firm as quoted in Saturday's newspapers. I fear it might be thought that I was endeavouring to stay you from continuing to inquire into matters in relation to which I and my firm have nothing to conceal. I wish, therefore, to state to you the manner in which the extracts which have appeared were obtained without any communication from me, and without my cognizance or that of my firm. Sir Philip Rose obtained from one member of the firm who act as my solicitors, the loan of the plaintiff's bill of costs, which was in their possession. Equally without my sanction or knowledge, or that of my firm or my solicitors, Sir Philip Rose gave the same to 'a member of Mr. Bischoffsheim's family,' through whose hands it must have passed to Sir Lawrence Palk."

Sir, as my conduct is somewhat severely criticized of late, I beg to explain that the words "a member of Mr. Bischoffsheim's family" do not occur in the letter. The name of that member of the family is given; but I prefer employing the general words. I will, however, hand the letter to the hon. Baronet, and he will see my reason for not mentioning it.

SIR LAWRENCE PALK: As far as I am concerned, I would much rather that the whole of the letter should be read.

SIR HENRY JAMES: I will take upon myself the responsibility of not reading the whole of the letter, which, however, may be placed in the hands of the hon. Baronet. It proceeds—

"If it is not out of place, I should wish to add that the matter involved in the action to which that bill referred, and in which you were engaged as counsel against me, does not appear to involve the question of the system of issuing foreign loans brought by you before the House of Commons. Pray make any use you like of this letter.

"Yours faithfully,

"CHARLES WARING.

"Sir Henry James, Q.C., M.P."

With regard to the part I have taken in the matter, I gave a full explanation that I had ceased to have any connection, directly or indirectly, with any suit relating to these foreign loans. What, however, has been, and what is now the suggestion of the hon. Baronet? If he means that my object is to promote private ends, rather than what I consider is due to the public, I would ask what object I could have in severing myself from professional duties, in giving my attention to the consideration of these loans, involving day after day attendance upon the Committee, and affording assistance, as far as I can, to Members of it? How could that be beneficial to me in any other sense? May I also add one fact with regard to these foreign loans? From the commencement of this investigation it was arranged between myself and my hon. Friend the Member for the Denbigh Boroughs (Mr. Watkin Williams) that he should take charge of the inquiry relating to Paraguay, and that I should take no part or share whatever in that branch of the subject, and he knows how far I have interfered with his discretion. There is one matter only which I wish to correct. I stated to the House that I had determined to bring this subject before the House without consultation with any one. In that respect I made one slight error. There is one Friend I did consult, and that is the hon. and gallant Member for Westminster (Sir Charles Russell) and it was after long consideration with him that we jointly determined to bring forward the Motion for a Committee. I take credit for nothing that I have done, but I shall not be deterred by Questions such as these from performing what I deem to be my duty.

MR. SPEAKER: I must apologize to the House for having allowed the discussion to proceed as it has done, but as it is a personal matter I have abstained from interference. I now wish to point out that, the Motion for Adjournment not having been seconded, there is no Question before the House.

SIR CHARLES RUSSELL: As my name has been introduced into this discussion I wish to say a few words, and in order to be able to do so, I beg to move the adjournment of the House. I desire, in justice to the hon. and learned Member for Taunton, to state that some months ago he did consult me with regard to moving for an investigation into certain frauds of which he was aware I had some acquaintance. Such knowledge as I had of these loans was simply—

MR. SPEAKER: I must remind the hon. and gallant Member that it is irregular to discuss a matter which is now the subject of inquiry before a Select Committee.

SIR CHARLES RUSSELL: I was not aware that I was discussing matters which are before the Select Committee, and I have no desire to do so; but, as some doubt has been expressed as to when and how the hon. and learned Member for Taunton first thought of moving for a Select Committee, I merely wish to say that he did communicate with me some months ago. I will only further add that as far as regards the remarks of the hon. Baronet the Member for East Devonshire (Sir Lawrence Palk), who seems to have some apprehension that the dignity of the House may suffer from the course of action taken by the hon. and learned Member, I can only hope that for the sake of the dignity of the House of Commons there will long be found men within its walls who have enough of courage and capacity to come forward and frankly expose any malpractices which they may believe to exist.

(Mr. Secretary Cross, Mr. Selater-Booth, Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress 19th March.]

(In the Committee.)

Clause 7 (Duty of local authority to carry scheme when confirmed into execution).

MR. FAWCETT moved, as an Amendment, in page 5, line 29, to leave out "sell or let," and insert "lease for a period not exceeding ninety-nine years." The hon. Member said, he did so in order to meet what he regarded as a serious defect in this clause—a want of provision as to the appropriation of the land dealt with under the Bill. As the clause stood, if the local authority, having cleared ground of condemned houses, declined for any reason to let the ground to private individuals or trustees, or to build on it themselves, there was nothing in the Bill to say how the land was to be appropriated. In order to effect the same object, the hon. Baronet the Member for Maidstone (Sir Sydney Waterlow) had placed on the Paper two Amendments. One was, that if at the end of three years this clause, as it stood, should not be carried out, if the land in question was not leased or sold to private individuals or bodies of trustees, or if the local authorities themselves were not to carry out the scheme, the land should be sold by the local authorities at the expiration of three years in the public market. Suddenly, however, that Amendment was withdrawn, and the hon. Member had substituted another of a different character, which, if carried, would introduce into the Bill a novel principle and one fraught with the most important consequences. That second Amendment amounted to this, that if at the end of three years the land was not sold or leased to private individuals or bodies of trustees, and if the local authorities should not themselves by that time be prepared to carry out the scheme, then private individuals or bodies of trustees should apply to the Home Office or the Local Government Board and ask them to appoint an arbitrator who should decide whether the price asked for the land was a reasonable price, the seller being compelled to accept such price as the arbitrator might fix. There was an Amendment which obviously raised a question of the utmost importance. He understood the Home Secretary was going to accept that Amendment. The clause, as it stood, allowed the local authorities to sell or lease the land to private individuals, and what he himself wished to propose by his Amendment was that they should not have the power to sell it, but simply the power to lease it for a period of 99 years or less. He thought that if they were obliged to sell the land, they might have to do so at a ruinously low price, too inadequate to repay them any expenditure they might have incurred. He wished the Home Secretary to tell the Committee what were his intentions with respect to the clause.

SIR SYDNEY WATERLOW thought it was unusual to discuss an Amendment or question the Government in reference to it until it had been arrived at. He would only at present say that the best actuaries drew very little, if any, distinction between leasing land for 99 years and parting with it altogether by sale.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, that one of the main objects of the Bill was to place in the hands of the great corporations of the country, power which they did not now possess, which they had asked for, and were desirous of exercising. Under these circumstances, he had resisted the placing of any further compulsory powers in the hands of the central authority than those suggested by some hon. Members opposite, and to confer which he had himself placed an Amendment on the Paper. The local authorities would naturally resent such a step, as it would, in fact, throw a doubt upon their willingness to take steps under the Bill for the removal of the rookeries which existed in their towns. He had often been told, both in that House and in the public Press, that the Bill was not sufficiently strong because it contained no power of compulsion; but his answer to that charge was that, confined as the clauses were to the great towns, he was certain the local authorities in those great towns would carry out the provisions of this measure to the satisfaction of the House and of the country. With regard to the particular point alluded to by the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett), he did not believe there was any danger that the corporations who were bound to carry out the scheme would for a moment turn round when this Bill was passed and refuse to carry it out. If compulsion were put upon the corporations, it might be impossible to carry the Bill through that House, and even if they succeeded in forcing the measure through Parliament, it would be impossible to compel the corporations to carry its provisions into useful effect against their will. Under these circumstances, the Government had thought it better to carry the corporations with them on this question, and they had accordingly drawn the Bill as it now stood. He was decidedly opposed to the Amendment, because it would be perfectly monstrous to enable a corporation to say that they could not sell, which would, in a great number of cases, depreciate the value of the property; while in others the leasing of it for 99 years would, as the hon. Baronet the Member for Maidstone had justly observed, be a distinction without a difference.

MR. FAWCETT said, that the difference between selling and leasing the property was this—that, if leased, the corporations would at the end of the lease come into possession of it. As he could not find out what course the Government intended to pursue with reference to the Amendment of the hon. Baronet the Member for Maidstone (Sir Sydney Waterlow) he would withdraw his own Amendment, and propose it at a subsequent stage.

MR. HENLEY said, the two objects of the Bill were to get rid of nuisances and to provide better accommodation for the working classes. It might be easy enough to carry out the first of those objects, but he was afraid it would be very difficult to secure the second; and that difficulty would be greatly increased by prohibiting the corporations from selling the land they acquired under the provisions of the Bill, because out of London people would not build on leasehold land, and the result of such a restriction would be that no poor people's dwellings would be built to replace those removed under this measure.

MR. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH wished to mention that the Amendment would preclude the Peabody Trustees from carrying out any scheme, because they could only spend their money upon land which they had bought.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. FAWCETT, in moving, as an Amendment, in page 6, line 3, to leave out "without the express approval of the confirming authority," said, that as the clause now stood it gave power to the local authorities to carry out the scheme themselves at the expense of the ratepayers if it obtained the assent of the confirming authorities—namely, the Secretary of State for the Home Department or the President of the Local Government Board. He did not wish to give them that power. It was impossible to discuss the Amendment without considering the present position of local taxation and local government, and the great injustice which the Bill might inflict on the ratepayers. Supposing a great building scheme was to be carried out on land which had to be cleared at an expense involving £1,000,000, how, he asked, was that money to be obtained? It would be obtained by borrowing from the Public Works Commissioners on a loan to be repaid in a fixed number of years, and in doing that great injustice would be inflicted upon a certain class of ratepayers. If the loan was to be paid in 21 years, and supposing a man had the lease of a house for 21 years, the burden would fall upon the leaseholder of that house, while the owner would not contribute a single penny towards this improvement scheme. He ventured to say when that fact became known to the country, everyone would decide that the proposition was extremely unfair. Nothing at the present moment was so serious connected with the finances of the country as the extraordinary rapidity with which the local authorities were accumulating debt; and if they allowed those authorities to enter into these vast building speculations, although the debts of the various municipal authorities were no less than £80,000,000, and were increasing at the rate of £3,000,000 per annum, they would give them the power of adding in the future an indefinite augmentation of the debt. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Hastings (Mr. Kay-Shuttleworth) had alluded to the Peabody Trustees, but their buildings had to be let far below their market value, or if they were not they would be placed far beyond the reach of the class for which they were intended. In the same way, if some such provision as he proposed were not inserted in the Bill, either the buildings must be let at competition rents, or at rents which would not yield a profit on the outlay. In the former case, they would not be taken by persons of the class displaced; and, in the latter, there would be the initiation of an expensive and otherwise objectionable system of favouritism. In addition, if they once sanctioned the principle of a person living in a house erected by public money at a rent less than the market value they would be doing a thing which was an injustice to the ratepayers. If the buildings of the Peabody Trustees were let at rents yielding a fair return, a tenant occupying five rooms would have to pay as much as £30 a-year.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS thought the fears of the hon. Member would be removed if he referred, for example, to what had been done by the Corporation of Glasgow. There was reason to expect that, as in that case, the building schemes would be of positive advantage to the ratepayers. At the same time, nothing could be further from his desire than to allow local authorities to enter unrestrictedly into large building speculations. In Glasgow what the Corporation had done was to set an example, leaving others to follow it out. That was all that these words were inserted for; they were put in for the express purpose of taking care that local authorities should not enter into large building speculations, but that they should be allowed to provide for certain special cases, and thus set an example to private voluntary enterprize.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

On the Motion of Mr. CAWLEY, Amendment made in page 6, line 5, after "scheme," by adding—

"Except that they may lay out, form, pave, sewer, and complete all such streets upon the land purchased by them as they may think fit, and all streets so laid out and completed shall thenceforth be public streets, repairable by the same authority as other streets in the district."

MR. KAY - SHUTTLEWORTH moved, as an Amendment, in page 6, line 5, to add, after "scheme," the following words:—

"Provided that complete plans of the new buildings shall be submitted to the confirming authority for approval, and that no grant, lease, or arrangement as aforesaid shall be binding till such approval shall have been obtained."

He thought, although there were a great many safeguards in the Bill, there was one wanting in this clause.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS objected to the Amendment, on the ground that it would lead to delay and expense. Beyond that, he believed the provision was already in the Bill; but if the Amendment were now withdrawn, he would consider the matter when the preceding clauses were printed in their amended form.

MR. CAWLEY objected to the provision, as it would defeat the object of the Bill, and trusted the right hon. Gentleman would neither accept it now, nor at any future period.

MR. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH said, he was perfectly satisfied with the promise of the right hon. Gentleman, and would withdraw the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

SIR SYDNEY WATERLOW moved, as an Amendment, in page 6, lines 6 and 7, to leave out "care shall be taken in carrying the scheme into effect to," and insert—

"In any grant or lease of any part of the area which may be appropriated by the scheme for the erection of dwellings for the working classes, the local authority shall impose suitable conditions and restrictions as to the elevation, size, and design of the houses, and the extent of the accommodation to be afforded thereby and shall."

VOL. CCXXIII. [THIRD SERIES.]

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, he would accept the Amendment.

MR. DODSON thought the words in the Amendment, "in any grant or lease of any part of the area," were somewhat too restrictive. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would consider whether they were or not.

MR. FAWCETT wished to ask the right hon. Gentleman, whether it was intended to be laid down as a principle that the working classes, to whom political power had been given, were an exceptionally helpless section of the community, and could not attend to these matters themselves?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, that the question raised by the hon. Member opposite (Mr. Fawcett) had been fully discussed before. He wished to point out that the sole object of the Amendment was to provide that the local authority should see that the plans of the houses were correct.

Amendment agreed to.

Words inserted.

MR. RATHBONE moved, as an Amendment, to leave out all the words from "provision," in page 6, line 7, to "and," in line 9, inclusive, the object of the Amendment being to take away the necessity for the continued appropriation of such a number of dwellings for the use of the working classes as might have been at first contemplated under the scheme.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, he would accept the Amendment, as the object to which the words referred to was provided for in another part of the Bill.

Amendment agreed to.

Words struck out accordingly.

SIR SYDNEY WATERLOW, in moving, as an Amendment, in page 6, line 10, after the word "arrangement," to insert words which would have the effect of enabling differences arising on various points between the local authority and the company or person making an offer for the purchase or lease of the lands to be determined by an arbitrator appointed by the confirming authority on the application of either party within three years from the passing of the Confirming Act, said, when they were last in Committee on the Bill, the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett) moved to report Progress on the ground that this Amendment was too important to be discussed at half-past 11 at night, as if the proposal involved a new form of legislation and was a new principle in the Bill. In answer to the objection, he (Sir Sydney Waterlow) was ready to admit that the principle of the Amendment was of great importance—namely, that of giving power to the confirming authority to complete the scheme, and it would be a crucial test by which it could be determined whether this measure would remove the evil of overcrowding. But this was no new form of legislation, nor was it a new principle. The Amendment had been copied almost verbatim from a clause in the Metropolitan Streets Improvement Bill of 1872 inserted at the instance of the Government of the day, and it could not be said that it was inconsistent with the preceding clauses in the Bill. He found the same principle also in a Bill passed as far back as 1663 in the reign of Charles II. It might be said there was no necessity for the Amendment; but the history of some metropolitan improvements showed there was the greatest necessity for it. In 1838 and 1840 two Bills were passed for making a new street from Holborn Valley to Clerkenwell Green. Let any one walk down that street now and observe the enormous mass of vacant land on either side. Not only had there been great loss in the value of the land so long left vacant, but the vestries of the particular district had lost a sum in rates perhaps as large as the value of the land itself. In 1857 a Bill was passed for making a new street from London Bridge to Blackfriars, and the number of vacant spaces left on either side of the new street again showed the necessity of this Amendment. He was sorry to say there was a large number of owners who had a strong aversion to the erection of houses for working men near to their own property, and those owners would do their utmost to prevent the completion of schemes unless the power now proposed were granted. He therefore hoped the right hon. Gentleman would not object to the confirming authority accepting the responsibility he was going to place in their hands. He begged to move the Amendment which stood in his name.

Sir Sydney Waterlow

Amendment proposed,

At the end of the Clause, to add the words "if after the expiration of three years from the date of the passing of the confirming Act any difference arise between the local authority and any Company or person making an offer in writing for the purchase or lease of the lands appropriated as aforesaid to dwellings for the labouring classes, or any of them, or any part thereof, as to whether such offer is to be entertained, or as to the terms to be inserted in the contract with reference to the purchase-money or rent, or with reference to the conditions upon which the said land is to be sold or let, or with reference to the houses and buildings to be erected thereon, such difference shall from time to time, if the confirming authority think it expedient that the case should be referred to arbitration, be referred to and determined by an arbitrator to be appointed on the application of either party by such confirming authority, and the decision of such arbitrator shall be binding on all parties, and shall be carried into effect accordingly."—(Sir Sydney Waterlow.)

MR. CAWLEY thought it would be better simply to enact that if in the course of three years the areas were not occupied, the land should be sold by public auction, subject to certain restrictions to carry out the scheme. If the arbitrator was simply to say whether an offer was to be accepted or not, the Amendment would place the whole matter in the hands of the person who had made the offer, and two or three persons might enter into an arrangement with a view to getting the land on their own terms.

SIR JAMES HOGG differed from the hon. Baronet the Member for Maidstone (Sir Sydney Waterlow), and thought the circumstances were not analogous to those which arose in carrying out the Street Improvement Act. The Amendment seemed to imply a certain want of confidence in the local authorities which they did not deserve.

MR. DODSON thought the purpose of the Amendment just and desirable, and hoped that if the Home Secretary could not accept it in its present form he would endeavour to improve it and accept its principle. In many cases it might be necessary to compel local boards to take action.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS feared the Amendment would not work, that, in fact, it would delay the sale of land for 12 or 18 months. He admitted there were several reasons why it was desirable that some pressure should be put upon the local authority to carry out the powers given by the Bill; but he thought it extremely likely that in the event of wilful neglect, a mandamus would lie; but at any rate, individually, he saw no difficulty in so working the Bill, in London especially, as to compel the local authority to take action. The proposal of the hon. Baronet the Member for Maidstone would cause endless confusion and be impracticable. By the Act relating to Glasgow the corporation of the city were prevented from proceeding with the scheme of improvement until they had satisfied the sheriff that the requisite accommodation for a certain number, not less than 500, of the working classes had been provided. That was a screw of the strongest possible character, and a modification of it would be preferable to the Amendment. He should, however, be willing to consider the question further before the Report.

MR. RATHBONE hoped that full consideration would be given to the difference between London and corporate towns in the Provinces, where there would be no difficulty in providing the house accommodation required. In Liverpool, for instance, the Welsh builders would soon provide any number of houses, and in any towns similarly situated it would be a pity to throw any needless obstacle in the way of the demolition of the fever nests.

MR. FAWCETT said, he must still contend that, although the clause might appear to be compulsory, it was in certain contingencies only permissive, and there was not a single word to prevent the ground from being cleared and remaining unoccupied for an indefinite number of years. He could not agree that the Amendment of the hon. Baronet the Member for Maidstone (Sir Sydney Waterlow) offered the best way of meeting the difficulty, but some provision ought to be adopted that the land should be offered for public competition, after it had been unused for a certain time, care being taken that nothing should be erected upon it to affect prejudicially the sanitary condition of the neighbourhood. The clause could not remain as the Home Secretary proposed to leave it, unless the Act were to become a dead letter, and he trusted that the right hon. Gentleman would give some more distinct intimation of the intention of the Government in regard to the clause than he had yet done.

SIR SYDNEY WATERLOW said, he did not share in the views put forward by the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett) for he did not apprehend that under the Amendment those who desired to purchase cleared land would obtain it at less than the market value. The land would be valued by a competent arbitrator, so that the contingency spoken of would not occur. He regretted, from experience, he could not share the faith entertained by the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary in local authorities; for under the Holborn Viaduct Act, the Corporation of the City of London was bound to build dwellings for those who were driven from their homes by that improvement, but 10 years had since elapsed and as yet not a single house had been built. It was useless then to provide that certain things "shall" be done, unless a time was fixed for it, and a penalty imposed, and he trusted that compulsory power would be taken in the Bill with a view to insure its objects being fully carried out. He should not press his Amendment if the right hon. Gentleman would promise to bring up upon the Report a provision to carry out its object.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS had no doubt that, under the Bill as it stood in the 5th clause, the confirming authority would have full power of securing that substituted dwellings were provided for the parties to be displaced before they were disturbed. They would require to be satisfied on that subject before sanctioning any proposed scheme. If the hon. Baronet the Member for Maidstone could suggest any means of strengthening that provision, in accordance with the objects of the Bill, he (Mr. Cross) would be glad to give the proposal his best consideration.

MR. W. M. TORRENS, being desirous of seeing a scheme adopted which would work well, sincerely sympathized with the object which the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary had in view. Ten years' experience, however, of the subject sought to be dealt with by the Bill compelled him to say that he (Mr. Torrens) did not share the sanguine expectation which the right hon. Gentleman had expressed. He had no doubt that while the right hon. Gentleman was Home Secretary he would make corporations do their duty; but that was not the security they required for the carrying out of this most perplexing experiment. When he (Mr. Torrens) had the honour of carrying a measure with the same object, but not on the same lines, as that of the right hon. Gentleman, he was more sanguine than he was now, but he had seen hope after hope die out. Of this he was persuaded—that the driving of great thoroughfares through such places as St. Giles's would only intensify the evils of overcrowding in the neighbourhood, and that the providing of suitable accommodation for those who were to be displaced would saddle the towns with an amount of expense which would compel Parliament to repeal the Act. What had happened at Paris? Whole districts had been covered with splendid edifices, but the poorer classes had been again and again driven back, and, as a matter of fact, Communism never existed in Paris until Haussman had effected his transformation of the city. Greater control should be given to the local authorities in London. It was incorrect to say that the local bodies had not shown an intention of repressing the system of overcrowding and of enforcing cleanliness and proper sanitary regulations under the Act of 1868. Overcrowding could not be put an end to merely by destroying the houses in which the very poor herded together. The evil had been created by legislation and by the changes in the law of settlement, which had led all men who were out of work to come to London and the other large towns, where they remained to prey on each other. He knew of a case in the parish of St. Luke's where, the parish having interfered in consequence of the frightful state of a court, the owner of the property came forward like a man and at considerable expense pulled down the condemned buildings and erected others in their stead, the consequence being that the poor were attracted to them in greater numbers than ever, and the overcrowding in them was worse than it had been before.

Mr. DODSON thought that the purport of the Amendment was somewhat misapprehended, because it merely gave the confirming authority a discretionary power to appoint an arbitrator in cases where he thought fit to do so. He wished to see that the objects of the Bill were secured, and thought that there should be some better security for their being carried out than the mere chance of the right hon. Gentleman's continuing at the Home Office. The Government might be changed, and although they might, on the whole, obtain a wiser Administration, they might not perhaps get a wiser Secretary of State. Besides, the right hon. Gentleman was only the confirming authority for the part of the country he acted upon by his own hand, and not for the whole of it. He should, however, advise the hon. Baronet the Member for Maidstone to withdraw his Amendment, provided that the right hon. Gentleman would himself undertake to propose some amendment of the Bill in the direction indicated on the bringing up of the Report. If no such undertaking was given, he (Mr. Dodson) would divide with the hon. Baronet, and if the Amendment was defeated, at all events a protest would be made in favour of the principle embodied in the Amendment. Under the 13th clause, persons were compelled to part with their property without receiving that benefit which under all other compulsory laws was granted; and that being the case, it was but just to those persons who were compelled to part with their property that the Bill should absolutely secure, as far as possible, the object for which they were compelled to part with their property.

Mr. ASSHETON CROSS said, he would admit that if land was taken for the purpose of the scheme it was quite necessary it should be carried out. Provision was made in the Bill for housing the persons who were turned out.

Mr. FAWCETT said, that was what they had been contending for; but provision was not to be made for those displaced, simply the working classes.

Mr. ASSHETON CROSS said, he was not going into the question of the working classes. The scheme always had been as he had stated, and he referred, in support of this, to the last clause of the Preamble—"It is expedient that provision should be made for dwellings." That, he believed, would be practically provided for in Clause 5. In that clause certain Amendments had been made, and when it was reported he would reconsider its entire tendency and details, so as to determine whether any further provision was necessary to carry out to the full extent the spirit and principle of the Bill.

Mr. DODSON begged to remind the right hon. Gentleman that Clause 5 was silent as to the time within which dwellings were to be provided for those who were dispossessed.

Question put, "That those words be there added."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 48; Noes 137: Majority 89.

MR. CAWLEY moved, as an Amendment, in page 6, after line 10, to insert—

"Provided also, that in any case in which the local authority erect any dwellings out of funds to be provided under this Act, they shall sell or dispose of all such dwellings within five years from the time of completion thereof."

He thought it exceedingly undesirable that the local authorities should become the permanent owners of this class of property.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, he did not wish that corporations should hold such property in perpetuity; but if they were compelled to sell it within five years, they might incur loss. If his hon. Friend consented to substitute "a reasonable period" for "five years," he would accept the Amendment.

MR. MUNTZ said, "a reasonable period" was no definition at all. He would suggest "ten years" instead of "five."

MR. CAWLEY said, he would accept the proposed alteration.

Amendment amended accordingly, and agreed to.

MR. JAMES, in moving, as an Amendment, to add at the end of the clause words which would forbid the grant to any premises of a licence to sell intoxicating liquors to be drunk on the premises, or of any new licence to sell such liquors for consumption off the premises unless the number of such premises was less than 1 for every 1,000 of the population within the area, said, he could assure the House that he did not in any degree introduce this subject as a matter of party feeling, and he hoped the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department would be able to accept the Amendment, which was one of a practical kind, and was founded on fair and equitable considerations. He was not going to discuss the Licensing Bill of last year, or to allude to the attractions of the public-house; but if a genuine effort were made to improve the homes of the poor, the measure by which it was proposed to remove social and domestic misery ought to be considered in every aspect. It was an undeniable fact that in large towns public-houses almost invariably occupied the best sites, generally at the corners of streets, and he thought that steps should be taken so that this state of things should not be indefinitely repeated on sites where fever nests and rookeries had been rooted out. On the Shaftesbury Park Estate no evil had arisen from the fact that there public-houses were conspicuous by their absence. He thought that some explanation ought to be given by the right hon. Gentleman with reference to this peculiar question—namely, how it was proposed to deal with licensed houses hereafter erected under the provisions of this Bill. He begged to move the Amendment.

Amendment proposed,

At the end of the Clause, to add the words "No licence to sell intoxicating liquors for consumption on the premises shall be granted for any new premises within the area to which the scheme relates, and no new licence to sell intoxicating liquor by retail for consumption off the premises shall be granted for any premises in such area, unless it is proved to the licensing justices that the number of premises for the time being licensed to sell therein as last aforesaid is less than one for every thousand of the population inhabiting such area."—(Mr. James.)

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, he could not accept the Amendment. If the matter was to be dealt with, it must be in quite a different manner and by a general measure. The question was one which had been frequently discussed in Scotland. It would be most unwise to mix up the licensing question with a scheme for improving artizans dwellings.

MR. ERNEST NOEL said, he could not conceive on what ground the Amendment was objected to. In his opinion it was a moderate and reasonable proposal, for it did not seek to interfere with the social rights of the people, but merely to take care that money taken compulsorily from the ratepayers to clear sites and spaces should not be expended in raising up large gin-palaces. He did not agree with the Permissive Bill; but he should certainly support the Amendment, on the ground that those ratepayers who thought that houses of that sort would greatly increase the rates ought to be considered.

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY confirmed what had been stated by the hon. Member for Gateshead (Mr. James) with reference to the absence of public-houses on the Shaftesbury Park Estate. Great satisfaction was expressed at it by every one except the publicans who were kept away, and the magistrates, although pressed to increase the number of public-houses in the neighbourhood to make up the deficiency within the area, had rightly refused to do so. Although he was one of those who did not go in entirely for the Permissive Bill, he yet thought that as very little was got out of the Licensing Bill of last year, they should get what they could out of this; and in that view, small contributions such as this offered by the hon. Member for Gateshead should be thankfully received. He hoped the Amendment would be carried.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON said, he was sorry to hear the Home Secretary say that he did not want the licensing question matter to be mixed up with his Bill. The Bill was intended to make more comfortable, cleaner, happier, and healthier the dwellings of the working classes, and surely a proposal like the one before the Committee ran exactly in a line with it. The hon. Member for Gateshead (Mr. James) thought that those houses which they were going to erect would be more likely to be clean, happy, comfortable, and healthy if they kept away these temptations from their immediate neighbourhood. He (Mr. James) wished to diminish the temptations to drunkenness, which was the cause, nine times out of ten, of miserable and degraded homes. He wished to free the neighbourhood to some extent of those places where, according to his Friend the hon. Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Leatham), "the presiding genius has an interest in filling the glasses and emptying the pockets of his customers." He proposed to protect them from those temptations, and he desired to have an "oasis" in the desert of drunkenness. He (Sir Wilfrid Lawson), however, regretted that his hon. Friend had not quite had the courage of his opinions in this matter. He (Sir Wilfrid Lawson) wished that he had gone a little further. For no human being could say what was the exact number of public-houses that ought to be supplied to a given number of population. He could not quite understand why, if a public-house was an evil, 999 persons were to be free from it, whilst if there were 1,001 in the area they should suffer from it. It was impossible logically to maintain the proposition of his hon. Friend, for this trade was either good or bad; if good, they ought to make it as free as the wind; but if bad, they ought to prohibit it. But he took the Amendment as he found it, and thought it really deserving of some favour. The hon. Member for Dundee (Mr. Jenkins), in one of his excellent works, describing a "rookery" and its surroundings of gin-palaces, public-houses, and beer-shops, said—

"Veritable wreckers they who conduct these haunts, viler than the wreckers who place false beacons and plunder bodies on the beach.

That was stronger language than he (Sir Wilfrid Lawson) used; but if there were any truth in it, Parliament was responsible, and he did not think they should wash their hands of all the crime that arose. Last year both parties in that House by a large majority passed the third reading of the Licensing Bill, doing all the harm they possibly could to the working classes, and his right hon. Friend the Home Secretary must have had many an uncomfortable hour during the last Recess, and now when he heard what was going on in consequence of his legislation — legislation which, in his heart, he was as much ashamed of as any of them. Take Lancashire, a large portion of which he (Mr. Assheton Cross) himself represented. What was the state of things there? The Chief Constable's report shows an increase of 7,148 proceedings for drunkenness. In Liverpool, the apprehensions for drunkenness, disorderly, and incapable were in 1873, 20,970; and in 1874, 23,303. Also in the first five weeks after Cross's Act, 1874, came into force, an increase of 10 per cent in arrests for drunkenness. Now that they had done all they could to deteriorate the man, they spent hour after hour in that House pottering over this Bill to improve the houses in which he lived. But he maintained they must improve the men first, and remove them from those temptations which were their curse. He was sorry not to see the Prime Minister in his place, because, allusion having been made to the Shaftesbury Park Estate, he wished to call attention to the address which the right hon. Gentleman had delivered at its inauguration. His words were very important. He was addressing a meeting called to promote the interests of the Shaftesbury Park Association. The leading principle of that association was not only to erect good working-men's dwellings, but that they should be kept perfectly free from the contamination of drink shops. On the 18th of July, last year, the Prime Minister, at Shaftesbury Park, said—

"I have never in my life been more astonished than by what I have unexpectedly witnessed to-day—a city suddenly rising in the desert. The experiment you have made has succeeded, and therefore can hardly be called an experiment, and in its success is involved the triumph of an interesting effort for the moral elevation of the great body of the people. . . . I cannot doubt that this movement will spread. I myself view it with great interest, because it is a subject which at this moment engages the attention of Parliament. However, to a certain degree, you may be said to have solved a question which has perplexed Parliaments; and from what I have seen here, from what I am told I shall learn, from the information which has been promised me, I think I see the possibility of obtaining results which may guide the national councils in accomplishing an enterprise which I believe is impending in this country—the attempt upon a large scale to improve the dwellings of the great body of the people."

So that the right hon. Gentleman did not, like the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary, object to the two questions being mixed up together. He repeated that he regretted the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Disraeli) was not now in his place, for after that speech he would be bound to vote with the hon. Member for Gateshead. But what could the Home Secretary mean by saying that the Amendment ought not to be mixed up with the objects of the Bill? Read the Preamble itself, which specially points out the evil of "buildings so densely inhabited as to be highly injurious to the moral and physical welfare of the inhabitants." That was exactly what public-houses were, that was the only reason why he had ever objected to them, because they were "highly injurious to the moral and physical welfare of the inhabitants." The Government in the Bill were doing what he had been condemned as the most desperately wicked politician ever seen for doing—namely, trying to make people moral by Act of Parliament. Then again, the Preamble said, touching the effect of these objectionable houses—

"Diseases are constantly generated there, causing death and loss of health, not only in the courts and alleys, but also in other parts of such cities and boroughs."

Again; exactly, his charge against the public-houses. But they did more than promote disease and death, for the right hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright), the other day, described those who kept such places as men who deal in articles "producing crime, disorder, and madness to a very great extent." Did they really wish such places to be established in their new and improved districts? He should vote for the Amendment, and all those who did not wish to go on in make-believe legislation, but really wished to turn this Bill into one that would do something to increase the happiness and prosperity and morality of the working classes of this country, ought also to support it.

MR. ALDERMAN COTTON said, he could not help thinking, with the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary, that till the Permissive Bill was passed the licensing of public-houses had better be left in the hands of the justices.

MR. J. COWEN said, the Amendment did not go far enough. The existence of public-houses ought not to be allowed in these buildings. It was a very usual thing for a clause to be inserted in leases for building on estates to be occupied by the wealthier classes that no public-house should be erected. If it was desirable so to protect the dwellings of wealthy people it was far more so those of the working men.

MR. WATKIN WILLIAMS said, he concurred with the hon. Member for Newcastle (Mr. J. Cowen) that the Amendment did not go far enough. He could not vote for it for the reason that made it difficult for him to support a Permissive Bill—that it was the duty of the Imperial Parliament to take upon itself to determine for a country what law should prevail upon the subject, and not throw the responsibility on public bodies of deciding matters of such vast importance. He would have voted for a clause prohibiting altogether the erection of public-houses in these districts. He should support the clause.

MR. R. SMYTH: The hon. Member opposite (Mr. Alderman Cotton) has expressed his concurrence with the Home Secretary that the Amendment of my hon. Friend the Member for Gateshead (Mr. James) is not consistent with the objects of the Bill. And why? Because, says the hon. Gentleman, it is an artizans and labourers dwellings Bill. Now, no other argument is needed to justify the Motion of the hon. Member for Gateshead, for surely no one will contend that a publican is either an artizan or a labourer. You are proposing to erect more healthy dwellings for the working classes, and all that my hon. Friend asks is, that you take care that your dwellings when they are erected shall not be diverted from the objects for which they are built, and turned into dwellings for those who do not belong to the working classes at all. In fact, the Amendment is a necessary corollary to the main provisions of the Bill. The hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle has shown that if you are sincere in wishing to promote the moral and physical welfare of the labouring classes, you will keep them as far as possible from the contaminations of which he has spoken; but, apart from this weighty consideration, which has really received no answer, I accept the argument of the hon. Gentleman opposite, and turn it against himself. This is a Bill to provide suitable dwellings for the working classes, and therefore it is not a Bill to provide taverns and beer-shops. For that reason I shall vote with my hon. Friend, and I hope he will divide the House.

SIR SYDNEY WATERLOW said, the land that was to be built upon for artizans dwellings could not be used for public-houses, but the portion that was to be sold could be utilized as the purchaser thought fit. It was not right that the ratepayers' money should be spent in purchasing interests in public-houses, and that in 12 months after the same interest should be re-created without the authorities being recouped the money they had spent in purchasing it up. There were, in these existing crowded localities, more public-houses than were wanted, and it would be a great boon to reduce them.

MR. T. CAVE said, opponents of the United Kingdom Alliance could accept the Amendment, which was necessary because municipalities, for the sake of saving a halfpenny rate, might be tempted by higher offers to let land for public-houses.

SIR ANDREW LUSK said, it would be better not to take into consideration the Permissive Bill when they were dealing with this question. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would adhere to his Bill, or otherwise he would get into trouble. If there was no necessity for a public-house, the magistrates would not grant a licence, and if there was, why should not the neighbourhood have one?

MR. JAMES said, the object of the Amendment was to try and do something to remedy a prevailing evil, and he thought it was practicable if carried out. He must press it upon the Committee.

MR. MUNTZ objected to the Amendment, because it was an attempt by a side-wind to nullify the provisions of an Act of Parliament already on the Statute Book. There was no practical result to be derived from this perpetual meddling with private enterprise, and he should therefore vote against it.

MR. CUBITT said, that by forbidding the erection of public-houses on a piece of land the value of the adjoining land was increased in value for that purpose. It was the practice on large estates to set out a certain number, in order that the number should be limited. In all other cases, the most inconvenient sites were provided.

Question put, "That those words be there added."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 53; Noes 109: Majority 56.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS moved, as an Amendment, to add at the end of the clause the following words:—

"The local authority may, when they think it expedient so to do, without themselves acquiring the land, contract with the owner of any land comprised in an improvement scheme for the carrying out of the scheme in respect of such land by such owner."

MR. SHAW-LEFEVRE inquired, whether it was intended that the local authority should be at liberty to pay money out of the rates for the purpose of enabling an owner to carry out improvements in his property? If so, he thought the Amendment would be objectionable.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, there was no such intention. If he were advised that there was the least doubt on that point, he would take care to have it removed.

Amendment agreed to; words added.

MR. FAWCETT moved, as an Amendment, to add to the clause words providing that if at any time within three years after the local authority had acquired any plot of land the confirming authority should determine on, or if at the expiration of such three years the local authority should have been unable to lease the same for the purposes of the Act, the obligations of this enactment imposed upon the local authority should with respect to the land so unleased, cease and determine. As the hon. Baronet the Member for Maidstone (Sir Sydney Waterlow) had failed to carry his second Amendment, he (Mr. Fawcett) made this proposal to give the opportunity of confirming the idea embodied in the hon. Member's original Amendment. As the clause stood it was permissive in regard to carrying out the scheme, and there was nothing under Clause 7, as it stood, to ensure that the land when cleared out would be used. It was no answer on the part of the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary to say that this or that was not the intention of the Government; what the Committee had to look to was the legal application of the words contained in the clause. Did the Home Secretary pretend to say that in Clause 7, as it stood, there was anything to make the carrying out of the scheme obligatory? If not, what would become of the land, supposing the scheme should not be carried out? The object of his own Amendment was simply to prevent in future that taking place which the hon. Baronet the Member for Maidstone had described as having taken place in the City of London, where great improvements had been carried out, and where, though it was the intention that houses should be built for the working classes, the people residing in the cleared areas were turned out, and other parts of London became more crowded than before, the land remaining unoccupied. The right hon. Gentleman had said that the great principle which animated him with respect to the Bill was, to have a generous confidence in the local authorities; but the local authorities, though they might be anxious to carry out the scheme, might, from considerations of wise and just prudence, shrink from incurring the expenditure which the scheme involved, and find other excuses for not doing what was required. If the Amendment which he proposed were accepted, he believed the scheme would be adopted in localities where it was advisable that it should be adopted, while it would not be adopted in places where it was not desirable, and that nothing would be more likely to effect the clearance of unhealthy areas.

Amendment proposed,

At the end of the Clause, to add the words "If at any time within three years after the local authority have acquired any of the before mentioned plots of land the confirming authority shall so determine, or at the expiration of such three years the local authority shall have been unable to lease the same for the purpose aforesaid, the obligations by this enactment imposed upon the local authority shall, with respect to the land so unleased, cease and determine."—(Mr. Fawcett.)

Mr. ASSHETON CROSS said, he wished the Committee and the whole country to understand clearly the point at issue between himself and the hon. Member for Hackney. The hon. Member wished to make the measure a Towns Improvement Bill, and had urged his view in every possible variety of shape during this discussion. He (Mr. Cross), on the other hand, desired that the measure should not be a Towns Improvement Bill, but something else—namely, a measure that would prevent the occurrence of those evils that have been so forcibly and vividly depicted to-night by the hon. Member for Finsbury (Mr. Torrens) as having been brought about in Paris by the destruction of the dwellings of the working classes without any provision having been made for their accommodation. The object of the Government was to get rid of the rookeries, but also to provide for the erection of houses in the place of those destroyed, and thus to prevent the vice, filth, overcrowding, indecency, misery, disease, and death that must be the inevitable result of the hon. Gentleman's (Mr. Fawcett's) Towns Improvement Bill. That was the sole issue between himself and the hon. Member, but it was a grave one, and was one in which all the people of this country had the deepest interest. The hon. Member wished to leave the accommodation of those who were turned out of their dwellings to be met by the law of supply and demand, and by those of political economy. Well, the Government did not wish to place houses at the disposal of the people turned out at a cheaper rate than they ought to pay, they did not want to pauperize these people;

but they wanted to take care that in clearing out the rookeries for the benefit of the whole community the persons driven from those rookeries should not be damaged by it. They wished to build houses for them such as the people could live in and carry on their occupations in, but they must pay for them. That was the issue between them. [Mr. FAWCETT: No, no!] That was at the bottom of the issue, and it was clearly shown by the Motion of the hon. Baronet the Member for Chelsea (Sir Charles Dilke), who wished to change the title of the Bill; but he was glad to say that was not the ground taken up by his hon. Friends opposite. He had that faith in the great municipal institutions of England that when they came to Parliament and said—"We come here for a scheme to carry out these improvements" they would fully carry out that scheme. He asked the House to have confidence in the municipalities and in local self-government; and he contended that by passing the Amendment, they would be holding out great temptation to municipal authorities to evade the Act.

MR. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH also opposed the Amendment, on the ground that it would put a great temptation before the local authorities, and afford them a means, where they desired it, of evading the Act. At the same time, he was quite sure that nothing was further from the thoughts of the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett) than that the people who inhabited these places should be sent forth houseless and homeless, and he thought the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary had either misunderstood, or not treated quite fairly the remarks of the hon. Member.

MR. DIXON deprecated any proposal which would throw difficulties in the way of the successful working of the Act among our large provincial population such as he feared was suggested by the Amendment. All the arguments adduced by the Home Secretary had been in favour of the importance of re-building habitations for the working classes in those places where there had been great clearances; but there was a difference between the metropolis and the provincial towns, because in the latter there was no necessity for the immediate re-building of the houses. He suggested that the difference should be recognized.

MR. WHITWELL considered that

when the Provisional Orders were laid on the Table would be the time to see that they contained compulsory powers.

MR. RATHBONE urged that the Home Secretary should accept the proposition of the hon. Member for Hackney so far as applying the relaxation to all places outside the metropolis.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, the discussion showed how right the Government were in taking care that the Bill should apply only to very large towns. The more the details were discussed, the more it would be seen that they were only applicable to very large places. Indeed, he stated originally that he would rather apply it to towns of still larger population than was fixed in the Bill. At the same time, for the comfort of hon. Members, he would call attention to the fact that there was on the Paper a clause which would give ample power to the central authority to select any part of a scheme which it might appear desirable not to carry out.

MR. FAWCETT said, the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department had not condescended to answer his question, but had simply repeated the worn-out taunt that he (Mr. Fawcett) did not care for the working classes, and that Her Majesty's Government was a benevolent Government which did. ["Oh, oh!"] He was not the least afraid to have his political character judged by the working classes. The worst friend to the working classes was he who attempted to deceive them by trying to make them believe that this House could do for them what it could not do, and what they only could do for themselves. That was the principle which he had always endeavoured to advocate, and whatever the consequences he would, for the sake of the working men themselves, continue to advocate it. He wanted to ask the right hon. Gentleman a business question—Would the right hon. Gentleman point out the words in the clause which would give any security that the ground when cleared would be appropriated to any purpose? If the right hon. Gentleman would not answer it now, he (Mr. Fawcett) would move to report Progress in order to secure an answer at a future time.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, he could only reply as he had done before. He must refer the hon. Gentleman to the original scheme, which he did not appear thoroughly to understand. The local authorities would have to lay down the original scheme, and the permanent authority would, as a matter of course, require to be shown in that scheme how they proposed to deal with the land. It was distinctly stated that it should be their duty not only to take steps for securing the land, but also for carrying the scheme into operation.

MR. FAWCETT said, he would assume that the scheme had gone before the Home Secretary, and that he was satisfied with it, but how was it to be carried out? The enacting part of the clause said that the scheme was to be carried out in either of three ways; but supposing the parties concerned did not choose to act, how was the scheme to be carried into effect?

Question put, "That those words be there added."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 43; Noes 211: Majority 168.

Clause 8 (Notice to occupiers by placards).

On the Motion of Mr. HAMOND, Amendment made, in page 6, line 11, by leaving out "eight," and inserting "thirteen."

MR. FAWCETT moved, as an Amendment, in page 6, line 12, the omission of the words "occupied wholly or partially by persons belonging to the working class as tenants or lodgers," his object being to extend the benefit of the notice to be given to the occupants of condemned houses equally to all, irrespective of the class to which they belonged.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, he had no objection to the Amendment.

SIR SYDNEY WATERLOW regretted the course taken by the Home Secretary on that point, and the Amendment of the hon. Member for Newcastle (Mr. Hamond).

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, with regard to the latter point, the effect was that in every case there would be 13 weeks' notice.

PART II.

PROVISIONS ANCILLARY TO IMPROVEMENT SCHEME.

As to Local Authority.

1. Medical Officer.

Clause 9 (Medical officer of health in Metropolis).

On the Motion of Mr. Secretary CROSS, Amendment made, in page 6, line 26, by leaving out from "when they are desirous," to end of clause, and inserting—

"Appoint one or more legally qualified medical practitioner or practitioners, with such remuneration as they think fit, for the purpose of better carrying into effect this Act in the metropolis. Any officer so appointed by the Metropolitan Board of Works shall be deemed to be a medical officer of health of a local authority within the meaning of this Act, and shall perform the duties and be subject to the liabilities which such medical officer is by this Act required to perform and be subject to."

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

2. Local Inquiry.

Clause 10 (Proceedings on local inquiry); Clause 11 (Notice of inquiry to be publicly given); and Clause 12 (Power to administer oath) agreed to.

3. Acquisition of Land.

Clause 13 (Acquisition of Land).

MR. JACKSON said, he had to complain of the very careless manner in which the Bill had been drawn in reference to this subject. It should be sent back to the draftsman in order that it might assume a more intelligible shape. He had expected that the hon. Member for Salford (Mr. Cawley) would have moved the Amendments which stood in his name; but as he appeared to have abandoned his intention, he (Mr. Jackson) would himself move them. His object was to provide that the Lands Clauses Act should be incorporated in this Act. The plan of the Schedule appeared to be that a quasi-official arbitrator, appointed by the public authority, was to hold a preliminary and, he supposed, ex parte investigation; he was to issue a provisional award; and then, and not till then, was the owner to have a right to be heard. Under the Lands Clauses Act parties must elect at once between an arbitrator and a jury; but, under the proposed system, he could not help thinking that there would be troublesome and expensive rehearings, as parties affected by the preliminary award would recognize the difficulty of inducing the arbitrator to vary his own decision, and would procure expensive legal assistance, and resort, when possible, to a jury, and the Committee ought to call upon the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary to show very clearly why he adopted this new and untried system in preference to that which had been satisfactorily in operation for so long a period. He should move the first of a series of Amendments, the object of which was to substitute the provisions of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act for those of this Bill.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, the procedure, so far from being novel, had been tried with success for 25 years in Ireland, where it was introduced with the object of avoiding the delay and expense of dealing with small holdings under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act. There was no doubt it would be equally satisfactory in the present case.

MR. CAWLEY did not think the cases were so far parallel as to justify the adoption of the Irish procedure without modification. He was, however, willing to accept the provision proposed in the Bill, with certain modifications in the direction of a rule that might apply to all kinds of property, which at the proper time he would move.

MR. RATHBONE, in opposing the Amendment, said, that the authorities in Liverpool, owing to the incorporation of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, were obliged—with a view to avoid legal expenses—to pay to proprietors of houses who had neglected to carry out proper sanitary arrangements, 50 per cent above the value of their property. In the opinion of the Town Clerk of Liverpool, the Irish system worked better, and he was glad it was to be adopted; but he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would consider whether it was not possible still further to lessen the expenses to be incurred in carrying out the Act in connection with the transfer of land.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, that the courses provided by the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act—the summoning of a special jury or the appointment of arbitrators to fix the value of property to be acquired—were dilatory and uncertain. The arbitrators were in a certain sense judges; but they seldom agreed, and they generally had interested views. The system adopted under the Irish Act was better and simpler; for if the party interested were not satisfied, he had a right of appeal to the tribunal of a jury. The main provisions of that Act were adopted, and such of the clauses of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act as were necessary to give effect to such main provisions.

MR. MORGAN LLOYD suggested, for the sake of clearness, that such of the clauses of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act as were proposed to be incorporated with the Bill should be stated in the Schedule by number.

MR. MARTEN believed that the clause would work well. With regard to the suggestion as to retaining the action of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, it should be borne in mind that Act had to deal with every description of property.

MR. HERSCHELL thought that the Schedule of the Bill was an improvement in the appointment of a single arbitrator; but it was objectionable that under the Bill there might be a double inquiry and then another appeal to the jury. He would ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he could not, at all events, devise something which might give the advantage of a single arbitrator dealing with the whole of the cases without the disadvantages which would ensue if the Schedule were carried in its present form. There was a vast waste of time and money in most of these arbitration cases, inasmuch as the evidence given in one case might often be made applicable to others.

MR. GIBSON said, that under the Irish Lands Clauses Act an arbitrator went down to the spot to survey and assess the property. The parties had notice of his intention, and they were heard before him either by or without counsel or attorneys. The parties often acquiesced in the arbitrator's draft award; but if they were dissatisfied, they then appeared before him on the final award. Sometimes he was satisfied he had made a mistake, and then he either increased or diminished his award, but always acting in a quasi-judicial way. Traverses were not too frequent under this system, and the Home Secretary had been wise in adopting the main provisions of a procedure which he doubted not would work as satisfactorily in England as it had done in Ireland.

Mr. Jackson

On the Motion of Mr. GIBSON, Amendment made in page 7, line 25, after "body thereof," by inserting—

"The Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845,' as amended by 'The Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1860,' 'The Railways Act (Ireland), 1851,' 'The Railways Act (Ireland), 1860,' 'The Railways Act (Ireland), 1864,' and the Railways Traverse Act, shall, subject to the provisions following, regulate and apply to the purchase and taking of lands in Ireland, and shall for this purpose be deemed to form part of this Act, in the same manner as if they were enacted in the body hereof."

MR. ASSHETON CROSS moved the following Amendment in page 7, line 39, at end, add—

"Due regard being had to the nature and then condition of the property and the probable duration of the buildings in their existing state, and to the state of repair thereof."

The object of the Amendment was to prevent the arbitrator giving an excessive amount of compensation to the owners of the property taken, and also to prevent the owners from permitting their property to go to ruin with the view to its being taken under the provisions of this Act.

MR. CAWLEY, whilst approving of the intention of the Proviso, questioned the utility of introducing it into the Act, as the arbitrator would in any case, if he was a fitting person for his office, have to take these and all other circumstances of the property into consideration. He therefore proposed to move an Amendment to leave out all the words after the word "to" in the first line of Mr. Cross's proposed Amendment, and insert the words, "all the circumstances affecting such value." He did not see any reason why this further Amendment could not be accepted.

MR. STANSFELD judged that the effect of the proposition of the Home Secretary would be that the arbitrator would have to ascertain the market value of the property. He wished to observe that property was often of greater market value, because it was unfit for human habitation. Owners of property who had neglected their duty ought not to be allowed to take any advantage of their own wrong; and the amount necessary to put their property in a fit state for human habitation ought to be deducted from the value of their property.

MR. GREGORY trusted the Bill would be left in the state which was proposed by the Home Secretary, which was calculated to carry out what were really the principles of the Bill.

MR. SHAW-LEFEVRE expressed his approval of the Amendment, which he considered would be a great improvement to the Bill. He thought that some limit ought to be placed on the calculation of the proposed measure of value, and would suggest that the best course would be to incorporate Torrens's Act with the Bill.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, the words were drawn by a person of great experience. He was willing, however, to assent to the addition of the words "and all other circumstances affecting such value."

Amendment (Mr. Cawley), by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment (Mr. Secretary Cross), as amended, agreed to.

MR. CAWLEY moved, as an Amendment, to leave out in line 40 "without any additional allowance in respect of the compulsory purchase of the same." There would be numbers of cases where great hardship would follow to individuals where the property was taken away compulsorily.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, he could not accept the Amendment.

Clause 9 (Regulations for factory and magazine).

CAPTAIN NOLAN said, he must object to so heavy a penalty as £50 a-day for a breach of the conditions laid down, and would contend that the effect of the penalties provided in the Bill would be to suppress all small manufacturers of gunpowder and explosive substances.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, with regard to the objection of the hon. and gallant Gentleman, the penalties were reduced by the Bill below the point at which they had formerly been. In addition, he had to say that manufacturers had expressed their approval of the Bill.

Clause, verbally amended, and agreed to.

Clause 10 (General rules for factories and magazines).

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN, in moving to report Progress, said, he did not understand the procedure of the Government. It was understood that they were to deal that night with the important question of the nomination of the Select Committee on Banks of Issue, and many Scotch Members had been waiting to take part in the discussion on that Motion. It was now past 12 o'clock, however, and other Orders of the Day were on the Paper, so that there seemed little prospect of the Motion he referred to being brought on.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. Campbell-Bannerman).

MR. DISRAELI said, that the Orders of the Day would have to be gone through before the Motion the hon. Gentleman referred to could be reached, and then it would be too late to take it. The hon. Member, by pressing his Motion, therefore, would be interfering with whatever progress they could make with the Bill now in Committee, but would not be doing anything to advance the object he had in view. The Motion should, however, be fixed for to-morrow (Tuesday).

MR. ANDERSON said, that the Scotch Members took a particular interest in the question, and only wanted to know whether the Motion was to come on that night or not.

JUSTICES OF THE PEACE QUALIFICA-TION BILL—(No. 5.)
(The Earl of Albemarle.)

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

THE EARL OF ALBEMARLE, in moving that the Bill be now read the second time, said, that its object was to amend the Act of 18 Geo. II., by which it was declared that no person should be eligible to be a justice of the peace who did not hold land of the annual value of £100. By his Bill he proposed to enact that an income of £300 a-year from personal estate should be deemed equal to an income of £100 a-year from land. The noble Earl said that in the few remarks he desired to offer to the House, it would be his object to show that the restriction instituted by that Act was bad legislation—vicious in principle and obstructive in operation; that it was one of the last remnants of class legislation, and one by which the efficient administration of justice was rendered subversive to the social-elevation of a class:—for by necessary inference, it was declared that landed proprietors alone were competent to administer justice in the rural districts of England and Wales—to the exclusion of vast numbers of gentlemen of rank, wealth, education, and intelligence who might reside within the counties, and to the exclusion even of that learned profession from which all other Judges were taken. The period when a property qualification was first affixed to the magistracy dated 450 years back; and at that time the object contemplated was to restrict the magistracy to the landed class. Subsequently, the Act of George II., by virtue of the tithe rent-charge, qualified incumbents of livings became eligible for the office of justice, and thus clergymen became sharers in that offensive monopoly, and stood in the invidious position of holding lay appointments to the exclusion of the main body of the laity. He wished to speak with all respect of the clergy of England and Wales; but, in his opinion, they were not the most fit persons to administer justice, and he expressed a very common view of the subject when he said that clergymen should not be placed on the Commission of the Peace, except where laymen of proper status could not be found for the performance of magisterial duties. And here he would call attention to a Return which had been laid on the Table, by which their Lordships would see how that clerical element in the county magistracy was spread over the length and breadth of the land. It was a Return of the number of clergymen of the Established Church who acted on the Commission of the Peace in each county; and it told them that in 51 out of the 52 counties into which England and Wales were divided the scarcity of lay magistrates, was supplemented by beneficed clergy. When he moved for the Return, he expected to be able to show that in the two counties with which he was best acquainted, there was too great a number of clergymen; the Return fully answered his expectation, Norfolk and Suffolk being the counties in which clerical magistrates were most employed. If they took the contiguous counties—the counties bordering on the German Ocean—namely, Essex, Lincolnshire, and Yorkshire—and if they would make him a present of Herefordshire, in which also the clergy were very numerous—they would find that in those six counties there was a greater number of clergymen acting as magistrates than in any 14 other counties. He had been told, in fact, that there was scarcely a county in which an extension of the area whence lay magistrates were taken would not be a positive boon; but if it would benefit only the counties he had named, it would fully justify him in asking their Lordships to pass the Bill before them. Why, by excluding the laity from the magisterial Bench, should they create an artificial scarcity of magistrates, when the demand was so much greater than the supply? Was it right that these reverend gentlemen who received stipends from the State, should be regarded as qualified; when men of culture and intelligence, and men well versed in the criminal law, were debarred from rendering assistance on the Bench in consequence of the civil disabilities inflicted on them by the law? In the reign of Henry V. justices of the peace were chosen from "the most sufficient men dwelling in each county." If that excellent law had existed, the present Bill would have been unnecessary; it would have qualified resident gentry whether deriving income from real or personal property. That law was repealed by the Act passed in 18 Henry VI., when it was declared that "none should be assigned justices of the peace if he had not lands or tenements of the value of £20 a-year." And the reason for passing that restrictive law was stated on the face of it, and deserved attention:—It was "because men of small substance had crept into the commission, whose poverty have made them covetous and contemptible." Therefore, because covetous and contemptible persons had crept into the commission in the troublous reign of a weak mediæval King, therefore gentlemen who were neither covetous nor contemptible were to be shut out of the commission in the reign of Queen Victoria. The Act of George II. which he now sought to amend was only a re-affirmation of the former statute, and gave the same reason, but raising the qualification from £20 to £100 a-year. What said the Preamble—"Whereas it was of the utmost consequence to the common weal to prevent persons of 'mean estate' from becoming magistrates, therefore, &c." If their Lordships rejected this Bill, would they be prepared to say that their younger sons who might not possess £100 a-year in land were less qualified to discharge the duties of magistrates than their elder sons and incumbents of livings. But more than that, he contended that the tribunals in which these magistrates sat were to a great extent unconstitutional, inasmuch as persons charged before the magistrates were fined or imprisoned by their orders, without having the benefit of being tried by their equals. He did not mean to say that misdemeanours should not be triable by summary process; but he contended that if they must needs have such tribunals, it was their duty to make them as perfect as human ingenuity could devise. From a paragraph which was inserted in Her Majesty's Speech from the Throne at the commencement of the present Session, and from an announcement made in "another place," it seemed to be indicated that the Government were about to ask Parliament to extend the powers of those badly constituted Courts. It was under those circumstances that he offered their Lordships that small measure of judicial reform, either to accept it, or at any rate to gain the assurance that the Government would take the subject out of the hands of an independent Member, in which it ought not to be, into their own. He begged to move the second reading of the Bill.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^d."
—(The Earl of Albemarle.)

LORD HAMPTON said, he hoped their Lordships would not accept the Bill of the noble Earl. He submitted to their Lordships that no case for the change proposed by him had been shown by the noble Earl—that no necessity existed for the proposed change, and that the change was in itself objectionable. On former occasions a similar proposition had been opposed from both sides of the House, and had been rejected, as he trusted this would be now. He was ready to concur with the noble Earl that it was not desirable that clergymen should be placed on the Commission of the Peace where a sufficient number of lay gentlemen could be found qualified for the exercise of magisterial functions; but he thought that was a matter which might be safely left to the discretion of the Lords Lieutenant of counties—it was, in fact, the principle on which the Lords Lieutenant acted at present, and he could state from his own experience that among some of our most valuable magistrates were clergymen who had been placed on the Commission. Clerical magistrates were especially useful in relation to poaching cases, where the landowners were looked upon as personally interested against the labourer, and in cases which frequently arose between landlord and tenant. For himself, he should greatly regret any change by which the magistracy should be separated from the local interests of their several counties. The noble Earl seemed to have omitted from his consideration one very important point—namely, the financial duties performed by the county magistrates. Now, it was most desirable that the fiscal affairs of counties should be conducted by gentlemen who had a local interest in the localities where the county rates were raised. He doubted that the landed qualification was a serious obstacle to the appointment of gentlemen who would come in under the noble Earl's Bill, because if a person had £300 a-year from personal property he was in a position to purchase a property in land of the annual value of £100. For these reasons he should move that the Bill be read a second time that day six months.

Amendment moved to leave out ("now") and add at the end of the Motion ("this day six months.")—(The Lord Hampton.)

EARL COWPER said, he should support the second reading of the Bill, for he could not but look upon the question raised by the noble Earl as one of very great importance. As Lord Lieutenant of a county his experience in that capacity led him to think that desirable men were excluded from the Bench by the existing property qualification. The proposal of the noble Earl had been before their Lordships' House on former occasions, when it had been argued that this qualification was a sham, and that the restriction, like all other restrictions, would be evaded. If it were a sham, that was a very good reason for not keeping it up—and, indeed, would be a very good argument for not requiring any qualification whatever. But the restriction could not be so easily evaded as was supposed. He knew, from his experience as Lord Lieutenant, that there was sometimes great difficulty in placing persons whom he knew to be well qualified for the magistracy upon the Commission of the Peace. The noble Lord who moved the Amendment (Lord Hampton), spoke of having the magisterial Bench filled by gentlemen who had an interest in the affairs of the county. Well, he believed there were in every county plenty of such men who would make valuable magistrates, and who would enjoy general respect, who were prevented from taking their position by the qualification required by the existing law. There were, for instance, agricultural tenants, men of practical good sense, who had a considerable interest in the financial affairs of the counties in which they resided; there were retired professional men, whose legal training would make their services on the Bench most valuable, but who were excluded by the restriction. He knew a case in which a retired physician, who had been in large practice, found it very difficult to get appointed to the Bench. The Bill for the abolition of a property qualification for Members of Parliament, after being many times introduced into the House of Commons, and as often rejected, was at last carried under a Conservative Administration; and, in like manner, he hoped that this proposition for the removal of the landed qualification for the magistracy, which had been several times proposed and rejected, would finally be accepted under the present Conservative Government.

THE BISHOP OF PETERBOROUGH said, he had no intention of offering any remarks on the merits or demerits of the Acts which the present Bill was intended to amend, but wished to say a word or two with respect to the clerical magistrates, whose presence on the Bench had been alluded to more or less unfavourably by the noble Lords who had spoken on the Bill. As those reverend gentlemen were not represented in their Lordships' House, they might possibly expect a Bishop present at the debate say a word or two for them. He must say he entirely concurred in the general tendency of the observations of the noble Lords as to the great undesirableness of having clergymen on the magisterial Bench—in many respects that was not a thing to be desired—but his reasons for this opinion were very different from those which seemed to prevail with those noble Lords. He thought the appointment of clergymen to the Commission of the Peace was not to be desired; but not because he thought they made worse magistrates than laymen did; there was nothing in their previous education, in their intelligence, or in their habits of thought, to warrant any such conclusion. A distinguished countryman of his, about 100 years ago, described a country clergyman as a squire who was obliged to wear a black coat, say his prayers, and live on his own estate. There were, on the other side, circumstances under which a clergyman might make a better magistrate than a layman. He would, probably, be a better judge as between landlord and tenant, as between a game preserver and a poacher, and as between a rich man and a poor one. But he did not think it fair of the State to take the clergyman from his higher duties and put him to that work, and he felt that he took it for granted that no Lord Lieutenant would recommend a gentleman for the position of magistrate who was not connected with the county for which the appointment was to be made; but he would remind their Lordships that several Lords Lieutenant had stated in that House that they had experienced great inconvenience and difficulty in finding proper persons for the office of county magistrates, without having recourse to beneficed clergymen; and most of them had concurred in the opinion that the appointment of clergymen was not desirable where competent laymen were to be had. If that were so, he thought a case had been made out for the change proposed by the noble Earl. For himself, he (Earl Granville) thought it a great evil that the youngest sons of Peers could not be appointed to the Bench; gentlemen who had practised at the Bar, and who resided in the counties; and gentlemen who had held office in the Colonies or at home, and who had administered large affairs. He agreed that it was better that clergymen should not be selected, and it seemed to be the general opinion of their Lordships that if other persons could be found clergymen should not be appointed. Notwithstanding that general opinion, they found by the Return produced on the Motion of the noble Earl (the Earl of Albemarle) that in almost all the counties a large number of clergymen sat on the Bench as magistrates, and that in the Eastern counties there was almost a preponderance. Now, all that this Bill did was to make wider the field from which a selection could be made by the Lords Lieutenant and the Lord Chancellor, and he hoped that their Lordships would not reject it without very careful consideration of the question on its merits—as he feared they had done on a previous occasions. But while attaching great importance to the subject, and desiring to see it set at rest as early as possible, he would advise his noble Friend not to press the measure in case the Government would undertake to deal with the whole question. He would just observe that there was a great want of a change in the law, to enable the local authorities in some districts to appoint stipendiary magistrates. Corporations of boroughs having 25,000 inhabitants could appoint, if they found the necessary stipend; but there were manufacturing and mining districts, as large as boroughs, in which there was no power to appoint such magistrates, and the consequence was that in some of those districts the magistrates were gentlemen connected with the manufactories and mines—a circumstance that placed their decisions under some degree of suspicion. He wished that the Government would seriously consider whether something could not be done.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND said, that the noble Earl (Earl Granville) had made a charge against their Lordships that they had on former occasions rejected similar measures without due consideration; but this charge could not apply to the present Government or the present Bill, because this Bill was of a different character.

EARL GRANVILLE said, the present Bill was identical with the Bill of 1872.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND said, he referred to those former measures, which the noble Earl himself had concurred in thinking ought not to be passed. It might be the case that at times the Lords Lieutenant found it difficult to fill the vacancies that occurred on the magisterial Bench of their respective counties; but he thought this difficulty seldom arose of late years: and as to the appointment of clerical magistrates, they had heard the statements of the noble Lord the Lord Lieutenant of Worcestershire on the one side and of the noble Earl the Lord Lieutenant of Bedfordshire on the other. He (the Duke of Richmond) certainly did not think that there was very much to complain of in the present practice of appointing magistrates. If a Lord Lieutenant should be required to inquire whether a man was always of a good temper, and was always likely to act wisely and well on the Bench, he was glad that he was not Lord Lieutenant of Sussex. He doubted whether the noble Earl (the Earl of Albemarle) had shown that there was a great necessity for this Bill. The noble Earl had singled out one or two counties in which a large number of clerical magistrates had been appointed; but that was no reason why they should alter the law of all the other counties. He would, however, advise his noble Friend (Lord Hampton) not to press his Amendment, in the hope that some arrangement of a satisfactory character might be come to in accordance with the suggestions of the Lord second reading of this one; but he dissented from some of the arguments that had been advanced in its support. He knew many clergymen who made excellent magistrates, and he saw no objection to it; indeed, he quite concurred in the remark of the noble Earl (the Earl of Harrowby), that it was not desirable to have a strict line of demarcation in those respects between laity and clergy, and he believed that in some districts of the country it would be quite impossible to do without them. He himself, as a Lord Lieutenant, had experienced difficulty in finding a sufficiency of properly qualified laymen. He might further remark that clergymen were not appointed to the Commission as a matter of course; a special case had to be made for their appointment—otherwise the Lord Chancellor would object. Nor did he believe, whatever might have been formerly the case, that there was any class jealousy in the matter now; on the contrary, he objected to the present restriction as unreal, as assuming a social distinction which did not exist. A gentleman with a trifling income of £100 a-year from land did not really differ from his neighbour who had a larger income from personalty. As to what had been said about the importance of appointing men who had a personal interest in the financial affairs of the locality in which they were to act as magistrates, it was a mistake to suppose that object was attained by the present qualification. A man might be appointed a magistrate for Cornwall on a qualification derived in Northumberland. His only doubt with regard to the Bill was whether the qualification for personal property proposed was not higher than it need be.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, that as to the appointment of clergymen to the Bench, the rule was that when a Lord Lieutenant recommended a clergyman for appointment, the holder of the Great Seal requested him to consider whether there was any layman in the county better qualified for the position; and unless the Lord Lieutenant reported that it was quite impossible to find such a person, the holder of the Great Seal did not decline to appoint the clergyman; if such layman could be found, the appointment of the clergyman was refused. He (the Lord Chancellor) did not look upon this Bill as being one of great importance in regard to the changes which it proposed. It placed greater power in the hands of Lords Lieutenant than they at present possessed, by giving them a larger range for selection, but he was not aware that any of them had expressed a desire for the change. He was greatly surprised to hear the noble Earl the Lord Lieutenant of Bedfordshire (Earl Cowper) argue in favour of the Bill that the present qualification was a sham, and that they had got rid of a property qualification for Members of Parliament. If the present qualification was a sham, it would be better to get rid of it than to substitute another sham for it. He took it for granted that when a Lord Lieutenant recommended a gentleman for the bench he looked at his connection with the county. It was difficult to imagine a Lord Lieutenant recommending any man for the office of a county magistrate without taking into account his particular interest in that particular county. Their Lordships all knew that the statute of George II. did not require that the landed estate which gave the qualification should be in the county for which the appointment was made; but he took it for granted that when a Lord Lieutenant considered whether he should recommend A. B. to be appointed a magistrate in the county he considered whether that person had property or at all events a residence in the county. He did not mean to say that there were not cases in which persons were appointed magistrates of a county without having either property or a residence in it; but such cases must be very rare. Now this Bill would make personalty to a certain amount a qualification, but personal property had no locality, it might consist in stock in some foreign loan; and he did not quite see why the possession of £300 a-year in the Honduras Loan should qualify a man to be a county magistrate in England. If this qualification were a rated residence, and in addition, the possession of a certain amount of personal estate, a desirable change might be made in the present law.

EARL GRANVILLE said, that the noble Lord opposite (Lord Hampton) who had moved the Amendment, had stated that this Bill was not wanted, and that it would be useless in operation. Now, if he (Earl Granville) thought that would be so, he should recommend his noble Friend behind him to withdraw his Bill. But the Lord Chancellor said he took it for granted that no Lord Lieutenant would recommend a gentleman for the position of magistrate who was not connected with the county for which the appointment was to be made; but he would remind their Lordships that several Lords Lieutenant had stated in that House that they had experienced great inconvenience and difficulty in finding proper persons for the office of county magistrates, without having recourse to beneficed clergymen; and most of them had concurred in the opinion that the appointment of clergymen was not desirable where competent laymen were to be had. EARL GRANVILLE said, the present Bill was identical with the Bill of 1872.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND said, he referred to those former measures, which the noble Earl himself had concurred in thinking ought not to be passed. He would, however, advise his noble Friend (Lord Hampton) not to press his Amendment, in the hope that some arrangement of a satisfactory character might be come to in accordance with the suggestions of the Lord Chancellor. At the same time he totally divested himself of any connection with the much larger question of providing stipendiary magistrates for the mining districts.

LORD CARLINGFORD said, that, as Lord Lieutenant for a county, he had experienced the difficulty of finding persons, not clergymen, fitted for the position of magistrates; and he had a strong opinion against clergymen being on the bench—those gentlemen had other duties to perform; but, assuming that they were to be called upon to act in that capacity, a competent clergyman might not be found where he was needed. The only argument he had heard against the Bill which had any weight in his mind was, that which insisted on the anomaly of gentlemen having the disposal of county rates without being rate-payers themselves. He trusted the suggestion of the Lord Chancellor would be accepted.

LORD HAMPTON said, that though not in favour of the Bill he would not, after what had fallen from the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack and the noble Duke the Lord President, press his Amendment to a division.

INDIAN LEGISLATION BILL—(No. 46.)
(The Marquess of Salisbury.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY, in moving that the Bill be now read the second time, said, that though the House was not very large at that moment, yet it would hardly be respectful to the great interests affected by the Bill not to state its provisions at this stage of its course. This was a Consolidation Bill. He might explain that, in the first instance, it had been intended to consolidate all the Acts relating to India and its Government, and such a measure had been earnestly wished for by the Government of India for some time past. But an unobserved revolution had taken place in the House of Commons which made legislation exceedingly difficult—he alluded to “the half-past Twelve” Rule, [which had an absolutely extinguishing effect upon Bills of that kind. He therefore proposed to confine the operation of the Bill to the consolidation of the Acts relating to one of the most important branches of the law—that which applied to the legislative power of the Council of the Governor General of India to pass statutes for that country. In doing this he proposed to make some alterations in the law which chiefly concerned the Courts of Law in India, and to declare that the measures passed by the Legislative Council were not ultra vires. The Courts of India had assumed a power of which in England they knew nothing. Parliament in this country was supreme, and the Courts of Law never ventured to say that the Acts of Parliament were ultra vires; but under the Act giving power to the Legislative Council of India, the Courts in that country had assumed a jurisdiction analogous to that entertained by the Supreme Court at Washington; that jurisdiction, moreover, was not confined to the Supreme Courts, but was exercised by the lowest Courts of Summary Jurisdiction in every part of India. That provision of the Act recognized the necessity of imposing certain limits on Acts of the Legislative Council. He did not propose to interfere with the power of limitation, but to alter the machinery by which those limits were worked out, and the power of the Courts of Law brought to bear upon them. Section 22 of the Indian Councils Act restrained Governors General from making laws which should repeal or “in any way affect” any provisions of Acts therein specified. Obviously, the intention of the framers of that Act was that no laws inconsistent with the Acts in question should be passed; and from this mistake a great deal of inconvenience had arisen. On one occasion the Legislature of Bombay gave powers to a small Court to deal with offences in the streets, and this was held to affect the jurisdiction which had been previously given to a High Court. In this state of things inconvenient decisions had been given, and it was part of the Bill to prevent such decisions being given in future. A more important alteration was that which related to the legislative power of the Governor General of India in Council. In the Indian Council Act the Governor General in Council was restricted from making any law which might affect the authority of Parliament, or the constitutional rights of the East India Company, or any part of the unwritten law or Constitution of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland whereon might depend the allegiance of any person to the Crown of the United Kingdom. That provision in the law had been productive of the greatest doubts. In the case of the Wahabee conspirators Mr. Chisholm Anstey had argued that the unwritten law of Great Britain was violated by any legislation affecting the social contract, and on that ground he impugned the authority of the Government of India to make the law under which the conspirators were arrested, and called on the people to resist it. The Act was a useful one, and some of them might have wished during the discussion of last night that it had been in operation in some of our Colonies. The Judges listened with regret to Mr. Anstey's argument, but admitted that there was some excuse for it in the ambiguity of the Act which it was the object of the Bill to remove. It was quite clear that if we were to give to any Courts the power of declaring that the Acts of the Indian Legislature were ultra vires in respect of certain particular excepted laws, there ought to be no doubt as to the limits of that Legislature's action. The limitation ought to be expressed in clear and unambiguous language; and he went further and said that if we were to have the Acts of the Legislature of India revised by a Court, the revision should be made by the Court of the highest dignity. He, therefore, proposed that no Court in India should have power to say that the Acts of the Legislative Council were invalid as being ultra vires; but if the Supreme Courts of the Presidencies were of opinion such was the case, they might by three of their Members represent the facts to the Government of India, who should transmit them to the Secretary of State, by whom in turn they should be submitted to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. In re-enacting Her Majesty's power of disallowance, he proposed to extend it to laws or parts of laws, to avoid the inconvenience of not being able to consider a part of a whole code. He further proposed by the Bill to remove any doubts as to the validity of certain regulations made by the Bombay and Madras Councils before full statutory power had been given them. While he was responsible for the Bill, he would acknowledge that it had been prepared by Mr. Fitzjames Stephen, than whom no more capable draftsman could have been charged with the duty.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a."
—(The Marquess of Salisbury.)

VISCOUNT HALIFAX said, he would willingly testify his approval of the course taken by his noble Friend in consolidating the law with the assistance of so able a draftsman. He wished however to observe that the anomalies to be corrected came into existence before his official responsibility in connection with Indian affairs. He thought it was right in principle, if the Court was of opinion that an Act was ultra vires of the Legislative Council, that it should make a report to the Governor General; but he did not quite see how the provision would work. What was to happen in regard to the case before the Court out of which the necessity of reporting arose? Were all proceedings in the case to be suspended in the meanwhile? That was, perhaps, a point which could best be dealt with in Committee on the Bill; but he had thought it well to call attention to it at the earliest opportunity, in order that it might be duly considered.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, he should like to consult legal authority before committing himself to an opinion on the point; but it was very possible that it might be desirable to insert in the Bill words enabling the Court in India to suspend all proceedings in the case before it until the question of the validity of the Act had been decided at home.

LORD LAWRENCE was understood to express the opinion that the modification of the law embodied in the Bill before the House was one of much value and importance. The proposal of the noble Marquess would allow the law to be acted upon, and at the same time prevent injustice.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2^a accordingly and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday next.

House adjourned at a quarter past Seven o'clock, to Thursday next, a quarter before Five o'clock.

PRISONS IN IRELAND.—QUESTION.

MR. O'SULLIVAN asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, If it is a fact that there are about four times as many prisons and bridewells in Ireland as are required for the average number of prisoners in that Country; and, if so, whether the Government is prepared to bring in a Bill to amalgamate some of those prison establishments, and thereby relieve the cesspayers from unnecessary taxation?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH, in reply, said, that he could not say that there were four times as many prisons as were required, though the statement would be quite true, to say the least of it, with regard to bridewells. His attention had been directed to the subject, and he hoped to bring in a Bill to deal with it.

FRENCH LABOUR LAWS COMMISSION.
QUESTION.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether the Government has received a Copy of the Report of the French Labour Laws Commission, and whether they will consent to the publication of that document, or of so much of it as relates to the treatment of Indian Coolie labourers in the French Colonies?

MR. BOURKE, in reply, said, Her Majesty's Government had not received a Copy of the Report, but they had received an extract from it. As the French Government had not published it themselves, Her Majesty's Government were not at liberty to publish the extract. He was sorry, therefore, he could not do what the hon. Baronet desired.

EMIGRATION OF CHILDREN TO CANADA.—QUESTION.

MR. HOPWOOD asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether he will lay upon the Table all Correspondence relative to the emigration of children to Canada and to Mr. Doyle's Report thereon; and, if he will state to the House whether he has taken any and what steps in regard to the said emigration?

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH, in reply, said, that Mr. Doyle's Report was a subject of communications now going on between the Colonial Office and the Government of Canada, and there was no Correspondence which could at present with propriety be laid on the Table. He (Mr. Sclater-Booth) had not as yet taken any steps with regard to this form of emigration, and he saw no prospect of being able to do so at present.

CHURCHES AND MANSES (SCOTLAND).

QUESTION.

MR. M'LAREN asked the Lord Advocate, On what day he intends to introduce the Bill respecting the rates levied in Scotland for building and repairing Churches and Manses, which, in his speech, on 8th July last, he undertook to bring in during the present Session?

THE LORD ADVOCATE: Sir, the subject of assessments for the building and repairing of churches and manses in Scotland has been repeatedly under my consideration. I regret that, owing to circumstances beyond my control, I have not yet been able to submit a matured proposal to the Government; but I have hopes that I may be able to introduce some measure on the subject during the present Session.

ARMY—NON-COMMISSIONED OFFICERS.

QUESTION.

MR. RIPLEY asked the Secretary of State for War, If he would state to the House how many non-commissioned officers have obtained commissions in those branches of the Service which have been affected by the abolition of the purchase system since that Act came into operation; and, how many non-commissioned officers obtained commissions in those branches of the Service affected in the corresponding number of years previous to the abolition of the purchase system?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: Sir, between the 1st November, 1871, and the 31st March, 1875, the number of non-commissioned officers appointed to sub-lieutenancies, quarter-masterships, and riding-masterships was, 106; the number appointed between the 1st of June, 1868, and the 31st of October, 1871, was 61.

MERCHANT SEAMEN'S FUND—PENSIONS TO SEAMEN.

QUESTION.

MR. STEWART asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether Her Majesty's Government is prepared to recommend to Parliament an increased Vote for Pensions of those Seamen (and their dependants) who have contributed to the Merchant Seamen's Fund, and have complied with the necessary requirements entitling them to receive pensions?

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY: Sir, the Government have no intention of recommending an increased Vote for the purpose referred to. The rates of pension now in force were fixed after the passing of the Merchant Seamen's Winding-up Act in 1851, under which the Government undertook the administration of the Merchant Seamen's Fund. They were the average of the rates existing at the different ports at which the funds were formerly administered by local trusts, many of which had become bankrupt. The contributions by seamen to the fund have been quite inadequate to meet the payment of the pensions, and the cost of taking over the fund has been very great already to the country—about £1,000,000 sterling. It will still be many years before these pensions run out.

TAXATION OF BEER OR MALT ABROAD.

QUESTION.

MR. STORER asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether, in view of the "Replies" and "Further Replies" to the Letter from the Treasury to Lord Granville, dated January 1874, asking for information as to the system of taxing Beer or Malt in Foreign Countries, comprising America, France, Prussia, Russia, Austria and Hungary, Denmark, Belgium, Saxony, Wurtemberg, Darmstadt, the Netherlands, Bavaria, Sweden and Norway, Italy and Switzerland, he has taken them into consideration; and, whether, seeing that in nearly all those Countries (except Belgium) Beer brewed for domestic agricultural use is untaxed, and Malt may be freely used for the purpose of feeding Cattle without tax, he is prepared to adopt any measures for placing the British agriculturist on a footing of equality with his Foreign rivals (who compete with him in our markets) in the production of corn, meat, and dairy produce?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in reply, said, the subject had engaged his attention, and he had had communication with the Inland Revenue authorities, but had not been able to see his way to any arrangements by which any further facilities for the production of malt for feeding purposes could be given than were given at present, unless the Government were to change the whole system upon which the malt and beer duties were collected, and any such alterations must cause great loss to the Revenue.

NAVY—THE ARCTIC EXPEDITION—CHAPLAINS.—QUESTIONS.

MR. HANBURY TRACY asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, How many gentlemen forming a scientific staff have been nominated to accompany the Arctic Expedition; and, if, as in accordance with his statement, the cabin accommodation is too limited to enable him to appoint a chaplain, he will take into his consideration the desirability of cancelling the nomination of one of these scientific officials, so as to appoint a gentleman who might combine a special scientific qualification with that also of being in holy orders?

MR. HUNT: As there are several Questions on the Notice Paper relating to this subject for future days, and as it appears that considerable interest is taken in the matter, perhaps I may be allowed to give a rather fuller explanation than I could do by simply answering the Question of the hon. Gentleman. The Arctic Expedition is to consist of two ships, one to carry 62 men, and the other 59—that is, officers and men included. Those ships are intended to winter about 200 miles apart. None of Her Majesty's Ships carrying less than 170 men are provided with a chaplain. Nevertheless, considering the peculiar nature of the service, and the length of time during which the Expedition is likely to be away, I should have been glad to have treated the case specially, and to have appointed a chaplain to each ship; but the difficulty has arisen which always is experienced with regard to Arctic Expeditions—namely, a want of space. There is no instance, so far as I can learn, by a search of the history of these Expeditions, of any chaplain having been carried in an Arctic ship, except in 1821, when a gentleman who had been appointed Astronomer to a previous Expedition had, before the starting of the Expedition of 1821, taken orders. He was appointed Astronomer to the ship and chaplain also. Each ship is to carry stores and provisions for three years, and it may be well supposed that they occupy a considerable space. With regard to the ships that have been selected for the purpose, the space in their holds is considerably curtailed by the internal strengthening that they have received in the Dockyards in order to fit them to encounter the ice. In addition to that the usual compliment of officers for ships of this size has been supplemented in order to provide for the sledging parties. The calculation is that five sledging parties can be equipped from each ship, with an officer at the head of each party. Besides the extra number of executive officers we have appointed two doctors to each ship. That, of course, adds to the amount of accommodation required. The result is that room for only one scientific person can be found on board each ship; and my hon. Friend asks me whether the nomination of one of these gentlemen cannot be cancelled to allow a scientific chaplain to be taken instead. Supposing that were done with regard to one of the ships, we should still leave one ship without a chaplain, and the difficulty of complying with this suggestion is further enhanced by the fact that the scientific members of the Expedition were not selected by the Admiralty, but by the Royal Society, for their peculiar qualifications for the post. I have made inquiries of the Admiral Superintendent at Portsmouth, under whose direction the ships have been fitted out, as to the possibility of finding by any means room for a chaplain on board in addition to those who are intended to take part in the Expedition; and what he says is this—

"It would not be possible to do so without seriously encroaching upon the space required for provisions and stores."

The fact is that every cubic foot of space has been appropriated in the most exact manner for different purposes connected with the Expedition. I think my hon. Friend and the House will see that, under these circumstances, the difficulty of appointing a chaplain to the Expedition is very great.

MR. CHILDERS: May I ask how many naval officers are appointed to each ship?

MR. HUNT: There will be a captain and commander on board the foremost ship, and a captain on board the second ship; four lieutenants and one sub-lieutenant besides in each ship, in addition to the engineers and medical officers.

IRELAND—AMERICAN RIFLEMEN.

QUESTION.

MR. SULLIVAN asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, If his attention has been called to the fact that a number of American gentlemen intend visiting Ireland, in the coming summer, for the purpose of competing, on the part of America, in an international rifle-shooting match, and that some of the Irish municipalities, and the Irish people in general, are anxious to accord to those representatives of American riflemen a cordial and hearty welcome; whether it is true that immediately on landing in Queenstown those gentlemen will be liable to arrest and imprisonment for having and carrying their rifles without a licence from the police authorities; and, whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to present to those American gentlemen, immediately on landing, the requisite licence to have and carry their rifles while in Ireland?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: I have learnt, Sir, the fact that some gentlemen who are the representatives of rifle-shooting in America intend to visit Ireland in the summer for the purpose of engaging in an international shooting match, and I feel assured that all classes of Irishmen, including the Government, will give them, as the hon. Member states, a cordial and hearty welcome. Those gentlemen are doubtless law-abiding citizens in their own country, and as such will not be likely to break the laws of any country they may visit; therefore, they will no more render themselves liable to arrest and imprisonment for having rifles in their possession than the number of gentlemen, both English and Scotch, who annually visit Ireland for sporting purposes. I am not aware that any real inconvenience is caused to peaceful visitors to Ireland by the special provisions of the law of the country relating to arms; but if it should appear necessary, at the time, to make any special arrangement to secure that these gentlemen shall not be inconvenienced, the Government will be prepared to make it.

Mr. SULLIVAN begged to observe that the right hon. Gentleman had omitted to answer the most important part of his Question. According to law these gentlemen were liable to arrest on landing at Queenstown.

Sir MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: If they do not wilfully break the law they will not be liable to arrest.

Mr. SULLIVAN: I give Notice, Sir, that I shall put the Question in another form—namely, whether these gentlemen having their rifles in their trunks will not be wilfully breaking the law.

PARLIAMENT—PRIVILEGE—(PUBLICATION OF PROCEEDINGS OF FOREIGN LOANS COMMITTEE).

Mr. CHARLES LEWIS: Sir, the Notice Paper which has been distributed amongst hon. Members will have conveyed to their minds the reason why I venture to trouble them on the present occasion. The question I have to bring under their notice is one of Breach of Privilege, and I assure the House that I feel the utmost confidence, that when I come to the conclusion of the short statement I think it necessary to make, the House will be of opinion that although I may have interrupted their deliberations, it has been in the cause of right and justice. I think that at this time of day it would be an idle and ludicrous thing if any hon. Member were to get up and complain of a technical breach of those ordinary Rules of the House which are intended to produce good general results, but which are not intended to be enforced, unless in exceptional cases, when some great breach of them has been committed; but when the honour of a Member of this House is concerned—and indeed the dignity of the House itself—I am satisfied that I shall not appeal in vain for a patient hearing and an impartial consideration.

"It is not meet

That every nice offence should bear its comment"

in dealing with the Rules of this House, and if I had not to bring before the House the case of a Member, who is personally unconnected with myself, and with whom I was unacquainted until the other day, I should not have ventured to intrude myself upon the House. Sir, I venture to say that it is one of the well-established Rules of this House that in the case of a Select Committee, no person outside that Committee has any right to print or circulate evidence which is in course of being taken and on which that Committee has not deliberated. It is not necessary to quote an authority for that proposition; but so late as the 21st of April, 1837, it was resolved by this House—

"That, according to the undoubted privileges of this House, and for the due protection of the public interest, the evidence taken by any Select Committee of this House, and the documents presented to such Committee, and which have not been reported to the House, ought not to be published by any Member of such Committee, nor by any other person."

And, Sir, that Resolution has not remained unexercised, or unused. I believe there are precedents in the Journals of the House having exercised its plenary authority of imprisonment on those who have offended in this respect. It will be in the recollection of every one here that very early in the Session a Committee was appointed on a subject which engrossed a great deal of public interest—the subject of the way in which certain Foreign loans were effected in the English market by divers Governments, especially in connection with certain South American Republics, and the transactions connected therewith. A large part of the community had had great reason to complain, if not of positive fraud, still of transactions that savoured very much of it. Upon the occasion of that Committee being moved for, I took the liberty of making a few observations in furtherance of the views of the hon. and learned Gentleman who proposed it (Sir Henry James). I was aware that considerable anxiety was felt by many not undistinguished Members of this House as to what the result might be of appointing a Select Committee to fulfil a new and delicate duty; but I confess I never thought that, when that Committee had sat not more than five or six times, an instance of grave doubts on the part of hon. Members as to the expediency and propriety of entering upon so delicate, if not dangerous, a task would have to be presented to the House in the interests of substantial justice, and for the purpose of vindicating the honour of an hon. Member of the House. On the 22nd March last, the hon. Member for Gravesend (Captain Bedford Pim) was examined. I happened to be present during part of that examination, and I will only say of it that it was at least a very strong sort of examination.

MR. LOWE: I rise to Order. As Chairman of that Committee, Sir, I must request your opinion as to whether it is competent to the hon. Gentleman to go in full House into the matters that pass within that Committee before they have reported to the House?

MR. SPEAKER: It is not competent to the hon. Member to refer to matters which have arisen in the Committee. The hon. Gentleman should adhere as strictly as possible to the matter he wishes to bring before the House, which I understand to be that The Times and Daily News newspapers have published articles which he considers to constitute a breach of Privilege. The proper course would be that those articles should be read by the Clerk at the Table, and the hon. Member, in raising the question of Privilege, should confine himself to the points raised in those articles.

MR. CHARLES LEWIS: Perhaps I went a little beyond the point that I intended to raise. I merely wished to let the House know as a matter of fact that Captain Bedford Pim was examined on the 22nd of March.

MR. LOWE: I rise to Order again. I submit that if the hon. Gentleman is allowed to go into this, it will be expected from me that I should answer him, and I maintain that it is entirely contrary to my duty to answer him upon anything done by the Committee while the delegation continues. When it is over, of course the House can go into it.

MR. CHARLES LEWIS: I will proceed, Sir, at once to the complaint I have to make. It is that in The Times of the 9th instant and in The Daily News of the same day, under the heading of "The Committee of Foreign Loans," it is stated that the Committee had sat the day previously, and the evidence taken before the Committee is then set out. It is also stated that Mr. Lowe said, he had received a letter in French from M. Herran, the Honduras Minister at Paris, which was read to the Committee in English by Mr. Kirkman Hodgson. To this letter, and especially to the opening paragraph of it, I will call special attention. The letter commenced—

"Paris, April 7, 1875.

"To the Right Honourable Robert Lowe,
"Chairman of the Committee on "Foreign Loans, London.

"Sir,—Absent from Paris more than a month, I returned only the day before yesterday, and could not at an earlier period reply to the attacks of Mr. Bedford Pim, which are reported in the journals, The Times and The Daily News, of the 23rd of March last. Although I am not fond of controversy, I cannot pass over in silence the false and calumnious allegations of Mr. Bedford Pim, who is unable to pardon me for having done my duty in preventing him from emitting a loan of £2,000,000 in Paris, on the 26th of December, 1872, under the false title of Special Commissioner of Honduras. I say 'false title' because he was never named by the Government, and besides, the guarantees which he offered were illusory and without value, considering that the domains and forests, like all the other revenues of the State, were already hypothecated for the purposes of the first two loans, English and French, say for £3,000,000. Mr. Bedford Pim declares that if I prevented the loan, it was because he was unwilling to consent to give me £40,000 for myself, and £16,000 for the Consul General, sums which we had caused to be demanded of him, says he, by the mediation of Messrs. Dreyfus Frères, the bankers, and he adds that if he did not consent to give this sum it was because such an act was alien from the habits of English sailors, I will ask Mr. Pim if the end he sought, to draw to himself from the savings of the French nation, without legal authorization, £2,000,000, is according to him one of the habits of English sailors. I leave to the Committee the decision on this point.

"The house of Dreyfus Frères, quoted by Mr. Pim, with the object of giving to his declaration an air of veracity, is not known to me. I defy him to prove that I have ever had direct or indirect relations with it.

"As to the charge of having denounced him to the French Police to procure his imprisonment, there is no word of truth in it, but it suited Mr. Pim to present himself before his countrymen as a martyr. Encouraged by the marks of sympathy which he obtained at the London Tavern on the 10th of January, 1873, when he roused his complaisant audience against me, he thought he could continue with impunity to play his rôle of calumniator against the agents who performed their duty strictly and honourably, and serve as the salaried instrument of those who ruined an international work calculated to render immense services to commerce all over the world—such is the part played by Mr. Pim. As for the £70,000 sterling which Mr. Pim says he paid for the arrears of interest on the French Loan with the funds coming from the English Loan of 1870, that is impossible, seeing that the dividends of the French Loan were always regularly paid with the money coming from the Paris Loan, of which the following is a proof.

"In July, 1870, Messrs. Bischoffsheim and Co. received in bonds and money the amount of the French Loan, 28,808,800*fr.*, and Messrs. Waring Brothers, contractors, had received in March 1,543,275*fr.*, making in all 30,352,075*fr.*, on undertaking to carry out the agreement come to between the Government of Honduras, Messrs. Bischoffsheim, and Waring, on the 2nd of July, 1870. I write this to show that the declaration of Mr. Pim is erroneous on this part as on all others.

"That Mr. Pim did not remain longer in prison is through my intervention with his Excellency Lord Lyons, with whom I interested myself to bring him out on the day on which he wrote the letter enclosed.

"When Mr. Pim naïvely declares that he resigned his post as Special Commissioner of Honduras because he could not obtain my dismissal from the Government, that proves that my Government did never nominate him, but had estimated him at his true value. Besides the official decree of the 1st of March, 1873, of the President, approves my conduct, and declares that Mr. Pim has never been Special Commissioner, and that no one had the power or right to appoint him.

"I believe I have sufficiently refuted the defamatory and calumnious attacks of Mr. Bedford Pim, and counting on your well-known impartiality, I have the honour to beg you to cause my letter to be published in The Times and The Daily News. Accept the assurances of, &c.,

"VICTOR HERRAN,

"Honduras Minister in Paris.

"P.S.—If you should desire other information, I shall make it my duty to furnish it to you. I put myself entirely at your disposal."

Now, Sir, I have drawn the attention of the House to the fact that the proceedings of the Committee have been published in The Times and The Daily News of April 9. I have read what gives point to this—that, under the guise of the publication of the inchoate and incomplete proceedings of this Committee, a document has been printed and circulated all over the world which, I venture to say, is as great a libel as ever was published, and upon which, but for the cover thrown over it as being part of the proceedings of the Committee, a criminal indictment would lie. Is not this a case in which the House should inform itself how it came to pass that this letter passed bodily into these two newspapers? On looking into the other newspapers I discover that they give merely a summary of it. By the action of the two papers in question, therefore, evidence given by Captain Pim before the Committee on oath is allowed to be contradicted in the outer world, by means of the public Press, in a letter written from Paris, without any means of identifying the writer, without any verification of the signature, without the writer submitting himself to examination or cross-examination, although the accusations of the letter are directed against a Member of this House, and charge him with falsehood in his testimony and iniquity in his conduct. Is it right that such statements should be put forth in such a manner, in contravention of the testimony of a Member of this House? In dealing with this matter I should like to act in accordance with the precedent adopted on a similar occasion, as recorded in the Journals of this House. I should like to call the printers of The Times and The Daily News to the bar of this House, and to ask them from whom did they receive this document which enabled their newspapers to print this letter at full length all over the world? I desire to ascertain who are the real offenders in this matter who have circulated these libels broadcast over the world. The letter contains a charge of personal and pecuniary fraud against the hon. Member for Gravesend, and there is a direct allegation of falsehood made against him. The hon. Member has therefore been libelled by two newspapers in doing that which by itself might have been brought under notice as a breach of Privilege. Therefore, I say, we ought to have these gentlemen here in order that we may ascertain who is responsible for the setting in motion this libel, what foundation there is for it, and why the proceedings of the Committee have been published. What is the foundation for the Rule of the House that the evidence taken by Select Committee shall not be published before their Reports are laid on the Table of the House? It is a rule of convenience and a rule of justice: of convenience, because delicate and important matters are considered which ought not to be laid before the public in an incomplete and ragged way, so that the statements and allegations made before the Committees should not be published to the world until the whole state of the case has been ascertained. It is well that the conventional rule in these cases should be observed, for it is the rule of simple justice. From the first day the Committee sat until now the inquiry was—

MR. SPEAKER reminded the hon. Gentleman that he was now referring to what had taken place before the Committee, and was therefore transgressing the Rule of the House.

MR. CHARLES LEWIS: At all events, I may be allowed to say that the object of the Committee was to inquire into transactions of a very delicate nature, which itself made the Rule of the House a rule of convenience and of justice. It is not necessary for me to do more than to say that I have pointed out what the Rule of the House is. I have pointed out also that that Rule has been broken, and that in breaking it a most serious injury has been done, at all events for a time, to a Member of this House. Under these circumstances, Sir, I beg leave, first of all, to move that the Clerk at the Table do read the commencement and end of the reports which appeared in The Times and The Daily News newspapers, on the 9th April instant, of the proceedings and evidence taken before the Select Committee on Foreign Loans on the 8th instant, in breach of the privileges of this House, in order that we may have proof before us of what facts were presented in those reports.

[Complaint made by Mr. Charles Lewis, Member for Londonderry, of the publication in "The Times" and "Daily News" newspapers on the 9th April instant of the proceedings and evidence taken before the Select Committee on Foreign Loans on the 8th instant, in breach of the privileges of this House.]

MR. SPEAKER: Will the hon. Member bring the articles up to the Table?

[Copies of those newspapers put in, and extracts proving the publication of the Proceedings and Evidence of the Select Committee on the 8th instant read.]

MR. CHARLES LEWIS then moved—

"That the publication in 'The Times' and 'Daily News' newspapers on the 9th April instant of the proceedings and evidence taken before the Select Committee on Foreign Loans on the 8th instant is in each case a breach of the privileges of this House."

MR. BIGGAR seconded the Motion.

Question proposed.

MR. W. M. TORRENS said: I should like, Sir, for my own information and those around me, to be allowed to put a question to the Chairman of the Committee, though not as regards any of the subjects considered in that Committee, or of the manner of their consideration—the delicacy regarding which has been so well brought to the recollection of the House by you, Sir, within the past few minutes—but before we call, or are asked to call, two great organs of public opinion before us, evidently with purposes of disfavour and with the intention of rebuking their presumption, I think we owe it to ourselves to know whether they have been tempted into a disregard of the old practice of the House by any circumstances which may have arisen in the conduct of the Committee. That I may not be misunderstood, I wish, on the authority of a right hon. Gentleman with whom I have been in communication in the last few minutes, to ask whether provision is not made in the Select Committee room, by the usual accommodation of tables, chairs, and stationery, for the reporters of The Times and The Daily News; and whether they have not frequently, if not continuously, exercised their vocation with the knowledge, cognizance, and, presumably, with the sanction of the Committee. When that question has been answered, it will be time enough to consider whether that is a variation from the old practice. All I can say is this, that having sat upon Select Committees frequently in past Parliaments, I never saw such provision made; and although I have known incidentally that the old rule of exclusion has been evaded, I have never known the fact brought to the cognizance of the Select Committee of which I was a Member, nor do I know of a Committee of the nature of that which is now sitting, in which the rule has been disregarded. My question, therefore, will be—if I am permitted to put it to the Chairman of the Committee—whether it is the case that the public Press has been, with his sanction and cognizance, constantly present during the whole of the evidence taken before him, and whether the Committee have not been aware that the proceedings were reported de die in diem in the London Press?

Question,

"That the publication in 'The Times' and 'Daily News' newspapers on the 9th April instant of the proceedings and evidence taken before the Select Committee on Foreign Loans on the 8th instant is in each case a breach of the privileges of this House," put, and—a few voices declaring for the "Noes"—agreed to.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That Mr. Francis Goodlake, the printer of 'The Times' newspaper, do attend at the Bar of this House on Friday next, at half-past Four o'clock."—(Mr. Charles Lewis.)

MR. DISRAELI: Sir, I was somewhat surprised that the first Resolution moved by my hon. Friend the Member for Londonderry should have been questioned by any hon. Member of this House, and less surprised at the result, because, upon reflection, it is impossible to deny that there has been a clear breach of Privilege in the publication which he has brought under our consideration. But, Sir, the feelings with which we approach the second Resolution of my hon. Friend are of a different character. In what spirit do we approach the consideration of the conduct brought before us? It is not one of vengeance for the breach of Privilege which has been committed, because we acknowledge by the practice of this House—the courtesy of this House at least—that that act which has been described to-night—and been justly and technically described—as a breach of Privilege—is one which, if discreetly and properly exercised, is very conducive to the public benefit and not at all injurious to the honour of this House. But, Sir, there can be no doubt that when the honour of an individual Member of this House is impugned by means of this machinery it does become this House—and it is the duty of the House—fairly and candidly to consider the state of the facts before it. There is no doubt that a libel has been printed and has been circulated in these newspapers against the conduct and character of a Member of this House, and it is our duty to take notice of such a circumstance when it is brought before us. But if the object of summoning the printers of these newspapers before us be only to ascertain the means by which this publication—this offensive publication took place—we must remember that it may be possible by other means to obtain the information that is required, and if it be in the power of any Gentlemen who are Members of this House to throw light on the conduct which is in question, I think that, instead of bringing to the Bar of the House these honest and innocent people, who were exercising a function which is beneficial to the public—I think that instead of putting them through the trouble of being summoned before the Bar of this high Assembly, it would be better if we can to obtain the information which is the only object in view, by other means; and I submit to you, Sir, that is a course which is highly desirable. Now, Sir, there are circumstances upon the surface of this narrative which I believe are not questioned, and which seem to point out that there are other means in this House of obtaining that information. We know that this libel was addressed to the Chairman of the Committee—we know that there were directions in the letter regulating the mode by which the desired publication of the libel should take place—and we know that the publication of the libel occurred exactly in the manner desired by the writer. And if there be any Member of the Committee, from the Chairman himself to those who have been least interested in the conduct of this investigation—if they have any information in their possession which can throw light upon the question, and which can at once inform the House by what means this publication occurred—I think it is not desirable that we should support the second Resolution of my hon. Friend.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: I think, Sir, that any surprise that may have been felt as to the manner in which the first Resolution was received by a portion of the House might have been removed if the right hon. Gentleman had thought fit to give the benefit of his opinion and advice at an earlier moment. Upon further consideration, I think that the House arrived at a just decision in assenting to what is, in fact, evidently a truism—that a breach of Privilege has been committed in this case, as in many other cases, in the publication both of the debates of this House and the evidence taken before Committees. The right hon. Gentleman appears to think that there is greater doubt about the Resolution now submitted to the House, and that the necessity of summoning the printers of these newspapers to attend at the Bar may be obviated by the House—that the House may obtain the desired information by other means. I can only understand the observations just made by the right hon. Gentleman as an invitation to my right hon. Friend the Member for the University of London (Mr. Lowe) to state what he knows of these circumstances in his character as Chairman of the Committee. Now, Sir, my right hon. Friend has not risen, and I believe does not intend to rise, to make any statement to the House on the question, because he does not think that it is his duty as Chairman of the Committee, and does not think that it would tend to promote the object for which the Committee was appointed, were he to transgress the ordinary Rules of the House, which prevent discussion of a matter that is yet pending before a Committee of this House. When the proceedings of that Committee are at end my right hon. Friend will have no objection to answer for anything, or give any information to the House, as to what has taken place in the Committee, or to defend any conduct for which he, as Chairman of the Committee, may be responsible. But my right hon. Friend does not think that he would be justified, or that it would be desirable that he should enter into any discussion whatever at the present time as to the proceedings which have taken place in the Committee. Therefore, Sir, if the House desires that any information should be obtained as to the libel which is said to have been incidentally committed by the publishers of these newspapers, I presume that the right hon. Gentleman will object to the Motion that the printers be summoned to the Bar of the House. I am not a lawyer, and I cannot therefore pretend to give to the House any authoritative opinion upon the subject; but as to one observation which fell from the hon. Member for Londonderry as to what is said to be the protection which publishers of newspapers enjoy from actions for libel on account of their reports being backed by what takes place within the walls of the Committee-room, I should doubt very much whether the publication of a libel which is a breach of Privilege, and is declared by the House to be a breach of Privilege, would be any protection to the publishers of these newspapers; and whether the hon. Member would not be at liberty to take any proceedings he pleases, just as if this House had taken no action in the matter. But, as I have said, I am not a lawyer, and I am not able to advise the House in the matter. Before the House decides, however, upon this point, and comes to the conclusion that it is necessary to strain the acknowledged practice—the acknowledged though seldom used practice—against the publishers of newspapers, it would do well to consider whether the hon. Member for Gravesend has really any practical grievance to complain of for which he has not a remedy in the ordinary way. Not having observed that this discussion was likely to take place to-day, I am not able to refer the House to any precedents; but it appears to me that, whatever decision the House may hereafter come to, it would be extremely inconvenient to enter into the discussion of matters that are before the Committee while the proceedings of the Committee have not yet come to an end.

Mr. BIGGAR wished to explain why he had seconded the Motion of the hon. Member for Londonderry. It seemed to him only fair that when some one had acted in an improper manner by charging the hon. Member for Gravesend—with whom he had never had any personal communication—with very gross fraud and with perjury, without offering himself for cross-examination, the matter should not be allowed to drop. It was he thought the duty of the House to protect the honour of its Members from attacks of that sort, and, therefore, he had seconded the Motion.

Mr. WATKIN WILLIAMS: It is with extreme reluctance, Sir, that I take part in this debate, but as a Member of the Committee to which reference is made and one who may be said to have the least possible interest in it, I cannot refrain from making a few observations on the Motion before the House. I must respectfully protest against the Motion, and will give my reasons for doing so. The Motion is, that the printers of two newspapers shall be summoned to the Bar of this House to answer for a breach of Privilege, and a libel upon one of its Members. The hon. Member who has submitted this Motion has stated with a frankness that I did not anticipate, that his object in making it is not the direct one of punishing these persons who have been guilty of the breach of Privilege—that he disavowed—but an ulterior and indirect object of attacking others on whom he says the responsibility really lies. I protest respectfully against that course; because, if the desire of the hon. Member is to attach responsibility to others why does he not do in a direct manner what this Motion seeks to do in an indirect manner? But I venture to say also that in the public interest it is most undesirable that, after six weeks' inquiry the proceedings of this Committee should be in any way checked or interfered with. It might have been at one time a question whether it was advisable that this Committee should be appointed—that is a fair question, and one upon which I at one time doubted much; but this Committee having been appointed, is this House to stultify itself by listening to indirect attacks from right and left tending to bring the proceedings of the Committee to a futile and premature conclusion? No Member of this House can have failed to observe that attempts have been made to frustrate and interfere with the proceedings of the Committee. I venture to say—if I am not going beyond what is right on this subject—that the more strenuous are these efforts to prevent our proceedings, the more determined and resolute we shall be to prosecute our investigation to a just result. But the hon. Member who has submitted this Motion tells us that his object is not to punish the printers of The Times and The Daily News—these innocent people, as the Prime Minister has described them—but that his object is to reach those whom this Motion does not appear to touch. Is the House, I ask, to lend itself to the bringing up of innocent persons, for the purpose of indirectly attacking others whom those who are interested in this Motion would not dare to attack openly? If we abuse our powers, why is not a Motion made to discharge the Committee from further proceeding, when the whole subject could be brought forward, when our tongues would be loosed, and we could defend ourselves and vindicate our conduct? If it can be shown that any Member of the Committee has been guilty of a breach of Privilege in assisting the Press to publish its proceedings, why is not that Member challenged in a fair and direct manner? I cannot, therefore, reluctant as I have been to enter into this debate, resist making this protest, and respectfully warning the House to see that they may not, in an indirect way—by a pretence of attacking The Times and The Daily News—provide the means of crippling the proceeding of the Committee and frustrating the object with which it was appointed.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: I hope, Sir, before we go to a division we shall have a distinct statement from the Government as to the course they advise the House to take upon the Motion before it, because as I understood the Prime Minister—his language was rather ambiguous—he said he disapproved of the Motion, if its object could be accomplished in any other way. Therefore, I should like to know whether the object has been accomplished in another way; and, if not, what course he means to take. Now, Sir, this is a motion of a very serious character, because it affects the relations between the Press and the House of Commons—the most important question, perhaps, that appertains to the public life of England. Now, Sir, that a breach of Privilege, technically, has been committed in the Committee-room cannot be doubted; and if I were to turn my eyes to the right or to the left—which I shall be very careful not to do—I am afraid that I should observe that that breach of Privilege is being committed at this very moment, and that a breach of Privilege will be committed to-morrow morning when the speech of the right hon. Gentleman appears in The Times and The Daily News. But will a Motion be therefore made to summon the printers of those journals to the Bar of the House for a breach of Privilege?—because the breach of Privilege is not in the character of what is printed, but in the fact that anything has been printed at all. This breach of Privilege is not because what is published is a libel at all, but because our proceedings have been published. I should like to ask any Gentleman forming part of a responsible Government—responsible to the country for the relations between the Press and the House of Commons—to tell me what is the difference between a report of proceedings in a public Committee-room and a report of the proceedings in this House. If you intended that the proceedings of that Committee should be private, you ought not to have admitted the public or the reporters. It was open, I imagine, for any persons at any time to call attention to the fact that the public were admitted to that Committee-room, that they were there every day, and that there was a table provided at which reporters sat—to the knowledge of every Member of the House present—every day to make a report of the proceedings. But that course not having been taken, I think that now to turn round on the newspapers and say to their printers—“We will summon you to the Bar of the House for reporting the proceedings of that Committee—although everybody in it knows perfectly well that the Committee was open, and that day by day the proceedings would be reported”—would that be conduct worthy of the honour—I may say of the honesty—of the House of Commons? What a position we should be placed in! The proceedings of the Committee have been reported for over three weeks, and at the end of that time you turn round and profess to be astonished that a breach of Privilege should have been committed which you knew was being committed every day. If reporting the proceedings of the Committee was a breach of Privilege, why was it not taken notice of on the first day of these proceedings by the Government, by the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government, or by the hon. Gentleman who has made this Motion? Everybody knew the character of the investigation, and that it was a matter in which the public were deeply interested, and I should like to know why notice has not been taken of it until this moment—and that it is now taken notice of as a breach of Privilege?—because, as I have already said, the breach of Privilege is not in the character of the publication, but in the publication itself. I entirely agree with the Member for the Denbigh Boroughs (Mr. Watkin Williams)—that these Motions we hear day after day are the fruits of that “lobbying” which is going on outside to prevent inquiry into frauds which are a disgrace to any commercial community.

There is an influence, a pressure—there are social influences, commercial influences, and influences of every kind at work; the screw has been put on—the attack is made one day in one form, and another day in another form, but the object is always precisely the same. We have heard from the Home Secretary that the object of a Bill now before the House—the Artizans Dwellings Bill—is to do away with “rookeries.” Well, Sir, there are rookeries of the working classes; but the object of this Committee is to do away with rookeries of the commercial class. They are in a sense the same class of people as those who frequent the other rookeries of whom the right hon. Gentleman spoke; they live by the same nameless arts; and it is for the purpose of pulling down these rookeries and clearing them out, and possibly of obtaining a more respectable population, of more decent habits—[“Order!”]—that this Committee has been appointed—

MR. SPEAKER: I wish to point out that the hon. and learned Member is out of Order in discussing, on the present Motion, the object for which the Committee has been appointed.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: I am sorry if I was alluding to matters that are not germane to the Motion; but I hope I may be excused if, from the warmth with which I have spoken, I did so, and I apologize to the House. Referring to the Motion immediately before the House, I do think that unless there is some distinction drawn we shall find ourselves in an embarrassing position. I object to the Motion because it is put on the ground of libel. A statement may be uttered in the course of the debates in this House which, if it were not privileged by the fact that it was spoken in the House of Commons, might be held to be a libel; but would it not, if uttered, be published in The Times and The Daily News next morning? Let us know before we accept this Motion, what is the difference between a transaction which takes place in this room and a transaction which takes place—in a room up stairs? Because, unless I am mistaken, as long as they are sitting there the Committee is invested with all the powers which belong to the House below for purposes of this character. If you choose to appoint a Secret Committee, appoint a Secret Committee.

We have had Motions for Secret Committees—Motions which were not very favourably received by this House, and which I hope never will be—but if you appoint a Public Committee and admit the public and the reporters there, it appears to me to be a most extraordinary and unjustifiable proceeding to turn round on the newspapers and say—"You have done what you have no right to do; we will drag you to the Bar of this House for doing there that which we are extremely grateful to you for doing in this House." In these circumstances I, for one, if it be pressed to a division, will vote against the Motion of the hon. Member for Londonderry.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: The hon. and learned Member opposite (Sir William Harcourt) has, I think, taken a somewhat strong liberty with respect to Members of this House. He has assumed that a Member of this House—my hon. Friend the Member for Londonderry—has taken the matter up as the result of the "lobbying" which he says is going on outside, while, so far as appears on the face of it, the question that has been raised is purely a question of Privilege. I can say for myself that, so far from being subject to such influences, I did not know even the subject of the Motion until I entered the House this evening. I must say that I do not think my hon. and learned Friend has a right to expect, as he seems to do, that Members of the Government should read all those proceedings which are reported in the newspapers, so as to see when breaches of Privilege have been committed. I come, therefore, to the discussion and the consideration of this question solely upon what is before us; and from what is before us, it is perfectly clear that there has been, technically at all events, a breach of the Privileges of this House in the publication in these two newspapers of this particular letter which was certainly not in evidence before the Committee.

MR. LOWE: I rise to Order. The right hon. Gentleman is transgressing the limits of fair debate in this matter, because he is making assertions which it is not in my power to answer. If the right hon. Gentleman is allowed to make statements as to what passed before the Committee, and as to what was before them as evidence, and what was not before them as evidence, it is only fair that I should be allowed to answer them. Therefore, I put it to the House that the right hon. Gentleman, in the course he is taking, is out of Order.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: I wish to be in every respect correct. I am only referring to what has passed before the House and to what appears upon the face of the newspapers which have been read to us. According to what appears upon the face of those newspapers, this letter was not part of the evidence before the Committee; because it seems that the evidence taken before the Committee was taken upon oath, whereas this letter came by post to the Chairman of the Committee, and therefore did not form part of the evidence taken upon oath. What appears before the House is this—that a certain newspaper professing to report the proceedings before a Committee of this House—I dare say correctly enough—sets out a letter which it states was addressed to the Chairman of that Committee, which was not sanctioned by any oath nor by any witness, but appears to have reached him by post. That document contains statements alluding to an hon. Member of this House, and attributes to him conduct of a most disgraceful and unworthy character; and the hon. Member for Londonderry brings that document before us and complains that its publication in the newspapers is a breach of Privilege. It is not because we usually permit reports of the proceedings before our Committees to be published in the public Press that we should not take notice of technical breaches of Privilege when they involve abuses. We are not discussing the uses of this Committee, nor the benefit which the Press may confer upon the public by publishing the proceedings of this House or of its Committees; but our attention is directed to a particular circumstance—to the publication in a newspaper of a letter not in evidence before the Committee, but merely addressed to the Chairman by post. No answer has been given to the complaint of the hon. and learned Member against that publication. What was resolved by the House of Commons in 1837, when a similar question was brought before them? They resolved that, according to the undoubted Privileges of the House, the evidence taken by any Select Committee of the House, or any documents presented to such

Committee, but not reported to the House, ought not to be published by any Member of such Committee, or by any other person. This letter, which was a document presented to a Committee of this House, and not having been reported to this House, has been published by other persons—namely, the printers of these two newspapers; and, therefore, if the hon. Gentleman thinks it of importance to press for the appearance of these two persons at the Bar, I do not see any injustice in supporting his Motion.

MR. BENTINCK: I wish to make only one remark upon this question. There appears to be some little misunderstanding as to the object which the hon. and learned Member for Londonderry has in view in bringing this matter before the House. It has been objected to this Motion that the information he seeks to obtain can be acquired by other means than those he proposes to adopt. Having listened attentively to this debate, I venture to think that every possible suggestion has been made and every possible facility has been offered for having that information laid before the House; but it has not been thought proper by those who might have afforded that information to give it to the House. Therefore, under these circumstances, it appears to me that the hon. Member for Londonderry has no other course to adopt than to persevere in the Motion he has brought before us, which is the only means by which he can substantiate his position and justify any further proceedings.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU: I only wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman who sits as Chairman of the Committee a question whether the letter to which reference has been made was part of the evidence taken before the Committee or not? If it was, there has been clearly, technically a breach of Privilege; but if it were not in evidence, then the proper remedy for the hon. Member for Gravesend is to bring an action for libel in a Court of Law—and in doing so he will not be committing a breach of the Privilege of this House. My vote will depend upon the answer which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of London gives to my question.

tleman at the head of the Government that he thought the House had proceeded far enough in passing the first Resolution. We re-affirmed by that Resolution, what has often been affirmed before, that the publication of the proceedings of this House and of its Committees by the Press is a breach of Privilege. The House has always had the power of suspending the customary publication of evidence taken before its Committees, and it has exercised that power on proper, and I am afraid, sometimes, on improper, occasions. We all know that Committees have the power of deciding, as to any particular Committee, whether their sittings shall be open to the public or not; and the whole country would be startled were this House to order that henceforth no proceedings of Committees should be made public. Therefore, we are brought to this conclusion—that we have decided that the House has a right of preventing the publication of proceedings before its Committees when it thinks fit. But it generally permits it. There appears to be a strong opinion that in this case publicity was both desirable and necessary. I do not wish to say anything disrespectful to the House, but to outsiders it would seem absurd if, having acknowledged this, you were to call the printers of these two newspapers to the Bar of the House and were to rebuke them for what they have done. The hon. Member for Londonderry and one or two other hon. Members on the opposite side of the House appear to have a double motive in bringing forward this question—one of more importance than the other—one being that a breach of Privilege has been committed and the other the vindication of the character of the hon. Member for Gravesend. I do not think it has been suggested that in deciding upon the first of the questions so raised by the hon. Member we ought to be in any way influenced by the second. If we are to bring the printers of these newspapers before the House, it must be simply for breach of Privilege. Many other letters which were before the Committee besides the particular letter in question have been published in the newspapers; but, although their publication involves an equal breach of Privilege, no complaint has been made respecting their appearing in the newspapers. I am sorry to say that there is a difficulty in ascertaining who has not been libelled before this Committee—everybody seems to have charged everybody else with misconduct; and I dare say that if we were to read the evidence of the hon. Member for Gravesend we should find that he had said very unpleasant things respecting the writer of this letter from Paris. Is it not, therefore, better for us to stop here and to keep as closely as we can to the question of the breach of Privilege without going into the character of the hon. Member for Gravesend? If the newspapers have violated our rule, which we constantly think it right and convenient to suspend, we shall do better to limit ourselves to the Resolution which we have already passed, and not proceed further and ask these two gentlemen to appear at the Bar of the House to be reprimanded. In making these observations, I believe I am speaking in accordance with the sentiments of the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Disraeli). If the hon. and learned Gentleman does divide the House, I shall certainly vote against his proposition.

MR. DISRAELI: I wish to say, in explanation, that the right hon. Gentleman opposite has quite misunderstood me. Inasmuch as the information that I think ought to be given to the House has not been given, I shall support the Motion of the hon. Member for Londonderry.

MR. CHARLES LEWIS: I have one word to say in vindication of myself. I must protest against the extraordinary suggestions that have been made by the hon. and learned Member for the Denbigh Boroughs and by the hon. and learned Member for Oxford, who have spoken in a way that induces me to think they have got foreign loans upon the brain. They do not appear to be able to deal with any one who does not go the full length with them without imputing to him indirect and unworthy motives. I say emphatically that as regards myself there is not a particle or grain of truth in the motives they have attributed to me, and the hon. and learned Member for Denbigh Boroughs who knows me had no right to impute them to me.

MR. WATKIN WILLIAMS: I know nothing of the hon. Member, and I only referred to what the hon. Member himself said to-night. I understood him to say that his object was not to punish these gentlemen, but to gain another object—namely, to obtain information from them when they appeared at the Bar, whether some Member of the Committee was not responsible for the publication complained of.

MR. CHARLES LEWIS: The hon. and learned Member appears to me to have gone beyond what I have stated to-night by imputing motives to me. The hon. and learned Member for Oxford, in his wonderful way of approaching questions of this sort, asks, why has not this question of the breach of the Privileges of the House in publishing the proceedings of its Committees been brought before us every day? I will tell him why. It is because we do not see libels published as part of the proceedings of those Committees every day. My complaint is that, under shelter of the proceedings before a Committee of this House, the hon. Member for Gravesend has been attacked and vilified; and what is unsatisfactory to my mind is that, although the right hon. Member for the University of London has been half-a-dozen times upon his legs, he has been silent on the real question before the House. I should have been happy to put myself into the hands of Her Majesty's Government and to have withdrawn my Motion had a scintilla of information been forthcoming as to the way in which this letter reached the newspapers. As the case stands, a Member of this House has been grossly libelled, and yet no sort of satisfaction can be obtained. On Friday last I gave Notice of a Question upon the very subject. I was told I was out of Order. But we had not then the information which has been vouchsafed to-day. It is not with a view to any ridiculous vindication of the privileges of this House by inflicting a punishment on these worthy gentlemen the printers of The Times and Daily News, but because it is the only way by which the House can get at the bottom of this matter, that I ask that these gentlemen be called upon to appear at that Bar; and when they are there I shall ask them, in accordance with the precedents on the Journals of the House, "From whom, if from anyone, did you receive that letter?" Not only do I intend to proceed to a division, but I venture to say there will be no mistake on the part of the public Press as to the attitude assumed by this House. It is not for the purpose of preventing the publication of reports or of stifling inquiry, or of bringing the present investigation to a hasty conclusion, but for the purpose of preventing those reports from being made the means of disseminating libels broadcast over the country, that I proceed to a division, and in doing so I thoroughly believe that I shall be supported by a large majority.

MR. STEPHEN CAVE: As a Member of the Committee, I decline, whether regular or irregular, to sit still under an imputation of having acted in an unworthy or mysterious manner. As to whether any one furnished copies of this letter to either of the newspapers named, I cannot say, because I do not in the least know. But this I can say—that the Committee Room has every day been crowded by Members of the House and by others, and under the circumstances it was only natural to suppose that what happened at the meetings of the Committee would be more or less correctly communicated to the public. This being so, the same thing was done which has been done in connection with many other Committees of which I have been a Member—that is to say, reporters were tolerated in the room. I say “tolerated,” because, of course, it was in the power of the Committee to exclude them. It was thought better that what occurred before the Committee should go forth correctly through the medium of the regular reporters than that it should go forth incorrectly through the medium of notes taken by other persons who might be in the room. So far with regard to the presence of reporters—which, I repeat, was nothing new, being a thing common at Committees. Then comes the question which has been asked—Was this letter part of the evidence before the Committee? It has always seemed to me that the course taken in appointing this Committee was a difficult and dangerous one. After its appointment it had to be determined whether it was necessary or expedient to examine witnesses on oath. For myself, I confess I was of opinion that it would be better not to do so; but it was decided to do it.

MR. SPEAKER: The right hon. Gentleman is not in Order in the remarks he is now making.

MR. STEPHEN CAVE: It is very difficult to discuss this matter without transgressing the strict rules regulating our proceedings. I may, however, add that this letter which has been referred to was tendered to the Committee as evidence, and I understood, and I still understand, that, in common with the rest of the evidence, it was taken down by the reporters who were in the room. It has been said that there was something underhand or mysterious, but I can only say that I do not believe it and that if there has been I know nothing of it. My object in rising was simply to clear myself from any imputation of having acted in a manner unworthy of a Member of this House, or of having, as a Member of the Committee, assented in any way to any course which could be considered irregular.

MR. HORSMAN: Without expressing any opinion as to the merits of this question, I wish to say a word as to the course of our proceedings. A Motion has been carried declaring that a breach of Privilege has been committed. It was open to any Member of the House to object to that Motion. There were various modes of setting it aside. The “Previous Question” might have been moved. For my part, I expected that that would be done. It was not done, and the House unanimously agreed to the Motion that there has been a breach of Privilege. By that decision the House has either gone too far or not far enough. There is no precedent for voting that a breach of Privilege has been committed and not following that up by calling the person who has committed the breach of Privilege to the Bar. Every Member must have known that if the first Motion passed unanimously it was only a matter of course that the second should pass unanimously. [“No!”] I regret very much that these printers should be called to the Bar; but, however much I may regret, it is too late now to object to it, and therefore, having voted for the first Motion, I must vote also for the present Motion.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That Mr. William King Hales, the printer of ‘The Daily News’ newspaper, do attend at the Bar of this House on Friday next, at half-past Four o'clock."—(Mr. Charles Lewis.)

MR. RATHBONE: Before we proceed to decide this question I wish to call the attention of the House to the fact that the Prime Minister in addressing the House, as I understood him, distinctly stated that if the information could be obtained in any other way he should not counsel the hon. Member for Londonderry to divide the House. He has now received that information from an authority which he must consider undoubted—from a Member of his own Ministry. I should like to know on what grounds he still thinks it necessary to call the printers to the Bar of this House.

LAW OF SLANDER.—RESOLUTION.

SIR WILLIAM FRASER, in rising to call attention to the Law relating to Slander; and to move, "That, in the opinion of this House, the Law relating to Slander requires amendment," said: Mr. Speaker, after the opinions given this afternoon by some of the ablest Members of this House in the debate which has just terminated, I hesitate to express, even, in the humblest manner, my views on the subject of slander. The point to which I wish to direct the attention of the House is simple, but important. I will not enter upon the broad question what is slander, and what is not. I use the generic term slander; but it is the specific form of slander known as libel on which I shall comment. I will not relate the views of eminent persons in the last, nor present century; I will not repeat the opinions of Lord Mansfield, nor describe the legislation of Lord Campbell. I shall be glad, Sir, to know from the Attorney General, whether the law which protects our property, in some smaller degree our persons, and in some degree our reputation, enables us at present to protect the memory of those who have been dear to us; whether by the present law the son is able to guard the memory of his father or mother, the husband of his wife, the wife of her husband? It would not become me to give a decided opinion as to the precise state of the law; especially as some of the wisest Judges that have sat upon the Bench have not been very clear on the subject. I am induced to think that the law is not sufficiently strong, from the fact that for 80 years no attempt has been made to proceed by indictment against one who has slandered the dead. The last case recorded is that of the King v. Topham. Topham was the editor of a newspaper called The World, and he published very gross libels against George, Earl Cowper, deceased. He was tried before Judge Buller and a jury, and was convicted. An appeal was made against the judgment, and Lord Kenyon as Chief Justice reversed the decision of the Court below. In delivering his judgment Lord Kenyon quoted Lord Mansfield—

"Where the act is in itself unlawful (as in this case) the proof of justification or excuse lies on the defendant; and in failure thereof the law implies a criminal intent."

Lord Kenyon also refers to Sir Edward Coke, who says that—

"Defamation of the dead is libellous as stirring up the family to revenge, and to break the peace."

He (Lord Kenyon) reverses the judgment of the Court below, because, not that the libel did not tend to a breach of the peace, but that it was not so stated in the indictment. This point is most important; for the decision of Lord Kenyon has been quoted as if he had reversed the judgment, because the libel did not tend to a breach of the peace. No attempt has been made, I believe, since that date, 1791, to remedy the wrong done to a dead person by indictment. Lord Kenyon followed up his decision with these words—

"To hold that, even after ages are passed, the conduct of bad men cannot be contrasted with good, would be to exclude the best part of history."

This, Sir, seems to me a judicial truism; and is not to the point; for it cannot be applied to the case of a man who has recently died. Sir Edward Coke, to whom Lord Kenyon referred, had tried a case of a man, who certainly bolder than most persons, had dared to libel two Archbishops of Canterbury at once. Sir Edward Coke stated that, if a libel was made against a public or private person, it was punishable if the person might be dead at the time of making the libel, because it stirred up the relatives of the person libelled to a breach of the peace; but in the case tried before him (Sir Edward Coke) it is doubtful whether the person convicted was so convicted for the libel on the Archbishop deceased or the living Archbishop, so that whatever Sir Edward Coke's opinion may be worth, and, as we know, he was most eminent as a lawyer, it cannot be said that he, by this decision, made the point clear. I believe, Sir, that the law of libel might be without difficulty extended to the defamation of the dead as well as of the living; either by declaring the present law to have such operation; or by a fresh enactment. I make this suggestion at a time when our public men cannot be accused of too great sensitiveness to criticism. If ever there was a time when men were freely criticized it has been in the generation in which we live. What must be the sensation of a statesman on taking up an illustrated periodical week after week for 20 years, to see himself hebdomadally depicted in some grotesque attitude, doing something he has never done, from some motive he has never thought of, I know not. It may be that, like the slave in the Capitol, these pictures whisper in his ear "Thou art mortal." In these days not only do we live in glass houses, but under a magnifying glass of the most powerful sort. One of the most remarkable features of the newspaper intelligence of the present day is the London correspondent of the provincial Press. This wonderful and mysterious being is evidently present at Cabinet Councils, and dines with an Archbishop or a Chief Justice at least once a-week. He not only tells us what we have done, but informs us of what we are going to do. I venture to read to the House a short specimen which I happened to see lately, "The appearance of the right honourable gentleman is that of a market-gardener out for a Sunday walk." The writer is perfectly impartial in his criticisms, and goes from side to side of this House. "Colonel So-and-so's clothes were evidently made for somebody else." While "Sir Somebody-o'-something's perennial pair of trousers would, if unstitched, suffice for the mainsail of a moderate-sized yacht." At the same time, we must admit that our generation has seen a great change for the better from the ferocious libels, pictorial and literary, of 40 years ago. Since the price of newspapers has been lowered a much better tone has pervaded public prints—I do not say post hoc propter hoc—but there can be no doubt that great good feeling, and good humour are shown in this respect. Most of us have had our biography written. We have not to wait until we go where we must all go sooner or later; but even in the tempting circumstances of a recent Parliamentary Election, neither ill-humour nor unfairness in the description given of us is to be detected when we enter this House; but there is one class of publication which has shown of late a great tendency to crop up; books written by men who vent their spleen against those whom they do not like; leaving behind them calumny and slander, to overhang either their victims, or their victims' children. These books inflict a great hardship and wrong. The memory of the best, as well as the worst of men is not spared. Men of the highest honour in private life and of conspicuous public virtue, once in their graves, are held up to their relatives and friends and to mankind in general as not honest, and not honourable. You are told in these books that the man whom you have for long years respected and admired was a worthless being. These writers say to you: "You think that statesman was honest, and that, misinterpreted during his life-time, he would be done justice to at his death: you are mistaken; you are ignorant; you are a fool; you thought the man a gentleman; I tell you he was a rogue! You think that his public life, his career were influenced by high minded self-denial! Believe nothing of the sort; he was selfish from first to last. You think that his private life was pure? Humbug! It was the contrary. I've bribed his valet, and I ought to know." Now this is no exaggerated description of the sort of book that appears periodically in English society. I will quote a case that has been sent to me since the Notice of this Motion appeared. A particular libel was published in a book, which I will not advertize by giving its name; suffice it to say that it was written by a wandering physician; a man who travelled about from watering place to watering place on the Continent; and instructed people as to their specific requirements. The person slandered penalty, on conviction for the crime of defamation of the dead, is by the Law of the 17th of May, 1819, imprisonment for not more than a year; or a fine of not more than 2,000 francs, or both. Now, Sir, I am the last person in this House, or out of it, to wish to interfere with due and wholesome publicity. I hope never to see the time when the affairs of State are conducted under the momentary impulse of fretful popularity: the ignorance of the present I despise; but I love the deep-thinking, far-seeing public opinion, the result of observation and of experience. It is this which has made our institutions so great and so sound. It is not the perfection of the mechanism that enables statesmen to conduct the government of this country; it is the oil of good sense that lubricates the machine; it is the sublime, I had almost said divine, give and take, which makes this Empire great and free. I would do nothing to check publicity. I would do nothing to prevent this public opinion bringing its admirable influence to bear upon public affairs. I believe that the alteration in the law which I suggest, after much thought, might be made without difficulty, certainly without clamour. Considering that the law is now imperfect, I sincerely hope that the Law Officers of the Crown may be able to take my view of the matter. I thank the House for the patience and good humour with which they have listened to me; and I have the honour to move the Resolution which stands on the Paper in my name.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That, in the opinion of this House, the Law relating to Slander requires amendment."—
(Sir William Fraser.)

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, that while he had listened with great pleasure to the amusing speech of the hon. and gallant Baronet, he was unable to give his assent to the Resolution which he proposed. The English law had always recognized that there might be slander of the memory of the dead as well as of the living. In an old legal work of authority, Hawkins's Pleas of the Crown, it was laid down that a libel was a malicious defamation, in printing or writing, tending to blacken either the memory of the dead or the reputation of the living. That, he believed, represented the real state of the law, and it was illustrated by the judgment of Lord Kenyon, in the case to which his hon. and gallant Friend had referred, and which had reference to a libel on the memory of Lord Cowper. Lord Kenyon then stated that such a publication might be made fairly and honestly; but, whether made sooner or later, if it were done with a malevolent purpose, to vilify the memory of a deceased person, and with a view to injure his posterity as in the case of R. v. Critchley, then it came within the rule stated by Hawkins, and was illegal, as being done with a view to break the peace. The indictment, however, in the case decided by Lord Kenyon, contained no allegation that the libel tended to lead to a breach of the peace, and judgment was arrested on that account; but there was nothing in the judgment of Lord Kenyon to indicate that an indictment would not lie in such a case, when the circumstances warranted it, and the law, he ventured to say, remained the same up to the present time. There could, however, be no doubt that the practice of preferring indictments with respect to slanders on the dead had fallen into desuetude, and it seemed to be the general feeling of the country that it was undesirable to prosecute proceedings of that character. It was, at the same time, his opinion that if ever a case should arise in which it should be deemed expedient to prefer an indictment in respect of slander upon the memory of the dead the present law would be found sufficient for the purpose. He thought it would, under these circumstances, be undesirable to make any alteration in it.

MR. NEWDEGATE believed that the present tendency of our Courts was to render the law of libel more stringent than it used to be, and until prosecutions for slanders such as those of which the hon. and gallant Member complained were instituted, and it was found that the law in such cases was insufficient, the House would, he thought, do wrong further to restrict publication. Increased restrictions might operate to destroy the most useful of all classes of publications—that of recent history.

MR. SANDFORD said, he thought it was perfectly clear that the hon. and gallant Member had brought forward his Motion for the purpose not of illustrating the defects in the law of slander, the pure and sensitive mind of Mr. Greville must admit that under such circumstances impropriety was very difficult, if not impossible. The King had no family circle; his wife was away, his daughter dead; and he must associate with some one. "Fame," as a brilliant writer has said, "is a thing of Party," and the fact was, that George IV. changed his political opinions, or at least the expression of his political views; and the whole tribe of slanderers was at once let loose upon him. As regards King William, whom Mr. Greville attempts to blacken without producing one fact to support his calumny, one would have thought that the jovial sailor-monarch, who, after 65 years of comparative obscurity, unexpectedly came to the Throne, would have escaped the censure of even so great a moralist as the author of this book. The anecdotes relating to this King are without exception thoroughly spoilt. Mr. Greville was not only a malicious man, but he must have been a dull one; and he contrived to remove the point from almost every story he tells. He relates that King William, in order to procure personal liberty for himself, did what Louis Philippe invariably did, and what I believe the Emperor of Russia does to this day; he thought that he could accustom the people, by walking alone, to his presence; and that in a few weeks he would not be molested by a crowd in the streets of London. Mr. Greville tells us that King William walked up St. James's Street; but he omits a story that I have known all my life; which I believe to be absolutely true; and which is very characteristic of the King. Entering Hoby's shop, which was then on the left side of St. James's Street going up, His Majesty ordered a pair of boots; the assistant who was in the shop did not know the King by sight, and said—"I beg your pardon, Sir, I have forgotten your name." William IV. replied—"Well, I am the King; I am down in your books as Duke of Clarence." That story shows a simple mind, and a very unaffected disposition; but there is one trait which I have always thought redounds very much to the credit of King William, and to his thoughtful consideration of others. When he was told a fact as disagreeable to monarchs as to the rest of mankind, that he must die; and learned that—one of his first questions was—

"Death lays his icy hands on Kings,"

"Shall I live over the 18th of June? I should be very sorry for the Duke of Wellington's dinners to be interrupted: the chain has never yet been broken since Waterloo, and I hope that I shall live long enough to enable the Duke to have his dinner on that day."

Now, Sir, if ever a true-hearted and chivalrous gentleman spoke, he spoke when he said those words; and cynicism itself can hardly point with a more unrelenting finger than when it indicates Mr. Greville attributing the persistence with which King William, on mounting the Throne, sought out every old friend to promote him, to obvious madness. There is one slander in this book, and one of the worst, not of the dead but of the living; a lady who is still alive, the widow of a gallant soldier; the mother of a most gallant soldier, who having drawn the attention of the judicial authorities to a half-witted forger is in this book—

SIR WILFRID LAWSON: Mr. Speaker, I rise to Order. The Motion upon the Paper is that the law of slander should be amended. I wish to ask whether the hon. Baronet is speaking to the Question?

MR. SPEAKER: I understand the hon. Baronet to be illustrating his arguments. I feel sure that I can trust to his discretion not to wander too far from the matter of debate.

SIR WILLIAM FRASER: Sir, I will not offend again. I was endeavouring to enliven a somewhat dry subject. I will read to the House the law on this subject of Germany and of France. By the Code of Law established in Germany, in 1870, section 189—

"Whoever slanders the memory of a person deceased, by stating a fact that would have lowered the deceased in public esteem if stated in his lifetime, shall be punished with imprisonment not exceeding six months; if with extenuating circumstances, a fine may be adjudged."

The prosecution can only be instituted by the parents, the children, or the wife of the deceased. In France it has been settled by the Court of Cassation, the highest tribunal in the country, by two decisions, one on the 24th of March, 1860, and the other on the 23rd of March, 1866, that the 13th Article of Law of the 17th of May, 1819, applies to calumny on the dead as well as on the living. The heirs of the deceased, or any one of them, can take action. The penalty, on conviction for the crime of defamation of the dead, is by the Law of the 17th of May, 1819, imprisonment for not more than a year; or a fine of not more than 2,000 francs, or both. Now, Sir, I am the last person in this House, or out of it, to wish to interfere with due and wholesome publicity. I hope never to see the time when the affairs of State are conducted under the momentary impulse of fretful popularity: the ignorance of the present I despise; but I love the deep-thinking, far-seeing public opinion, the result of observation and of experience. It is this which has made our institutions so great and so sound. It is not the perfection of the mechanism that enables statesmen to conduct the government of this country; it is the oil of good sense that lubricates the machine; it is the sublime, I had almost said divine, give and take, which makes this Empire great and free. I would do nothing to check publicity. I would do nothing to prevent this public opinion bringing its admirable influence to bear upon public affairs. I believe that the alteration in the law which I suggest, after much thought, might be made without difficulty, certainly without clamour. Considering that the law is now imperfect, I sincerely hope that the Law Officers of the Crown may be able to take my view of the matter. I thank the House for the patience and good humour with which they have listened to me; and I have the honour to move the Resolution which stands on the Paper in my name.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That, in the opinion of this House, the Law relating to Slander requires amendment."—
(Sir William Fraser.)

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, that while he had listened with great pleasure to the amusing speech of the hon. and gallant Baronet, he was unable to give his assent to the Resolution which he proposed. The English law had always recognized that there might be slander of the memory of the dead as well as of the living. In an old legal work of authority, Hawkins's Pleas of the Crown, it was laid down that a libel was a malicious defamation, in printing or writing, tending to blacken either the memory of the dead or the reputation of the living. That, he believed, represented the real state of the law, and it was illustrated by the judgment of Lord Kenyon, in the case to which his hon. and gallant Friend had referred, and which had reference to a libel on the memory of Lord Cowper. Lord Kenyon then stated that such a publication might be made fairly and honestly; but, whether made sooner or later, if it were done with a malevolent purpose, to vilify the memory of a deceased person, and with a view to injure his posterity as in the case of R. v. Critchley, then it came within the rule stated by Hawkins, and was illegal, as being done with a view to break the peace. The indictment, however, in the case decided by Lord Kenyon, contained no allegation that the libel tended to lead to a breach of the peace, and judgment was arrested on that account; but there was nothing in the judgment of Lord Kenyon to indicate that an indictment would not lie in such a case, when the circumstances warranted it, and the law, he ventured to say, remained the same up to the present time. There could, however, be no doubt that the practice of preferring indictments with respect to slanders on the dead had fallen into desuetude, and it seemed to be the general feeling of the country that it was undesirable to prosecute proceedings of that character. It was, at the same time, his opinion that if ever a case should arise in which it should be deemed expedient to prefer an indictment in respect of slander upon the memory of the dead the present law would be found sufficient for the purpose. He thought it would, under these circumstances, be undesirable to make any alteration in it.

MR. NEWDEGATE believed that the present tendency of our Courts was to render the law of libel more stringent than it used to be, and until prosecutions for slanders such as those of which the hon. and gallant Member complained were instituted, and it was found that the law in such cases was insufficient, the House would, he thought, do wrong further to restrict publication. Increased restrictions might operate to destroy the most useful of all classes of publications—that of recent history.

MR. SANDFORD said, he thought it was perfectly clear that the hon. and gallant Member had brought forward his Motion for the purpose not of illustrating the defects in the law of slander, but rather the Greville Memoirs. No one objected to the Memoirs of Saint Simon, yet Saint Simon dealt much more hardly with his contemporaries than Mr. Greville had done. Again, there was the Diary of Sir Nathaniel Wraxall, which gave a great deal of information about the politicians of his time. The only question was as to the period at which such memoirs should be published. He believed that Mr. Greville left an absolute discretion to those to whom his Memoirs were left as to the period of publication. If there had been an unduly early publication, therefore, Mr. Greville stood entirely acquitted of blame, and no soreness would have been caused if the period of publication had been postponed. He had observed that men were very sensitive as to what was said of their fathers and mothers who were very indifferent about the reputation of their grandmothers. If a wise discretion had been exercised as to the publication of the Greville Memoirs he believed that they would be a valuable contribution to the history of the time, and no offence would have been given to the feelings of individuals.

SIR WILLIAM FRASER, in reply, said: The hon. Member for Maldon (Mr. Sandford) is mistaken in supposing that there were no objections taken to Wraxall's Memoirs, when they were published. I must be permitted, Sir, to allude to a case which I omitted in my opening speech, and which shows a very great grievance on the part of an excellent lady now alive. Her late husband, after a most brilliant career in this House, and filling the highest law office of those who address you, rose to the highest position in "another place;" a man of great intellect and great eloquence; a man who, at 90 years of age, knew well how—one whom I remember waiting for many hours to hear speak on a great subject. The husband of this lady—and everybody in the House knows to whom I allude—is foully slandered in this pernicious book. I have heard, since I gave the Notice of this Motion, that it was the wish of the lady in question to indict the persons who have brought these slanders before the public; and she was told, so I am informed, that the law afforded her no redress. The law at present declares that the plaintiff must show malice on the part of the defendant; or that the publication of the libel tends to a breach of the peace. I wish to extend it to cases, as in this instance, where the slander has been published for the sole and simple purpose of obtaining money.

"The applause of listening Senates to command;"

MR. ALGERNON EGERTON wished to state that neither the relatives nor the executors of Mr. Greville had any pecuniary interest whatever in the publication of his Memoirs. They fell, by a species of gift, into the hands of the publishers. The relatives had nothing to do with the publication.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

FRANCE—DECLARATION OF PARIS (1856).—RESOLUTION.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE, in rising to move—

"That in consequence of a Conference having been held at Brussels in 1874 on International Law, and the proposed renewal of the Conference at St. Petersburg this year, a favourable opportunity is afforded to the Country of withdrawing from the Declaration of Paris of 1856, and thus maintaining our maritime rights, so essential to the power, prosperity, and independence of the Empire," said, that this question, which was one of the greatest possible importance, was last brought before the House by the hon. Member for Whitehaven (Mr. Cavendish Bentinck), and he regretted that the circumstances of his hon. Friend's official position precluded him from recurring to the subject. It had previously been brought before the House in 1866 and 1867. The general feeling of the House then was in favour of withdrawing from the Declaration of Paris, yet, as no particular question of International Law was then before Europe, it was not thought desirable that the House should come to any Resolution against the Declaration of Paris. Last year a Conference on International Law was held at Brussels, and it was proposed by the Russian Government to hold another Conference at St. Petersburg this year. He put it to the House that now or never—when attention was directed to questions of International Law—was the time for the House to say whether the country should be bound for ever by the Declaration of Paris of 1856. The Brussels Conference was convened with the professed object of ameliorating the condition of prisoners of war. The Conference, however, went further, and considered the whole question of military warfare by land. There was, however, a secret object in that Conference, and Lord Derby, with great sagacity, had succeeded in discovering what that object was. The real object was to entangle this country again into a confirmation of the Declaration of Paris. It was perfectly apparent in all the documents that had been published. Lord Derby, in his first despatch to Major General Sir Alfred Horsford, appointing him British Representative at the Conference, said—

“The Powers must give the most positive assurance that the delegates shall not entertain in any shape, directly or indirectly, anything relating to maritime operations or naval warfare.”

And again—

“It will be your duty to guard carefully against being led into any discussions which may affect, however remotely, the subject of maritime warfare.”

In the last despatch of Prince Gortchakoff, in reply to Lord Derby's declining to recognize any future Conference, the Russian Minister, after saying that there did not exist, strictly speaking, any positive International Law, proceeded to say—

“In the last century the rights of maritime neutrality had no legal existence until the Empress Catherine II. had proclaimed them and made them the object of Treaties with other Governments. England for a long time contested these rights as being derogatory to existing laws and customs. At the present time they are generally admitted, but have the force of obligatory laws only by the Treaties that sanction them.”

And in conclusion of the despatch—

“If the English Government states that it will keep to the principles of International Law, in accordance with which its acts have been hitherto regulated, and that it will impose the same obligation on its Allies, it would have been desirable that its meaning should have been rendered complete by stating what these principles are.”

He proposed that the House of Commons should say to-night what were those principles of International Law. He would not complain of the atrocities and calamities of war, for they were the best safeguards for the preservation of peace. You could not make war with kid gloves and rose-water. He was astonished to hear what beautiful humanitarian theories were put forward at Brussels; but Peace Congresses were not of modern origin. In one of Æsop's fables a Peace Congress of animals was held, of bears and wolves and bulls, to discuss the laws of war. The wolves and bears proposed that the only weapon used for fighting should be the teeth. The bulls, however, replied—“You may do what you please, but nature has given us two horns, and we intend to use them.” The two horns of England and of English right and security were the power of issuing letters of marque and the right of search. What was that right? From the earliest days of England's greatness and maritime power the right had been claimed and exercised of seizing an enemy's goods in whatever ship they might be, and whether under a neutral or any other flag. That right among ourselves had never been questioned. Lord Mansfield, when appealed to by the Government of the day, distinctly laid down the following principles:—(1) The goods of an enemy on board the ships of a friend might be taken; (2) The lawful goods of a friend on board the ships of an enemy ought to be restored; and (3) Contraband goods going to an enemy, although the property of a friend, might be taken as prize. The principle was held by the English Government of that day that they would not waive the right of seizing an enemy's goods under whatever flag they might be found. The next occasion on which this principle was questioned was in 1780, when the famous Armed Neutrality was formed by Russia; but England declined to give way, and the whole question was again settled for the time being. In 1801 there was again an Armed Confederacy, and by an Order in Council we laid an embargo upon the property of each of the countries forming that league. Letters of marque were issued, and in six months the whole confederacy was at an end. Vast importance had always been attached to this great maritime question. He would not go back so far as Vattel or the other great authorities of days long past, but would quote a few of the authorities of later times on the subject. Lord Eldon, for instance, held that the right of searching neutral vessels originated in the rights of nature, and no Convention or Treaty could destroy the right. The opinion of Lord Stowell was conveyed in the following words:—

“A war and a commercial peace is a state of things not yet seen in the world; there is no such thing as a war for arms and a peace for commerce; and the right of visiting and searching merchantmen on the high seas, whatever be the cargoes, whatever the destination, is an incontestable right of the lawfully commissioned cruisers of a belligerent State."

Lord Nelson, again, expressed not only the opinion of his own time, but foreshadowed the views of the great naval officers of the present day, when in the House of Lords, in 1801, he described the proposition that free ships should make free goods as—

"A proposition so monstrous in itself, so contrary to the Law of Nations, so injurious to the maritime interests of this country, that, if it had been persisted in, we ought not to have concluded the war with those Powers while a single man, a single shilling, or even a single drop of blood remained in the country."—[Parl. History, xxxvi. 262.]

Napoleon, again, speaking on the same question, said—

"The greatest blow that could be given to England would be to compel her to give up her maritime rights."

Such was the state of opinion in England down to the year 1854, when, as we were drifting into a war with Russia, by what was to him a perfectly inconceivable act on the part of a public man, the following Order in Council was issued:—

"In order to preserve the commerce of neutrals from all unnecessary destruction, Her Majesty consents to suspend a portion of the belligerent rights that belong to her by the Law of Nations; Her Majesty will suspend the right of seizing enemy's property on board neutral vessels unless contraband of war."

The result of this extraordinary Order was to afford perfect safety to Russian commerce which sailed under neutral flags. Coming on to 1856, they found occurring an event which was not to be paralleled in the diplomatic and political annals of England. Representatives of the Great Powers—Russia, France, and Austria—assembled in Paris to conclude a Treaty of Peace. The Treaty was signed, and the powers of the Ambassadors were at an end, when Count Walewski proposed to the Congress to conclude its work by a declaration which would constitute a remarkable advance in International Law, and which would be received by the whole world with a sentiment of lively gratitude. It would, he said, be truly worthy of the Congress of Paris to lay down the basis of an uniform maritime law in time of war as regarded neutrals. The four following principles would completely effect that object:—(1) The abolition of privateering; (2) The neutral flag covers enemy's goods, except contraband of war; (3) Neutral goods, except contraband of war, are not liable to capture even under an enemy's flag; and (4) Blockades are not binding except in so far as they are effective. The Earl of Clarendon observed that, like France, England, at the commencement of the war, sought by every means to mitigate its effects, and that with this view she renounced, for the benefit of neutrals, during the struggle which had then come to an end, principles which up to that time she had invariably maintained. If the whole of the Congress were to adopt the proposition of Count Walewski, it should be well understood that it would only be binding in regard to the Powers who might accede to it, and that it could not be appealed to by Governments who might refuse their accession. So utterly unjustified were the Congress in discussing this question, that Count Orloff observed that the powers with which he was furnished having for their sole object the restoration of peace, he did not consider himself authorized to take part in a discussion which his instructions had not provided for. On the same occasion Count Buol declared that he appreciated the spirit and beauty of the principles of maritime law which Count Walewski had proposed for adoption; but that, not being authorized by his instructions to express an opinion upon a matter of such importance, he must, for the time, confine himself to announcing to the Congress that he was prepared to request the orders of his Sovereign. All this was not embodied in the Treaty, but it appeared in the Parliamentary Paper as an annex to the 23rd Protocol. Now, the Plenipotentiaries had no power to discuss such a question as this. They took upon themselves to give away the whole great maritime rights of this country. It never was ratified by Parliament, and it never had received the consent of the Sovereigns. Was this country bound by such a Treaty as that? In fact, it was not a Treaty at all, but merely a dictation of Count Walewski, that was assented to in an evil moment of weak philanthropy by the late Lord Clarendon. He should not quote opinions on this question which had been expressed by any politicians who were now respon-

Army or Navy, could give us the right that we should derive from the right of seizing enemy's goods at sea in time of war. He denied that we might be called upon by military Powers to surrender that right. We were a great maritime Power. Of all the commercial ships of the world put together, what was the proportion of ships which belonged to England? 37 per cent. And of the steam navies of the world 58 per cent. The steamers belonged to England. Surely that placed us in an exalted position. If we armed those ocean steamers in case of war, and enabled them to defend themselves, what force we should have. He knew Lord Clarendon said he was going to inaugurate an era of peace. That era was not fulfilled at all. He (Mr. Baillie Cochrane) was not there to see any disaster, but he could not be untrue to facts. Twenty years ago the Canadian frontier was 1,000 miles from our possessions; now it was not more than 80; and that was owing to apathy with which we had viewed maritime matters. He contended that unless we were to adopt for ever a principle of selfish isolation, we should do something to maintain the maritime greatness of this country. We had done a great deal—and he thought we had paid too much—about the "silver plate" that protected us. As long as we insisted on having our maritime rights, we should have command of the sea of the world. As Lord Nelson should lose our last shilling and the drop of blood of our last man sooner than those maritime rights."

0 Prince Gortchakoff wrote to Brunow—

Emperor commands you to declare that Imperial Majesty cannot any longer be bound by the stipulations of the Treaty of Paris, if they restrict His Majesty's rights in the Black Sea."

en, he (Mr. Baillie Cochrane) was told that he was doing wrong in supposing that this country should be bound by the Declaration of Paris, the Treaty of Commerce, and the Emperor's greatest mistake was the insertion of the word "expended a drop of blood. He contended, by their vote that evening, to let foreign Governments know that we were determined to go back to the England of long ago; and by exercising to the fullest extent when occasion should require their maritime rights to do everything in their power to maintain the dignity and independence of the Empire. The hon. Gentleman concluded by moving his Resolution.

Mr. HERMON, in seconding the Motion, thanked his hon. Friend, to whom he thought the House and the country were indebted for having brought forward this important question at such a favourable opportunity. There was at present peace upon the Continent and we could therefore withdraw with honour from engagements which had never been ratified by the Queen, sanctioned by Parliament, or approved of by the people. His hon. Friend had so eloquently explained that portion of the subject, and had given so many quotations from the speeches of eminent men and high authorities, that he would not weary the House by going over the same ground. It had been said that in case of war this was a Declaration which would be at once rescinded; and, therefore, its continuance placed England in a position which she ought not to occupy. For his part, he hated and detested war, and he might be asked why then did he support the Motion? His object in doing so was that war might be made as disagreeable as possible, so that it might become hateful in the eyes of all civilized nations, who would thus be induced to recoil from it. He was aware that the proposition before the House would not be pleasant to the Representatives of those nations who took part in the Declaration agreed to at Paris; but they were not there to make things pleasant, but rather to make war odious. It ought to be thoroughly understood by other nations that England was prepared to exercise in time of war her great maritime power in her own defence, and that, he thought, was one of the things which would prevent us drifting into war. He could not but remember the great amount of sympathy which had been exhibited in this country for the sick and wounded during the Franco-German War, and the large fund which had been raised for their relief. He must say he regretted that he had contributed to that fund, for he now believed that it was false philanthropy.

Chili. No argument had, therefore, he maintained, been adduced by the hon. Member for the Isle of Wight to justify the course which he asked the House to adopt; and he would appeal to hon. Members not by a chance vote to reverse that which was a very solemn agreement, made after mature consideration, and the spirit and substance of which had been ratified by public opinion, as expressed by those who represented it in Parliament. He begged to conclude by moving the Previous Question.

SIR JOHN HAY said, the subject now under consideration was one on which he should not have ventured to intrude his opinions were it not that the defences of the country and its maritime supremacy were principally delegated in time of war on the Navy. The argument of the hon. Member who had just sat down was rather in support of maintaining the principles of the Declaration of Paris untouched than the postponement of its consideration to some more convenient time. He would, therefore, endeavour to show that it was an entire mistake and would go far to sap the naval power of this country, in the event of our being engaged in war. By the 11th Article the neutralization of the Black Sea had been effected, and the result had been the Convention between Russia and Turkey, closing the Dardanelles to ships of war, and limiting the naval forces in the Black Sea. It was a Treaty binding and ratified by the contending parties. The Treaty of Paris, so called, was not a Treaty in any sense of the word, and was negotiated by Ambassadors that were not accredited for that particular purpose. In his opinion, the first two Articles of that Treaty were calculated to impair the naval supremacy of England. They contained this declaration of maritime law:—1. Privateering is and remains abolished. 2. The neutral flag covers enemy's goods, with the exception of contraband of war. 3. Neutral goods, with the exception of contraband of war, are not liable to capture under enemy's flag. 4. Blockades, in order to be binding, must be effective—that is to say, maintained by a force sufficient really to prevent access to the coast of the enemy. It was laid down by a high authority that—all merchant ships, wherefore resistance to search amounts to a forfeiture of neutrality. Particular States have relaxed the rigour of this rule, and by express Treaty granted immunity by establishing a maxim—free ships, free goods. A neutral ship refusing to be searched would from that proceeding alone be condemned as a lawful prize. If we find an enemy's effects on board a neutral ship we seize them by the rights of war; but we are bound to pay the right to the master of the neutral ship, who is not to suffer by such seizure. The effects of neutrals found in an enemy's ship are to be restored to the owners, against whom there is no right of confiscation, but without any allowance for detainer, decay, &c."

"The Law of Nations gives to every belligerent cruiser the right of visitation and search

and with regard to neutral things found on board an enemy—

"Since it is not the place where a thing is, which determines the nature of that thing, but the character of the person to whom it belongs, things belonging to neutral persons which happen to be in an enemy's country, or on board an enemy's ship, are to be distinguished from those which belong to the enemy."
